Supreme Soviet as the Source of Education and Inspiration. If the Supreme Soviet has no control over administration or it cannot criticise the policy of government, it has at least immense educative value. It is a meeting place of about a thousand and half Deputies drawn from all corners of the country, dressed in the costumes of their own lands and representing varieties of nationalities, occupations and interests. It is a thrill for them to come to Moscow and to listen to top-ranking Party leaders. The Party, too, utilises the opportunity and uses all the vehicles of propaganda to acquaint the entire country with the policies of the Government and its achievements. The press and the radio report faithfully and at length the speeches, the discussions, the plans which the Government contemplates to pursue, and the extent to which it has achieved success. The Deputies carry the message of Socialism to their distant lands, tell their fellow folks of the stupendous and almost incredible strides made by the country towards economic prosperity and thereby inspire them with the achievements of Socialism. It is the duty of a Deputy to report to his constituency the proceedings of the Supreme Soviet and highlight his own contribution towards building up Socialism.

LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE

A Bill in order to become a law may originate either in the Soviet of the Union or in the Soviet of the Nationalities. Ordinarily, a Bill is proposed by a member of the Council of Ministers within whose department the legislation falls, although all the Deputies have the right to introduce Bills. Each Chamber elects its own Committees or Commissions, as they are designated in the USSR. These are: Credentials Commission; Planning and Budgetary Commission; Commission for Industry, Transport and Communications; Commission for Construction and Building Materials Industry; Commission for Agriculture; Commission for Public Health and Social Maintenance; Commission for Education, Science and Culture; Commission for Trade and Public Services; Legislative Proposals Commission; Foreign Affairs Commission. As soon as a Bill is introduced it goes to the appropriate Commission of the Soviet concerned. The real work is done in the Commissions rather than in the plenary sessions of the Soviets. And this is primarily due to the reason that the Supreme Soviet assembles only for the brief period of two weeks in a year. The Commissions are not restricted to meeting solely during the brief sessions of the Supreme Soviet. The Commissions meet very often, collect the relevant data, give the Bill a detailed consideration, discuss it clause by clause, and suggest revisions. Sometimes, the Commissions display considerable vigour in revising Bills. Finally, the measures are presented to the Chamber concerned. The Commissions may also originate legislation themselves. Once a Bill emerges from the Commission it only remains for the Soviet to give it the necessary sanction.

The discussion of a Bill in either House of the Supreme Soviet is a tame affair. The Deputies do not discuss the principles involved in the legislation, but only the application of the principles already accepted. All legislation in the USSR must be in accordance with "general line" of the Party, for the making of decision is a special concern of the Communist Party. It is, accordingly, not the wording but the working of law which chiefly occupies the Soviet legislator. The text of the proposed legislation is not a centre of discussion, but the actual working of the Ministry responsible for carrying it out.

Another distinctive feature of the legislative procedure in the USSR is that there is no 'nay' in the Supreme Soviet votes. The practice is that all votes must be unanimous. That is the essence of Soviet Government. Unanimity is regarded as a logical and consistent part of the Soviet structure of the State. Moreover, in a one-party legislature "voting more often than not becomes the occasion for a demonstration of in-group solidarity and an affirmation of faith in the regime as a whole and its ruling party in particular."

In the intervals between sessions of the Supreme Soviet its standing Commissions function. These Commissions are elected from the deputies of the two Chambers. The Commissions preliminarily consider and prepare questions relating to their spheres of jurisdiction and subsequently submit them to the Supreme Soviet for its final decision. The Commissions are called upon to exercise systematic control over the work of Ministries and Departments, and actively to promote implementation of the Supreme Soviet decisions. The Commissions have also the right to initiate legislation. All offices and officials are required to carry out the requests of these Commissions and to provide them with all the necessary information and documents. When considering draft laws or the draft of measures, the Commissions may hear reports of representatives of the Government and Departments, and also request consultation with representatives of various scientific and public organizations.

All questions discussed by the Commissions are decided by a simple majority vote. Any member of a Commission, who disagrees with a decision, may submit his own proposals to the appropriate Chamber. Meetings of the Commissions may be attended with the right of a consultative vote by Supreme Soviet Deputies who are not members of the given Commission. A Standing Commission is accountable for its activities to the Chamber which elected it, and in the intervals between sessions to the Chairman of the Chamber concerned.

Early in 1957, the Supreme Soviet decided on the formation of an Economic Commission of the Soviet of Nationalities. This is an inter-Republican body called upon to work out decisions on questions of the economic and cultural development of the different Republics. The Commission is elected by the Soviet of the Nationalities from amongst its own deputies and consists of a Chairman and thirty members—two representatives from each of the 15 Union Republics. The tasks of the Commission include preliminary consideration of the requests of the Union Republics for the introduction of various measures in the field of economic development, as well as public education, the public health services, town and village planning, etc. The Commission is called upon to make a study of the drafts of the national economic plans submitted for the approval of the Supreme Soviet, and to inform to the Soviet of Nationalities as to whether these plans conform to the interests of the economic and cultural development of the Union Republics.

ROLE OF THE SUPREME SOVIET

The Constitutional text holds the Supreme Soviet as "the highest organ of State power." Its authority to legislate covers all fields over which the Union Government has jurisdiction. Then, the Constitution ordains that the legislative power of the USSR is exercised exclusively by the Supreme Soviet. But theory is not reality. The Supreme Soviet cannot impress as the highest organ of State power personifying the sovereignty of the Soviet people, and vested with the exclusive legislative power when it meets only twice a year and that, too, just for eight or ten days at a time. It is not possible for it, during its brief sessions, to deal with all the problems which confront that vast country and require approval by the Supreme Soviet. The burden of legislation, which is highly technical, is extremely enormous and the Deputies are not skilled parliamentarians or experienced in the technicalities involved in legislation to lead the issue to discussion. But discussion is not the function of the Supreme Soviet. It is meant to endorse, what has been already determined, and record vote. The regular procedure is that members of the Council of Ministers make their report or submit their Bills, and the solidarity of the Government and nation demands that they should be unanimously passed. "The formula frequently applied now is to state that the report or proposal of government was presented with such admirable clarity that no debate is necessary." At infrequent occasions, when it becomes necessary to debate the issue, all speak in favour of the measure. Principles involved are never discussed and the text of the proposed measure is never the centre of discussion. All legislation must be in accordance with and in conformity to the general line of the Party and it seems unlikely that the Supreme Soviet will ever challenge or amend it. Amendments introduced in the Committees of the Supreme Soviet always have the prior Party sanction. What the Deputies actually do is that they may bring up shortcomings in performance and tardiness in operation of the policy and suggest measures for improvement. When this has been done all must invariably vote for the measure. There is no instance recorded in which a Deputy of the Supreme Soviet had failed to vote in favour of a measure introduced or endorsed by Government. Supreme Soviet, thus, obediently gives its approval to all that has been recommended. The institution which does not determine policy, which, in fact, has no hand in the determination of the policy, cannot and does not possess any kind of power, what to talk of the highest State power.

The Supreme Soviet does not even exercise legislative power exclusively. Majority of laws in the USSR are in the form of decrees of the Presidium. Some are in the form of "decisions" or "orders" which are the result of the joint action of the Central Committee of the Communist Party and the Council of Ministers. The development is really strange, because it deprives the Supreme Soviet of its exclusive legislative power. It is still more strange that this development was fully cemented during the lifetime of Stalin himself. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution in 1936, Stalin rejected a proposal to give the Presidium the authority to enact provisional legislation. He asserted, "It is time we put an end to a situation to which not one but number of bodies legislate. Such a situation runs counter to the principle that laws should be stable....Legislative power in the USSR must be exercised by only one body, the Supreme Soviet of the USSR."

Soviet writers insist that the laws passed by the Supreme Soviet have greater sanctity than the decrees, decisions or orders, and the latter are subject to the confirmation of the Supreme Soviet. This is true so far as the letter of the law is concerned. In actual practice, the Presidium has not only adopted decrees, but has even changed the provisions of the Constitution itself. The decrees, decisions or orders have never been revoked, except on the initiative of the Government. And since they come into operation at once without waiting for the confirmation of the Supreme Soviet, it matters not what name we may give them, laws, decrees, or orders. Even if we differentiate between them, the differentiation becomes meaningless when we know that the Supreme Soviet, the Presidium, and even the Constitution are definitely subordinate to the ruling power of the Communist Party.

The real utility of the Supreme Soviet is that it educates and inspires the citizens of the USSR through its deputies, and the deputies exercise a reasonable influence in the public affairs of the Soviet Union. The Supreme Soviet is a meeting place, as said before, of about a thousand and a half Deputies drawn from all corners of the country. They listen, while the Supreme Soviet is in session, to the top-ranking Party leaders and familiarise themselves with the plans which the Government intends to pursue, and the extent to which it has achieved success. When the brief session of the Supreme Soviet, lasting eight to ten days, comes to an end, the Deputies carry the message of Socialism to distant lands and tell their fellow folks the achievements made by the USSR and, as such, educate and inspire them with the cause of Socialism.

The fact that all the top-ranking leaders of the Communist Party are the Deputies and that the majority of the members of both the Soviet of the Union and the Soviet of Nationalities are actively associated with the Party makes for co-ordination, the importance of which cannot be denied. The Deputies hailing from the various widely diversified sections of the country express their points of view which may not have been known to the Government before and consequently get the modification of many proposals in the light of their local experiences.

CHAPTER V

THE PRESIDIUM

A Plural Presidency. The Supreme Soviet of the USSR meets, as it has already been stated, twice a year. The need therefore arises for a body which would exercise highest State power in the intervals between sessions. Such an organ is the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR. But the Presidium is a constitutional anomaly. It is a unique institution, indigenous to the Soviet system and without parallel anywhere else, except in the States that have copied the Soviet model. By virtue of the powers granted to it, the Presidium is the highest permanently functioning organ of the State elected by the Supreme Soviet of the USSR and accountable to it. Stalin called it a "collegiate President" or the Collective President. It performs functions Executive in character which are the prerogatives of the Chief Executive Head of a State in other countries, King or President. Its power of appointing officials, receiving diplomats, conferring decorations and titles of honour, signing the Union laws, convening the sessions of the Supreme Soviet and ordering for its dissolution, etc., make the Presidium an Executive organ of the USSR and since it is a numerous body it is a plural or collective Executive.

But what makes it a constitutional anomaly is that it defies the doctrine of Separation of Powers. The Presidium has a combination of executive, legislative and even some judicial functions. The fact that the Presidium functions continuously and the Supreme Soviet only periodically, that is, twice annually and that too for short one-week sessions, devolves upon it a good deal of legislative business that cannot be held over for the Supreme Soviet, makes it a legislative body. It issues "decrees" with the force of law and this is the regular process of law-making in the USSR. The unlimited decree-issuing powers of the Presidium were demonstrated before the elections of 1936. It issued a decree raising the minimum age of Deputies to the Supreme Soviet from eighteen to twenty-three, and another providing for representation of the Red Army Units serving abroad. Both these decrees amended the constitutional provisions and were formally ratified by the Supreme Soviet, which had been elected in pursuance of these amendments. Since the decrees issued by the Presidium have never been revoked, except on the initiative of Government, the real legislative power rests with the Presidium. Towster, while summing up the constitutional role of the Presidium, has aptly said that the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet "constitutionally classified as one of the highest organs of the State power, has—like its predecessors, the Presidium of the G.E.C.—fulfilled the need of a continually operating, representing the summit of the formal Soviet pyramid, and performing a wide variety of functions. Though the competence assigned to it differs in several aspects from that of the Presidium of the G.E.C., particularly in the publicly emphasised law of legislative power in the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet, the latter has not only acted as 'collective President' of the Soviet State, but has in fact served to a large extent as a legislative organ in the Soviet structure."¹ Thus, the Presidium is both a legislative and executive organ, and also it combines some of the functions exercised in other countries by or in the name of the Chief Executive head of the State with those "usually associated with an Upper Chamber or executive council."²

How the Presidium is elected. The Presidium is elected by a joint session of the Supreme Soviet—the Soviet of the Union and the Soviet of Nationalities—and carries on governmental work between sessions of the parent body. Originally, according to the 1936 Constitution, it consisted of a Chairman, sixteen Vice-Chairmen representing each Union Republic, and twenty-four additional members. In 1946 the number of the additional members was reduced to fifteen. Today, it is composed of a Chairman, 15 Vice-Chairmen, a Secretary and twenty other members. By established tradition, the Presidents of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviets of the Union Republics (fifteen in number) who are also Deputies to the Supreme Soviet of the USSR, are elected Vice-Chairmen of the Presidium of the USSR Supreme Soviet. All told 37 members including the Chairman, Vice-Chairman and a Secretary, make the Presidium. Anastas Mikoyan, who became President in 1964, resigned on December 9, 1966, and Nikolai Podgorniy succeeded him. Podgorniy had been the No. 2 man to Brezhnev in the Party Secretariat.

The normal term of the Presidium is four years. If the Supreme Soviet of the USSR is dissolved earlier, the Presidium too stands dissolved. But the outgoing Presidium continues in office until the newly elected Supreme Soviet shall have formed a new Presidium. On the expiration of four years, the usual term of the Supreme Soviet, or in the event of its earlier dissolution, the outgoing Presidium orders new elections to be held within a period not exceeding two months, and convenes the session of the newly elected Supreme Soviet not later than three months after the elections. The Presidium is accountable to the Supreme Soviet. Dr. Finer regards the Presidium "The Interpersonal web of Party and State."³ He says that Supreme Soviet, according to the letter of the law, is the master of the Presidium, the Communist Party sees to it that the Presidium consists of none but Party members. No non-party member has ever found a place therein.⁴ "Then there is an interlacing between the top directorate of the party—that is, its Party Politbureau—and the Soviet Presidium and the Council of Ministers." This makes the perfection in the integration of the Communist Party and Soviet Government.

Powers of the Presidium. The Presidium is a legacy of the earlier Soviet Constitutions and it retains, under the Stalin Constitution, its previous functions minus some of the legislative powers. The powers vested in it are enumerated in Article 49.

1. Political Power in the USSR, 1917-47, p. 272.

2. Ogg and Zink, Modern Foreign Governments (1953), p. 861.

3. Governments of the Greater European Powers, p. 802.

4. The Supreme Soviet has roughly 16 per cent non-party Deputies.

The Presidium convenes the sessions of the Supreme Soviet, twice annually, dissolves it in the event of irreconcilable disagreement between the Soviet of the Union and the Soviet of Nationalities, orders new elections within two months of its dissolution or on the expiration of its normal term, and convenes the first session of the newly elected Supreme Soviet. The Presidium may also convene an extraordinary session at its discretion or on the demand of one of the Union Republics.

It issues decrees and interprets the laws of the USSR. The decrees issued by the Presidium have the force of law and extend to all the country. But all such decrees must be based on All-Union laws. When the Presidium gives interpretation to the laws in operation, it explains the purposes of such national laws, the duties which they impose, and how their provisions could be properly applied. All measures passed by the Supreme Soviet are published in the languages of the Union Republics over the signatures of the Chairman and the Secretary of the Presidium. This power of the Presidium resembles the powers of assenting to a Bill by the King or the President in other countries, though the Constitution does not say anything about it.

The Constitution of the USSR does not differentiate between a Bill and a law. Article 39 reads: "A law is considered adopted if passed by both Chambers of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR by a simple majority." It implies that the Presidium, unlike the Executive Heads of other countries, does not possess the power of vetoing a Bill. The Presidium, however, may submit the proposed legislation for the popular vote and hold referendum. This it may do on its own initiative or on the demand of one of the Union Republics. But no referendum has so far been held.

The Council of Ministers is appointed by the Supreme Soviet and is responsible and accountable to it. But in between the intervals of sessions of the Supreme Soviet, the Presidium relieves and appoints ministers, authorises the appointment and formation of new ministries, and sanctions creation of new regions and adjustment of territories, subject, of course, to subsequent confirmation by the Supreme Soviet. The Constitution also empowers the Presidium to annul "decisions" and "orders" of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, and the Councils of Ministers of the Union Republics in case they do not conform to law. It should be noted here that the Stalin Constitution nowhere uses the words "dismissal of ministers." It simply refers to their "release and appointment."

If the Supreme Soviet is not in session, the Presidium declares war in the event of an armed attack, or whenever it becomes necessary to fulfil international treaty obligations concerning mutual defence against aggression. It appoints and removes the high command of the armed forces of the Soviet Union, orders partial or general mobilization, and proclaims martial law either throughout the USSR or in separate localities in the interests of the defence of the country or for purposes of ensuring public order and security. The Presidium in exercise of this power issued four decrees immediately after Germany had attacked Russia. These decrees pertained to: (1) the mobilization of citizens subject to military service in a number of areas; (2) promulgation of martial law; (3) declaration of martial law in a number of Republics, Regions, and separate cities; and

(4) formation of military tribunals in localities under martial law and regions which were threatened of actual hostilities. It also issued the decree on January 25, 1945 terminating the state of war between the Soviet Union and Germany.

The Presidium of the Supreme Soviet represents the USSR in its relations with foreign States. It ratifies and denounces international treaties, appoints and recalls ambassadors of the Soviet Union to other countries, and receives the credentials and letters of recall of foreign representatives accredited to the Soviet Union.

It bestows decorations and titles of honour, military titles, diplomatic ranks and other special titles. The Presidium both issues general acts of amnesty and examines the right of pardon of individual offenders convicted by a court of law.

The Constitution grants immunity to the Deputies against arrest. No Deputy can be arrested or prosecuted without the consent of the Supreme Soviet or, if it is not in session, without the consent of the Presidium.

When preparing and studying separate questions, the Presidium usually issues instructions to the Government or to high officials to present the necessary materials to the Presidium, and also charges the Standing Commissions of the Chambers of the Supreme Soviet with a study and preliminary consideration of these questions. In exercise of its functions of supreme State control, the Presidium regularly hears reports of Ministers, the Chairman of the Supreme Court, the Procurator-General and other high officials.

For the performance of its activities, which are of an extremely varied nature, the Presidium has at its disposal a huge staff constituting its own office as well as the departments of law, awards, pardon, question of citizenship, information, statistics, etc.

The Chairmanship of the Presidium. Some of the "presidential" functions vested in the Presidium are exercised by its Chairman, although neither the Constitution nor any law gives him any special powers. Nevertheless the laws passed by the Supreme Soviet are promulgated with his signature, and he signs the decrees of the Presidium itself. He receives foreign envoys and ministers, and he exchanges messages with other heads of States "as an equal among equals." But all acts of the Chairman are in the name of the Presidium. The Chairman of the Presidium, thus, in form may roughly correspond to the titular head of the State. It is a position of ceremonial importance alone and without any political significance. "As in the case of his foreign counterparts, his most important function is to mix with the ordinary citizens as a living human symbol of the paternal concern of the government with their welfare."⁵ And in the language of the foreign countries he is described the 'President.' For instance, a news emanating from Kathmandu, May 25, 1965, reported, "President Anastas Mikoyan and the Soviet Prime Minister, Mr. Alexi Kosygin, have accepted invitations to visit Nepal."⁶ There is no 'President' of the USSR. It is against the Constitution and the spirit of collective leadership which it establishes at every level.

5. Carter, G.M., and others, The Government of Soviet Union (1954), World Press, p. 119.

6. The Indian Express, New Delhi, May 27, 1965, p. 1.

Real authority of the Presidium. The Presidium, as Dr. Finer says, "is the continuous government of the Soviet Union in fact as well as in law." It is partly a legislative body and partly an executive council which exercises decisive control over the Council of Ministers in their everyday duties of administration. The law makes its position enviable because it has the right of issuing decrees. A steady stream of decrees, which have the force of law, emanate from it. These decrees are in part based on the Presidium's own jurisdiction as enumerated in Article 49 of the Constitution, but they also invade freely the sphere which the Constitution reserves for the Supreme Soviet itself. Immediately after the Second World War elections to the Supreme Soviet had become overdue. The Presidium not only set the date, but it also enacted changes in the electoral law that amounted to amendments to the Constitution. It raised the age of the Deputies from eighteen to twenty-three years and added new electoral districts to both Chambers of the Supreme Soviet by decreeing that Soviet Army units abroad should be represented in each Chamber by a Deputy for every 100,000 voters. The decrees changing the franchise and the system of representation were presented to the Supreme Soviet, when elected under the new rules, and the decrees were adopted formally as constitutional amendments.

The Presidium can also dismiss and replace Ministers in the intervals of the Soviet sessions. It can also call an election if the two assemblies are in deadlock. Further, the Presidium may initiate a referendum at its discretion. But the real power rests with it when the two Chambers are not yet elected. The Presidium has never had the occasion to dissolve the Supreme Soviet. Nor has it even organised a referendum. It has, however, used all its other powers effectively. The extent of the authority of the Supreme Soviet, as the highest organ of the State power, has for all practical purposes been transferred to the Presidium, though the directing force remains with the inner circle of the Communist Party. Those who direct the Party have their due place in the Presidium and so have the Ministers who matter in the Party and Government. Dr. Finer gives a matter of fact summing up of the position and powers of the Presidium. He says, "It seems to hold a kind of Cabinet or policy-making, directing, co-ordinating, and initiating position above the Council of Ministers, yet to be removed from the actual day-by-day departmental executive responsibilities: It is at once a continuing substitute for the Supreme Soviet, a higher level Executive than the Council of Ministers, and a supervisor of ministerial everyday activities employing the disciplinary and corrective power that accompanies the power to quash decisions and orders and to oust Ministers."⁷ So far as the letter of the law is concerned the Presidium is appointed by the Supreme Soviet and is accountable to it for all its activities. But, in practice, it has always acted actively and effectively and has eclipsed in authority the Supreme Soviet, which, according to the Constitution, exercises plenary State power.

THE COUNCIL OF MINISTERS

Nature of the Council of Ministers. The real pivot of administration in the Soviet Union is the Council of Ministers,¹ called until March 1946, the Council of the People's Commissars. It is the government of the USSR and the highest executive and administrative organ of the State power.² Apparently, the Council of Ministers corresponds to a Cabinet in a parliamentary system of government. It carries the same nomenclature as the Councils of Ministers do in other countries. It is the creature of the legislature and is expressly declared responsible to the Supreme Soviet directly when it is in session and indirectly through the Presidium at other times. But theory is not practice and, once again, a legal truth becomes a political untruth in the USSR. Under one party system of government the formation of the Ministry is an accomplished fact. Then, it is not the parliamentary party which elects its leader who is summoned to form the government, and he submits a list of his colleagues. The Council of Ministers in the USSR is designated by the Party Politburo and it is responsible to the Party rather than to the Supreme Soviet. The Chairman of the Council of the Ministers (the Prime Minister) is not the choice of the parliamentary party and his position cannot be compared to a Prime Minister under a parliamentary system of government. The Council of Ministers, in fact, has no semblance of a Cabinet. Let us take a typical example of the formation of the Council of Ministers in March 1946. "The head of the outgoing government, Comrade J.V. Stalin, submitted a written statement to the Chairman of the joint session of the Chambers declaring that the government surrendered its powers to the Supreme Soviet. The Supreme Soviet accepted the statement of the government and unanimously commissioned Comrade Stalin to submit proposals for a new government. At the next joint sitting of the Chambers, the Chairman announced the composition of the new government as proposed by Comrade Stalin. After statements by deputies, the Chairman declared that there was no objection to any of the proposed candidates and that none of the deputies insisted on a roll-call vote. The composition of the Council of Ministers of the USSR as proposed by Comrade Stalin was then voted on as a whole and unanimously adopted amidst loud applause passing into an ovation in honour of Comrade Stalin, who was elected Chairman of the Council of Ministers of the USSR and Minister of its armed forces. V.M. Molotov, Comrade Stalin's close associate, was approved as Minister of Foreign Affairs." Precisely the same happened

1. Article 56.

2. Article 79.

with the Councils of Ministers headed by Bulganin, Khrushchev and Kosygin. The decrees of the Presidium of the USSR appointed them and were confirmed when the Supreme Soviet assembled in a session. One fine morning (October 16, 1964) the world was made to understand that Nikita Khrushchev had been released from his job as Russia's Prime Minister on grounds of old age and bad health. But with Khrushchev's exit, the Council of Ministers continued as before with the former First Deputy Premier, Alexei Kosygin, as the new Prime Minister. "Comrade A.N. Kosygin heartily thanked the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union and the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the USSR for the confidence shown and gave the assurance that he would do his utmost to discharge his duties."

This is not the practice of the parliamentary system of government where the Prime Minister is central to the formation of the Council of Ministers, central to its life and central to its death. Moreover, the system of government, as it obtains in the USSR, thoroughly insists on and strives for unanimity. Opposition, on the other hand, is the very breath of parliamentary democracy as obtained in other countries of the world. "His Majesty's Opposition" in Britain has now a constitutional sanction behind it. The Constitution of the USSR does not permit the existence of Opposition.

How the Council of Ministers is formed. The Council of Ministers of the USSR is formed at a joint session of the Soviet of Union and the Soviet of Nationalities. But it is just a formality. The Party Politburo, as stated above, designates the Council of Ministers and its Chairman. The Supreme Soviet simply ratifies it. If the Supreme Soviet is not in session, the Presidium of the USSR "releases and appoints" ministers on the recommendations of the Chairman of the Council of Ministers, subject to the confirmation of the Supreme Soviet.

The post of the Chairman of the Council of Ministers was held from 1917 to 1924 by Lenin and from 1924 to 1930 by Rykov. Then came Molotov. Stalin took the position in 1941 and he continued in the saddle till his death on March 5, 1953. On March 6, Georgi M. Malenkov was appointed the Chairman of the Council of Ministers. He resigned early in 1955 and Marshal Nikolai Bulganin took his place and Comrade Khrushchev replaced Bulganin. On October 16, 1964, Alexei Kosygin became the Prime Minister replacing Nikita Khrushchev.

Composition of the Council of Ministers. The composition of the Council of Ministers is provided for in Article 70 of the Constitution. It consists of a Chairman, first Vice-Chairman, Vice-Chairmen, Ministers and the Chairmen of the Council of Ministers of the Union Republics by virtue of their office.

The Council of Ministers was really a large body of an ever expanding character and prior to 1951, it consisted of fifty members. Now the number stands at 30 as a result of reorganisation after Stalin's death. The Chairman and the Vice-Chairmen (five in number) constitute an 'inner Cabinet' for the more efficient supervision and proper co-ordination of the work of the Council of Ministers. The members of the 'inner cabinet' are generally the members of Party Politburo and as the Party Politburo is the policy-making body, it "forms an interlocking directorate between party and government." Another important point to be noted is that Ministers are technicians chosen for their expert knowledge in a particular field and not as politicians and amateurs. They are not leaders of the Party, although they are all Party members. The need for proper integration and co-ordination of functions of the Council of Ministers as a whole is much more pressing in the Soviet Union as compared with other countries.

Powers of the Council of Ministers. The powers conferred upon the Council of Ministers by Article 68 are very wide indeed. They comprise:

(1) Direction and co-ordination of the All-Union and Union Republican Ministries, and of other institutions under the jurisdiction of the Union Government and to exercise guidance of the Economic Councils of the Union Republics and those of the economic administration areas through the Councils of Ministers of the Union Republics.

(2) Taking of necessary measures for the proper execution of the State budget and the national economic plans. The Council of Ministers is also to devise means and take necessary steps for the strengthening of the country's credit and monetary system.

(3) Maintenance of public order and defence of the country, the protection of the interests of the State, and the right of citizens.

(4) Direction of the general organization of the armed forces of the country and fixing of the annual contingent of citizens to be called up for military service.

(5) Exercising general guidance in the sphere of relations with foreign States.

(6) Creation of special Committees, Commissions, and other administrative organs to deal with economic, cultural and military matters.

Other powers of the Council of Ministers are:

(7) To issue 'decisions' and 'orders' on the basis and in pursuance of the All-Union laws in operation, and to verify their proper execution. The 'decisions' and 'orders' of the Council of Ministers are binding throughout the territory of the USSR.

(8) The Council of Ministers may suspend the executive orders of the Union Republics, if such orders are not in conformity with the Union laws or decrees.

(9) The Ministers of the USSR issue orders and instructions, within the limits of their respective Ministries, on the basis of the All-Union laws and in pursuance of the orders and decisions of the Council of Ministers. In fact, the Council of Ministers now requires to an increasing degree that ministerial orders and actions which they intend to make be submitted to the whole Council for information, and in a number of instances individual acts of the Ministers have been annulled. It will, thus, be noted that while the Presidium annuls acts of the Council of Ministers, the Council of Ministers annuls acts of individual Ministers.

(10) The Council of Ministers has the right, in respect of the All-Union branches of administration and economy, to suspend decisions and orders of the Council of Ministers of the Union Republics, and, as said above, to annul orders and instructions of the Ministers of the USSR.

Responsibility of the Council of Ministers. The Constitution of 1936 specifically provides that the Supreme Soviet appoints the Council of Ministers. It is responsible and accountable to the Supreme Soviet or its Presidium when the Supreme Soviet is not in session. This strengthens the official supremacy of the Presidium. Article 71 further provides that the Government of the USSR or a Minister of the USSR to whom a member of the Supreme Soviet addresses a question must give a verbal or written reply thereto in the Chamber to which the Deputy belongs within a period not exceeding three days. This means that the Constitution not only expressly provides for ministerial responsibility, but it also gives a right to the Deputies to elicit information either from the Council of Ministers or any particular Minister concerning his jurisdiction, and when such an information is sought it becomes the constitutional duty of that agency to whom the question is directed to give either a written or an oral reply in the House to which the Deputy belongs within a period not exceeding three days.

The device of asking questions is a parliamentary practice of invoking responsibility. And giving it a constitutional sanction may be described the third miracle of modern politics. But ministerial responsibility in the Soviet Union is just a constitutional formality. The Supreme Soviet or its Presidium have nothing to do with the composition of the Council of Ministers, their continuance in office, and both exercise no control over their policy. The Supreme Soviet simply endorses the decisions of the Party Politburo. And what is still more amazing is that since the ascendancy of Stalin to power, the action of the Presidium had remained till his death the action of Stalin. Stalin, in the words of Zhdanov, was "the genius, the brain, the heart of the Bolshevik Party, of the whole Soviet people, of the whole progressive and advanced humanity." One of the critics of the Soviet regime said, "The little father in the Kremlin formerly personified by the Tsar, has thus come to be personified by the General Secretary." The denunciation of Stalin and the cult of the individual personality at the 20th Congress of the CPSU now maximises the role of the Party and elevates the Marxist-Leninist point of view of collective leadership and, accordingly, the leadership of the Party Politburo, which was, once again, overshadowed by Khrushchev. Khrushchev was both the Prime Minister and Party's First Secretary. After his exit, Leonid Brezhnev became the First Secretary and Alexei Kosygin as the Prime Minister. How long both these key posts remain separate cannot be predicted. The course of events has never run smooth in the USSR.

The Ministers in the Soviet Union come in and go out not because they hold or lose the confidence of the legislature, but because they are the nominees of the Party and those who control it. Whether a Minister holds his post or loses it depends upon his standing with the Party leaders. There is a constant relationship of automatic approval between the Council of Ministers and the Supreme Soviet. "Thus when the Council of Ministers reports back to the Supreme Soviet it is a case of Party members in the administration reporting to the Party members (and sympathisers) in the Soviet assembly concerning matters which have been under the constant supervision and authorization of the Communist Party itself." There has never been a single occasion when the Supreme Soviet disapproved what the Council of Ministers had done. They are distinctly two levels within the Council of Ministers: a higher group composed of those who are also members of the Party Politburo and the lower group who are not. As the Party Politburo formulates and determines policy and decides about the composition of the Council of Ministers and membership of the Supreme Soviet, there can be no occasion to disapprove what the Council of Ministers has already accepted. The Supreme Soviet is, in fact, completely subservient to the "party line" and so are other organs of government.

The Ministers. A good part of the executive business is performed by the individual Ministries. The Ministers head the Union Departments, the Ministries of the U.S.S.R. The Ministers direct the work of their respective Ministries and may issue orders and instructions dealing with matters within their competence, provided that such orders are based on the All-Union laws in operation and on decrees of the Council of Ministers. And, as said earlier, the Council of Ministers can annul acts of individual Ministers. The Ministers must also answer questions addressed to them within three days in the Chamber from which they originate.

The position of the Chairman of the Council of Ministers (Prime Minister) is one of the highest offices in the Soviet Union and it becomes a fortress of indomitable strength when it goes with a commanding position in the Party as in the case of Lenin, Stalin and Khrushchev. But it is not improbable in the USSR if one meets the fate of Rykov. Rykov was the Chairman of the Council of Ministers from 1924-30, but eventually he fell from grace, was tried on charges of high treason in 1938, and executed. And Stalin's grace had always mattered. Lenin himself noted, shortly before his death, that "Comrade Stalin, having become Secretary-General has concentrated enormous power in his hands...." Following Lenin's death, the Secretary-General used this power relentlessly. Stalin himself today stands publicly disreputed by the very people who a little more than ten years ago vied with each other in their extravagant tributes to him. And those who brought him to disreputation, Khrushchev, for example, have met the same fate.

The rank and file of the Ministers are men of not much political stature and do not matter, except the Foreign Minister, at home or abroad. Elevation to ministerial rank is not due to the pressure of the parliamentary group or political considerations. No one is indispensable in the Soviet Union. Talking to the journalists at a reception in Moscow on October 30, 1957, Nikita Khrushchev referred to the removal of Marshal Zhukov as Defence Minister and his future assignment and significantly remarked, "You will not hear of his new job tonight. In life one cell must die, another takes its place. Life goes on." Recognition of personal qualifications for a job, and there are many technical ministerial jobs, or a reward bestowed upon deserving party functionaries are the two considerations for appointment as a Minister. But changes among Ministers are frequent and silent. They are barely noted in the press, but seldom explained.

Two Kinds of Ministries. There are two kinds of Ministries in the USSR: (1) the All-Union Ministries which operate through the entire territory of the Union directly or through organs they appoint; and (2) the Union-Republican Ministries which operate through the corresponding Ministries of the Union Republics and administer directly only "a definite and limited number" of enterprises according to a list confirmed by the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet. The distinction between the two groups of Ministries of the USSR would seem to be that the former deal with matters of national jurisdiction and importance while the latter deal with questions assigned to the joint jurisdiction of the Union Government and the Governments of the constituent Republics. The distinction is tenuous, and a number of Ministries have been shifted from one group to another. Dr. Munro, while differentiating between them, has aptly said, that in the case of All-Union Ministries the administration is centralised at Moscow whereas in the case of the Union Republican Ministries "the control of administrative work is centralised but the performance of it is to a considerable extent decentralized."

All-Union Ministries. The All-Union Ministries are listed in Article 77; six in all. These Ministries direct those branches of the national life which are of national importance. The jurisdiction of these Ministries extends over the entire country and they operate either directly or through agencies appointed by them. Originally, there were only five All-Union Ministries. The Stalin Constitution provided for eight. In 1942, the Presidium added five more. By 1947 the number reached 36, the old Commissariat of Heavy Industry alone representing about 27 new Ministries. Article 77 of the Constitution as amended on June 17, 1950 fixed their number at thirty. The following Ministries are at present All-Union Ministries:—

1. The Ministry of Foreign Trade;
2. The Ministry of Merchant Marine;
3. The Ministry of Railways;
4. The Ministry of Medium Machine-Building Industry;
5. The Ministry of Power Station Construction;
6. The Ministry of Transport Construction.

The Union Republican Ministries. The Union Republican Ministries "direct the branches of National economy and State administration of All-Union importance which can be managed, and which it is advisable to manage, from the centre through corresponding Union-Republican Ministries of the various Union Republics." The Union-Republican Ministries now make a total of nine as compared with 11 Ministries to the original 10 Union-Republican People's Commissariats of 1936:—

1. The Ministry of Higher and Secondary Special Education;
2. The Ministry of Geological Survey and Conservation of Mineral Resources;
3. The Ministry of Public Health;
4. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs;
5. The Ministry of Culture;
6. The Ministry of Defence;
7. The Ministry of Communications;
8. The Ministry of Agriculture;
9. The Ministry of Finance.

The Ministry of Defence and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs were transferred from the All-Union group to the Union-Republican group in 1944, when the Union Republics were given the right to enter into direct relations with foreign States, to conclude agreements, exchange diplomatic representatives and to have their own military formations.

Advisory and Planning Boards. Besides these Ministries there are innumerable advisory bodies. Some of the Ministries have special Advisory Boards and in many instances their functions are more than advisory. Important among these are the Council of Labour and Defence, the State Planning Commission, the Committee on the Higher Education, the Committee on Arts, etc. The "Gosplan" or the State Planning Commission is the nucleus of the planned economy of Russia. But decisions about planning are really made by the Party Politburo. The function of the Gosplan, as an expert body, is to apply those decisions and to fill in the details in order "to prevent disproportions in the economic development."

CHAPTER VII

THE JUDICIARY

The Soviet Concept of Law. The Soviet concept of law is intimately associated with the idea of the nature of the State. According to Marx, the State is a coercive machinery designed to establish and uphold a particular type of social organisation. He, accordingly, considered that within the framework of the capitalist State, the law is only the tool of the State to maintain and safeguard the interests of the capitalist class, a dominant group in society. The law of the bourgeois State, declares the Communist Manifesto, "is but the will of your class made into law for all, a will whose essential character and direction are determined by the economic conditions of existence of your class."

Both Marx and Engels were equally critical of the way in which laws were administered in bourgeois States. Equality before law, the most applauded dogma of bourgeois jurisprudence, they declared, was really a cloak of inequality. For, in a capitalist society the masses have not the means to foot the expenses of legal proceedings. Moreover, the judges are predisposed to the interests of property and the law on which they base their judgments is designed to protect the interests of the dominant group. "Marxism-Leninism," writes Vyshinsky, "gives a clear definition (the only scientific definition) of the essence of law. It teaches that relationship (and, consequently, law itself) are rooted in the material conditions of life, and that law is merely the will of the dominant class elevated into a statute."

The Soviet jurisprudence, therefore, does not accept the view that law is the reflection of the principles of universal justice divorced from the economic and social structure of the State. It is, on the other hand, merely an expression of the will of the State, an expression of the material form of life in that State, and in a class society it is the will of the ruling class. In a Socialist State, the workers are the ruling class and, thus, law must be the safeguard of the proletarian State against the enemies of Socialism and a tool for the construction of a socialist society. When the State ultimately 'withers away', law, too, would disappear. But until the State 'withers away', "the strengthening and intensification" of Soviet law is necessary for the destruction of capitalism and construction of the socialist society. It is an instrument of policy of the dictatorship of the proletariat. To put it in the words of Lenin, "Law is a political measure, law is politics." Equality before law, impartiality, due process of law, and similar embellishments of the bourgeois types of law are of secondary consideration. The standards of justice are determined by the results to be achieved. Law, as such, according to the Soviet concept, is always an instrument of policy to further the aims of Socialist revolution and it has no place for any concept of "natural law" or law as a defence of the individual against the State.

Purpose of Soviet Judiciary. The general purpose of the Soviet Court will be clear from the Soviet concept of law. The Law of August 1938, which introduced important changes in the system of the law courts and redefined the powers of the legal officers, says that it is the duty of the Soviet Courts "to educate the citizens of the USSR in a spirit of devotion to the fatherland (rodina) and to the cause of Socialism, in the spirit of an exact and unflinching performance of Soviet laws, careful attitude towards Socialist property, labour discipline, honest fulfilment of State and public duties, respect towards the rules of the Commonwealth." The primary function of the Soviet Courts is, therefore, "the protection of the social and State system of the USSR, i.e., the protection of public, socialist property, of socialist economy." While analysing the need of the Soviet Courts, Lenin and Stalin emphasised the necessity of fighting the enemies of Socialism—the enemies of the people, traitors to the country, spies, saboteurs, and wreckers—and to fight for the "consolidation of the new Soviet system to firmly anchor the new socialist discipline among the working people." The Soviet Courts are, accordingly, enjoined by law to severely punish embezzlers of State and co-operative or collective farm property, violators of labour and State discipline, and other offenders like speculators, bandits and rowdies whose actions are detrimental to the building of the socialist society, the collective farms and co-operatives and other organizations. In punishing the criminals, the Soviet Courts teach the people "unflinching revolutionary vigilance against agents of foreign powers who are being infiltrated" in the USSR. The Courts are further charged with the duty to instil in the citizens a spirit of strict and unswerving observance of Soviet laws. "They inculcate a sense of obligation to treat Socialist property with care, to discharge duties to the State and the public honestly, in a spirit of devotion to the Soviet motherland and the cause of communism." What Hitler and Mussolini taught to their people, Soviet Courts are required to teach to the citizens of the USSR. The Soviet Judges too have never claimed to be independent of the policy of the Government. In fact, they take pride in the fact that the courts participate directly in the historic venture of the construction of a Communist Society.

Salient Features of the Soviet Judicial System. 1. The Soviet Judiciary is a part of the regular administration like a Ministry of Finance or Agriculture. It does not have even the semblance of a separate and independent branch of government. The administration of justice is carried on by the law courts in co-operation with the Procurator-General or Attorney-General of the USSR. The Procurator-General is the official guardian of the public property and it is his business, and the officials subordinate to him, to investigate all cases of alleged or suspected graft, sabotage, misuse of public properties, and all anti-Soviet crimes. The courts punish the enemies of Socialism with the utmost rigour for consolidating the new Soviet system. Rychkov, Commissar of Justice in 1938, said, "The Judiciary is an important and sharp weapon of the dictatorship of the working class in the cause of strengthening socialist construction and defending the conquest of the October Socialist Revolution. That is why it is the duty of all Judicial officials, all local Party and Soviet organs, properly to organise the organs of the judiciary, to improve their work, to select and advance for the judicial organs, new, honest, and devoted to the cause of socialism, Party and non-Party Bolsheviks."

2. The system of Courts is uniform and equable for all citizens. This means that the Constitution guarantees to all citizens equality before law regardless of nationality, or race, social origin, and occupational status.

3. Though the administration of justice is decentralized, there is, however, a uniform criminal and civil procedure throughout the USSR. Soviet judges are independent and subject only to the law. It implies that no organ of State power, Central or that of the Union Republics, has the right to interfere in the proceedings of a court and influence its decisions. The judges must decide cases strictly in accordance with the Soviet law in operation and based on the evidence in the case. "It must be stated, however," writes the author of USSR 100 Questions and Answers, "that for a certain period these clear and strict requirements of the law were misinterpreted and grossly distorted, resulting in the infliction of considerable harm not alone to individuals but to the country at large."¹ The period, of course, refers to Stalin's time. In his report to the Twentieth Congress Khrushchev observed that Stalin originated the concept of "the enemy of the people" and "this term automatically rendered it unnecessary that the ideological errors of a man or men engaged in a controversy be proven; this term made possible the usage of the most cruel repression, violating all norms of revolutionary legality, against anyone who in any way disagreed with Stalin, against those who were only suspected of hostile intent, against those who had bad reputation." From 1953 onwards the Communist Party and the Soviet Government, writes the author of the Pamphlet referred to above, "have waged a vigorous struggle to eliminate any law violations and to rectify the injustice done."²

4. Article 127 of the Constitution guarantees to every citizen inviolability of person. It is ordered, "No person may be placed under arrest except by a decision of a court or with the sanction of the procurator." All court proceedings are held in public, unless otherwise provided by law, and the accused person is guaranteed the right to defend himself either personally or by a counsel. Only in exceptional cases specified by law, public trial is denied, but in all such cases the Court is presided over by a bench of three judges without any People's Assessors. The judicial proceedings are conducted in the local language and persons not knowing the language are permitted the use of interpreters.

5. All judges are elected for a specific term. The judges of the Supreme Court and Special Courts of the USSR, as well as the Supreme Courts of the various Union and Autonomous Republics are elected by their respective Supreme Soviets for a term of five years. The courts of lesser territorial units are elected for the same term by the Soviets of the Regions and Areas concerned, while the judges of the lowest Courts, the People's Courts, are elected by the inhabitants of their districts for a term of three years.

6. Every Court in the USSR consists of judges and People's Assessors

1. Op. cit., p. 56.

2. Ibid., p. 57.

People's Assessors are lay-judges and not jurors. There are no jurors in the Soviet system. Nor do they resemble to the old institution of assessors in India. The lay-judges are full-fledged judges, but they are temporary members of the bench. Ordinarily, there are two lay-judges and one professional judge (Chairman) in cases involving original jurisdiction, while larger number of judges is the rule in appeal cases. The lay-judges deliberate and decide all questions of both law and fact together with the professional judge. Decisions are reached by majority vote. It means that lay-judges can out-veto the trained Judge. This is in accordance with the principle that ordinary people have a better understanding of the social need.

7. Judges and Assessors are elected in the same manner and for the same term, and both are subject to removal. But while judges serve as regular members of the Court for the term for which they are elected, each Assessor sits for only ten days in a year unless the extension of this period is necessitated by the duration of a case and during this period he receives his average earnings from his place of work. No education or other qualifications are necessary for Judges and Assessors, although as a rule the former are learned.

8. The Judges and Assessors are liable to be removed from office by the process of recall initiated by the same body that elected them. A criminal action against Judges and Assessors of lower courts may be initiated by the district procurator with the approval of the Presidium of the Union Republic concerned. Action against Judges and Assessors of the Supreme Court of the USSR may be initiated by the Procurator-General of the USSR with the sanction of the Union Presidium.

9. Capital punishment in peace time was abolished in the Soviet Union by a decree of the Presidium dated May 26, 1947. The Presidium, however, amended its previous decree on January 13, 1950, "in response to requests from many constituent Republics and other territorial subdivisions," and permitted the application of capital punishment as the supreme penalty in the case of traitors, spies and wreckers. Punishment in criminal cases is sufficiently severe. Black-marketing and embezzlement of public funds are treated as serious offences involving sentences of imprisonment from 10 to 15 years. In case of large-scale embezzlers of Government property the decree of May 6, 1966, now prescribes death penalty.

10. Who the traitors, spies and wreckers are, the Soviet law remains silent. When Soviet concept of law is that it is the expression of the will of the dominant class of the dictatorship of the proletariat, traitors are naturally the persons who are viewed as enemies of the people by the leaders of the ruling Party. This is apparent from the statement of Rychkov, dated August 15, 1938. He declared, "The State demands that all its Courts shall wage an implacable struggle against all the enemies of Socialism....In sweeping away and utterly exterminating the traitorous Trotskyites and Bucharinites, the Courts will be fulfilling their sacred duty towards the country." Every citizen of the Soviet Union risks death if he dares hold an opinion contrary to the established policy of the Communist Party or fails to denounce an enemy of the people or if he openly expresses a desire to leave the Soviet Union. Even the so-called theorists who differed on the principle of "revolutionary legality" were denounced as enemies of the people, wreckers and Trotskyites. And one does not know in the Soviet Union when he may be declared an enemy of the people. Justice is subordinated to political ends.

11. The judicial system of the USSR and the constitutional guarantees may be admirable for non-political cases. But in political cases—cases of State defence against anti-Soviet activities—there is arbitrariness and merciless cruelty. Karpinsky admits that the "verdicts and sentences of the Soviet Courts mercilessly strike down the enemies of Socialism." There is arbitrariness, because political cases come within the jurisdiction of the Political Police of the Ministries of State Security and Internal Affairs. The Political Police possesses the power of "administrative exile without trial," that is, they can send the political suspects to labour camps without any recourse to the courts. When the Political Police is regarded as the "unsheathed sword" of the revolution and when the Constitution prescribes, "Treason to the motherland is punishable with all the severity of law as the most heinous of crimes," the guarantee of the inviolability of person, as provided for in Article 127, becomes a matter of political expediency.

12. The procedure for the enforcement of fundamental rights through writ petitions filed in court by individuals does not obtain in the USSR. This is essentially due to the fact that every Soviet citizen is part of a collective or co-operative body and he can get the larger body to take up his complaint. The individual can lodge his complaint with the procurator and if he finds the complaint genuine and lodges a protest with the appropriate authority and if the matter is not remedied within three months, the procurator communicates with the Supreme Court, which will raise the matter in the Supreme Soviet.

13. Soviet judiciary does not base decisions on precedents, for Soviet theory does not recognise precedents as a source of law. The Soviet theory is that no two cases are exactly alike and for this reason subordinate courts have much discretion in applying law, as declared by the Supreme Soviet, to the cases before them. This may amount to judicial anarchy according to the Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, but it is prevented by the exercise of clarificatory powers by the Supreme Soviet of the USSR.

SYSTEM OF COURTS

The People's Courts. The basic Soviet judicial organ is the People's Court, consisting of a regular Judge and two People's Assessors. Judges of such courts are elected for five years by the voters of the district by a direct secret ballot. People's Assessors are elected for a term of two years. A Judge and an Assessor are subject to recall. The Assessors possess all the judicial powers when the court is sitting and they are paid the same salary as the Judges. The Assessors are summoned by turn for a short space of time, not exceeding two weeks a year, to discharge their court duties.

The jurisdiction of the People's Court extends over criminal and civil cases. But only minor civil and criminal cases are dealt with in these courts. Original jurisdiction in cases of more serious nature is reserved for higher courts including the Supreme Court. Ordinarily, on the criminal side People's Courts try cases relating to assault, rape, robbery, theft, abuse of power or neglect of duty by officials, failure to perform duties imposed by the State, etc. In matters of civil jurisdiction these courts deal with cases involving property rights, violation of labour discipline and disorderly conduct. Violation of labour discipline and disorderly conduct cases are tried summarily.

The Territorial Courts. Above the People's Court are the Territorial, Regional, and Area Courts and Courts of the Autonomous Regions and National Areas. These Courts serve as courts of appeal in cases coming up from the People's Courts of their respective Areas. They also have original jurisdiction in cases involving "Counter-revolutionary activities, crimes against administrative orders when they involve particular danger to the State, pillaging of socialist property, and other important economic crimes." Original jurisdiction on the civil side extends to cases between State and social institutions, enterprises and organizations. The members of these Courts are elected by the Soviets of Working People's Deputies in their respective Areas for a term of five years and are subject to recall.

The Supreme Courts of Autonomous Republics. The next higher court is the Supreme Court of the Autonomous Republic which supervises the judicial activities of all Courts subordinate to it. It tries criminal and civil cases of which it is given jurisdiction by law and hears civil and criminal appeals of courts below it. The Judges of this Court are elected by the Supreme Soviet of the Autonomous Republic and their term is five years.

The Supreme Court of the Union Republic. The highest judicial authority in each Union Republic is its Supreme Court. It supervises all inferior courts in the Republic by examining all protests coming from the Procurator-General or Chairman of the Supreme Court of the USSR or the Procurator or the Chairman of Supreme Court of the Republic. It also examines on appeal judgments and verdicts of Courts which are one step in rank below that of the Supreme Court. It can set aside the decision of any court subordinate to it. It also exercises original jurisdiction in cases of exceptional gravity and in crimes in which the top officials of the Republic may be involved. The Presidium of the USSR, the Procurator, the Ministry of Internal Affairs, and the full court itself may place other cases directly before the Supreme Court of the Republic.

Supreme Court of the USSR. At the apex of the whole judicial system is the Supreme Court of the USSR. It consists of a Chairman, a Vice-Chairman, a large number of Judges, now numbering sixty-eight, and twenty-five People's Assessors, all elected by the Supreme Soviet of the USSR for a term of five years. The Court is organised in five divisions or panels, for criminal, civil, military, railroad transport, and water transport. The Chairman of the Supreme Court may preside over any case in any of the divisions. He may also remove any case from any court of the USSR and submit a protest about it to a full session of the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court of the USSR is primarily a Court of Appeal and review, but it also has original jurisdiction in criminal and civil cases of All-Union importance. Its judgments are final and have the force of law. Its entire plenum meets not less than once every two months in order to examine protests against acts of inferior courts and to issue instructions concerning general court practices and procedure for ensuring uniformity throughout the country.

Apart from the extraordinary original jurisdiction, the revisional and supervisory powers, the Supreme Court also exercises clarificatory powers. For purposes of clarifying or interpreting the law, the Supreme Court is assisted not only by the Judges of the Supreme Court of the USSR but also by Chief Justices of the 15 Supreme Courts of the Union Republics and Autonomous Republics. It can invoke the assistance of the distinguished lawyers to sit with it when it is clarifying the law. The Court holds plenary sessions and its clarifications and instructions have in fact a binding character on all courts subordinate to it.

Special Courts. Military Tribunals and Line Courts for the Railway and Water Transport systems are attached to the Soviet Army and Navy, and to the Railway and Water Transport services. These Special Courts are subordinate to the Supreme Court of the USSR which acts as a court of appeal for them. The need of the special Military Tribunals arises from the necessity of strengthening the military might of the USSR and military discipline. The Special Line Courts are necessitated by the special conditions prevailing on the Railways and in the Water Transport system. During World War II Line Courts were transformed into Military Tribunals. The jurisdiction of the Special Courts depends on the nature of the crime as well as the status of the accused. Thus, military tribunals may also try civilians in certain cases. The judges of the Special Courts are elected by the Supreme Soviet for five years.

THE PROCURATOR-GENERAL

The Office of the Procurator-General. The office of the Procurator-General may be compared with the Attorney-General in other countries. But it is not really so. The Procurator-General enjoys a unique position in the judicial machinery of the USSR. Created by the Constitution, the powers of the Procurator-General are so extensive, his authority so pervasive, and his secret organisation so ubiquitous that he constitutes an integral organ of the State power. The need for establishing this "special" organ of the State can best be explained in terms of the provisions of the Constitution. Article 113 says, "Supreme supervisory power to ensure the strict observance of the law by all Ministries and institutions subordinated to them, as well as by officials and citizens of the USSR generally, is vested in the Procurator-General of the USSR." This means that the purpose of establishing the office of the Procurator-General is to exercise supervisory powers in order to ensure the correct application and strict execution of the Soviet law by all Ministries and other agencies subordinate to them, as well as by all officials and citizens of the USSR. A more matter of fact interpretation of this Article comes from Karpinsky. He writes, "There are cases when the acts or decisions of local organs of power or administration are at variance with the law, or when laws are incorrectly understood and applied. Then, there are direct, deliberate violations of the law by official persons. It also happens occasionally that persons who are really enemies of the people worm their way in the Soviet institutions and enterprises and make use of their official positions for the purpose of distorting the law and delaying its application, that is, commit sabotage against the Soviet State." It is the duty of the Procurator-General to detect such spies and wreckers and bring them to book. "The Soviet prosecutor officer," writes Vyshinsky, who held the Office of Procurator-General in the late 1930's "is the watchman of the Socialist legality, the leader of the policy of the Communist Party and of Soviet authority, the champion of Socialism."

In the due performance of this supervisory function and in order to ensure the strict observance of the Soviet law the Procurator-General organises volunteer "groups of aid" presumably in all institutions. He arms them with necessary instructions and keeps constantly in touch with them. It is emphasised that the Procurator-General can successfully perform his duties only "if he has such a body of 'activists' on whom to rely." Each 'group of aid' has its own 'brigade leader' and the volunteers meet regularly and work under his inspiration. The work of the groups is simply to 'signal' cases to the Procurator-General's office and then begins regular official investigation. Vyshinsky writes, "All organs of the Soviet community, the Young Communist League, and trade unions, worker correspondents and peasant correspondents, and so on, take an active part in the work of the Soviet Prosecutor's office in its struggle to strengthen socialist legality." An official survey about the 'signals' of the 'groups of aid' disclosed that only 10 per cent of the signals proved false.

Functions of the Procurator-General. The work of the Procurator General and his office is closely associated with the Courts. Being the official guardian of the public property, it is his business to investigate all cases of alleged or suspected graft, sabotage, misuse of public properties, and a long list of other crimes held as anti-Soviet. He also protects the personal rights of the citizens and safeguards the inviolability of their persons. Any citizen of the USSR may file a complaint with the Procurator-General against any institution or official violating the law, or a petition seeking protection for his legal rights and interests. Article 127 of the Constitution reads, "citizens of the USSR are guaranteed inviolability of the person. No person may be placed under arrest except by decision of a court or with the sanction of a Procurator." It is both the right and duty of the Procurator to appeal against all unlawful decisions and actions of the State departments and their officers. On receipt of a complaint, the Procurator carries out on-the-spot inspection and if it is an executive action, which is illegal, he lodges his protest. As soon as he lodges the protest, the executive act must immediately be stayed and within a period of three months the matter must be remedied, otherwise he will communicate with the Supreme Court, which will raise the matter with the Supreme Soviet.

The Procurator-General causes the criminal cases to be investigated, ascertain the circumstances under which the crime was investigated, collect the necessary evidence, both oral and documentary, and then institute regular criminal proceedings against the accused person or persons and their accomplices. It is also his duty to see that other investigating bodies do not exercise their authority in excess of that conferred upon them by law. When the Court is trying a case, the Procurator maintains the prosecution before the Court in the name of the Soviet State. At the conclusion of the trial the Court hands over its verdict and sentence to the Procurator and he examines them as to their correctness. If in his opinion the sentence or judgment is wrong, he prefers an appeal otherwise he attends to its execution.

In short, the Procurator-General's office stands guard over socialist legality. Like Courts in the USSR "it strengthens Soviet legality, Soviet Socialist law and order." The powers of the Procurator-General, particularly his supervisory powers to ensure the strict observance of the law by all Ministries and institutions subordinate to them, as well as by officials and citizens of the USSR, are greater than that vested in the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court of the USSR supervises only the judicial activities of the subordinate Courts.

Mode of Appointment and Organisation of the Office. The powers of the Procurator-General, who heads the Procurator's offices, are, indeed, extensive and all-embracing, and the Constitution is at pains to make him independent of the departments he is intended to check up. He is appointed for a term of seven years by the Supreme Soviet of the USSR and is responsible to that body alone. Even the Council of Ministers has no control upon him. The independence of the Procurator-General does not, of course, mean that he is independent of the Communist Party and its Politburo.

As the jurisdiction of the Procurator-General extends throughout the Union, it is necessary that he should have his subordinates appointed in all parts of the country to ensure the correct application and strict observance of law. He appoints, accordingly, Procurators in the constituent Republics, and their sub-divisions for a term of five years. Area, Regional and City Procurators are appointed by the Procurators of the Union Republics, subject to confirmation by the Procurator-General. The Procurator-General also appoints the chief Procurators in charge of the special organs of the Procurator's office of military, railway, and water transport.

The Procurator's office is, thus, a highly centralised body and its members function independently of all local organs of authority. They are appointed by the Procurator-General and are responsible to him alone. Karpinsky justifies the centralised nature of the Procurator's office in these words: "In order to cope with his task successfully (the uniform and correct application of Soviet laws throughout the Union) Procurators must be free to carry on their work independently of all local bodies whatsoever, must be subordinate only to the Procurator-General of the USSR. This is the reason why under-Procurators are appointed centrally and not elected."

CHAPTER VIII

REGIONAL GOVERNMENT

Units of the Federation. As said earlier, the first concern of the newly established Revolutionary Government in November, 1917, was to weld the diverse people of Russia in a unified nation. It was keenly felt that a powerful Soviet State could not be built with scores of nationalities in perpetual hostility to one another. To satisfy the political aspirations of all these nationalities and, at the same time, to develop national feelings of oneness in the outlook and sentiments of such a heterogeneous people, Lenin and his Bolshevik Party conceived of Federal Soviet State with maximum of autonomy to the constituent units. Perhaps it was a concession to the races and nationalities of Russia to accept and submit to the new economic and social order. Anyway, four forms of national State structure were evolved: Union Republics, Autonomous Republics, Autonomous Regions, and National Areas. The diversified pattern of statehood in the USSR takes cognisance of the special features and interests of each nationality and accedes to it the maximum of "creative initiative" in its economic and cultural development. How far chances for the utilization of "creative initiative" are obtainable under a system of planned economy and regimented mode of life and opinion, may be left to their natural conclusions. All the same, each of these forms of State structure is a component part of the multi-national State of the USSR.

Soviet Socialist Republic. The USSR today consists of fifteen constituent Republics. Each Union Republic, irrespective of the people that form it, the size of its territory, and its economic resources, stands on equality of rights with others, with its own Constitution, its own supreme legislative organ, its own highest executive and administrative organ, and its own judicial system. Each Union Republic preserves its identity and so far as the Fundamental Law permits, it retains its "sovereignty." Within its jurisdiction of administration each Republic exercises its authority independently. Article 15 of the Constitution provides that "the USSR protects the Sovereign Rights of the Union Republic." To every Union Republic is reserved the right to secede. The territorial integrity of a Union Republic is also fully guaranteed and no alteration in its boundaries can be made without its free consent. The Constitution grants to each Republic the right to have its own troops, the right to enter into direct relations with foreign States, to conclude agreements, and exchange diplomatic and consular representatives with them. But, as we have seen, all the "sovereign" rights of the constituent Republics are hedged by innumerable limitations and the hold of Moscow on every subject of administration is considerably tight.

Administrative Structure of the Union Republic. The Supreme Soviet of the Union Republic is its sole legislative organ and all Republican laws emanate from it. Some of its other important functions are:

(1) It adopts and amends the Constitution of the Republic. All amendments must be in conformity with the specific features of the Republic itself, and in full conformity with the Constitution of the USSR.

(2) It confirms the Constitutions of the Autonomous Republics forming part of the Union Republic and defines the boundaries of their territories.

(3) It approves the national economic plan and the budget of the Republic.

(4) It grants amnesty and pardon to persons convicted by judicial courts of the Union Republic.

(5) Decides questions of representation of the Union Republic in the international relations.

(6) Determines the manner of organising the Republic's military formations.

The Presidium. In between its sessions the work of the Supreme Soviet is carried on by the Presidium of the Union Republic. The Union Republic Presidium is, accordingly, an agency of the Supreme Soviet elected by itself from its own members for a period of four years. It generally consists of 11 to 17 members. The Constitution simply specifies that "the Supreme Soviet of a Union Republic elects Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Union Republic consisting of a Chairman of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Union Republic, Vice-Chairman, a Secretary of the Presidium and members of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the Union Republic (Article 61). The powers of the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet of a Union Republic are defined by the Constitution of the Union Republic.

The Council of Ministers. The Council of Ministers is appointed by the Supreme Soviet of the Republic and it is the highest executive and administrative organ of State power in the Republic. The Council of Ministers is responsible and accountable to the Supreme Soviet of the Republic or in the intervals between sessions of the Supreme Soviet to the Presidium of the Union Republic. The decisions and orders of the Council of Ministers must be consistent with the laws of the USSR and the Union Republic. Article 81 of the Constitution further prescribes that the Council of Ministers of a Republic must carry out the decisions and orders of the Council of Ministers of the USSR. The Council of Ministers of the USSR are also authorised to verify that their orders are duly executed by the Council of Ministers of the Republic.

The Council of Ministers of a Union Republic, on its part, possesses the right to suspend decisions and orders of the Council of Ministers of the Autonomous Republics. It has also the power to veto decisions and orders of the Executive Committees of the Soviet of the Working People's Deputies of its Territories, Regions, and Autonomous Regions.

The Ministries of the Union Republic are organised into Union Republican Ministries; and Republican Ministries. The Union Republican Ministry directs the branch of State administration entrusted to it, and is subordinate both to the Council of Ministers of the USSR and to the corresponding Union-Republican Ministry. A Republican Ministry directs the branch of the State administration entrusted to it and is directly subordinate to the Council of Ministers of the Union Republic.

Autonomous Republic. The Stalin Constitution guarantees to each nationality the fullest opportunity for its all-round development. It is in pursuance of this guarantee that the Constitution has created smaller territorial divisions of administration and they are integral parts of the State structure of the USSR. An Autonomous Republic is the first of its kind. Certain localities within the territorial limits of a Union Republic may be inhabited mainly by nationalities other than that of the basic population of the Republic, possessing distinctive national traits of their own. If such nationalities, who constitute the minorities within the Republic, voluntarily decide to set up autonomous administration of their own, they form Autonomous Republics. Each Autonomous Republic carries the name of the nationality that founded it. For example, the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic (RSFSR) includes 12 Autonomous Republics, and the Georgian Union Republic has only two. The Uzbek and Azerbaijan Union Republics include one each.

Though it forms a part of the Union Republic, each Autonomous Republic exercises independent State power within its territory. It means self-government for each Autonomous Republic with regard to all subjects concerning its domestic affairs. The business of the State is transacted in the language of the people of the Autonomous Republic. Each Autonomous Republic frames its own Constitution subject to the approval of the Supreme Soviet of the Union Republic of which it forms a part. It must be in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the USSR, and to the Union Republic concerned. The arms and flags remain the same as those of the Union Republic with the addition of its own name.

An Autonomous Republic makes its own laws on the subjects assigned to its jurisdiction. But, at the same time, the laws of the USSR and the laws of its Union Republic are also binding within the Autonomous Republic. Each Autonomous Republic has its own citizenship. Every citizen, however, is a citizen of the Union Republic to which he belongs and of the USSR. It means three citizenships for the nationals of the USSR.

The pattern of the administration in Autonomous Republics closely corresponds to that of the Union Republic. The highest organ of State power is the Supreme Soviet elected for a term of four years. It elects the Presidium and appoints a Council of Ministers. The decisions and orders of the Council of Ministers can be suspended by the Council of its Union Republic.

Autonomous Region. Some part of a Union Republic may be inhabited by a small number of the people, say a few thousand, who may like to be governed by themselves and, thus, keep their identity. The voluntary Union formed as such is called an Autonomous Region and carries the name of the people that constitute the Region.

The national organ of State power in an Autonomous Region is the Soviet of the Working People's Deputies. The Soviet of the Working People's Deputies enjoys the constitutional right of self-government on its territory. Its primary functions are: to ensure the maintenance of public order, due observance of laws, protection of the rights of the citizens, and direction of the local economic and cultural affairs. The Soviet is also authorised to issue orders as required and permitted by the laws of the USSR and the Union Republic.

The Soviet of the Working People's Deputies elects its own Executive Committee consisting of a Chairman, Vice-Chairman, a Secretary and members. The Executive Committee is responsible to the Regional Soviet. The powers of the Regional Soviet and its Executive Committee are determined by a special ordinance approved by the Supreme Soviet of the Union Republic. The Council of Ministers of the Union Republic can annul decisions and orders of the Executive Committee.

National Area. A National Area constitutes a part of the Autonomous Region and is formed by the voluntary consent of the numerically small Soviet people. A nationality which forms a National Area enjoys the right of self-government in its internal affairs.

Each National Area has its Area Soviet of the Working People's Deputies and its Executive Committee. The powers of both these organs are defined in an ordinance and approved by the Supreme Soviet of the Union Republic of which it forms a component part. The orders and decisions of the Area Executive Committee can be annulled by the Council of Ministers of the Union Republic.

CHAPTER IX

THE COMMUNIST PARTY

Leading and Directing Force. The Communist Party is the main-spring of the Soviet regime. Its pivotal and monopoly position is both a political and legal truth. "Here in the Soviet Union, in the land of the dictatorship of the Proletariat," said Stalin, "the fact that not a single important political or organizational question is decided by our Soviet and other mass organizations without directions from the party must be regarded as the highest expression of the leading role of party." The Soviet system permits of only one party and Article 126 of the Stalin Constitution states that "The most active and politically conscious citizens in the ranks of the working class and other sections of the working people unite in the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (Bolsheviks), which is the vanguard of the working people in the struggle to strengthen and develop the socialist system, and is the leading core of all organizations of the working people, both public and State." The Communist Party is also the only political organization listed in Article 141 as having the right to participate in Soviet elections. Both these constitutional provisions give to the Party "a ruling position" in the Soviet Government and positive leadership in all other organizations. The Constitution, of course, permits the existence of other organizations and societies—trade unions, co-operative societies, youth organizations, cultural, technical, and scientific societies—but all such organizations and societies are of non-political character. They are organized to promote the interests of common welfare and material advancement towards the realization of the socialistic goal of society. The justification of having one-party system in the USSR may, again, be explained in the words of Stalin. He said, "We have no contending parties any more than we have a capitalist class contending against a working class which is exploited by capitalists. Our society consists exclusively of free Toilers of town and country workers, peasants and intellectuals. Each of these strata may have its special interests and express them by means of the numerous public organizations that exist. But since there are no classes, since the dividing lines between classes have been obliterated, since only a slight but not a fundamental difference between various strata in socialist society has remained, there can be no soil for the creation of contending parties, for a party is a part of a class." The Communist Party being the vanguard of the proletariat, consisting of the most active and politically conscious citizens, as a rule, it is closely connected with all the non-Party organizations and its members are the real force behind them.

Andrei Vyshinsky writing about the Communist Party says, "The political basis of the USSR comprises—as the most important principle of the working class dictatorship—the leading and directing role of the Communist Party in all fields of economic, social and cultural activity." The leading and directing force of the Party may be examined with reference to the Preamble of the Party Charter as amended by the Eighteenth Congress and adopted on March 20, 1939. The Preamble reads: "The Communist Party of the Soviet Union (Bolsheviks), as a section of the Communist International, is the organized vanguard of the working class of the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics, the highest form of its class organization. In its activities the party is guided by the theory of Marxism-Leninism. The Party exercises the leadership of the working class, the peasantry, the intelligentsia, of the entire Soviet people, in the struggle for the consolidation of the dictatorship of the working class, for the consolidation and development of the socialist system, for the victory of Communism. The party is the guiding nucleus of all organizations of the working people, both public and State, and ensures the successful construction of the Communist society."

So extensive is the role of the Communist Party that it is often with difficulty distinguished from the role of the Soviet Government. Being the legally recognised and the only political party in the country which leads the Soviet people in their struggle for the strengthening of the proletarian dictatorship and development of the socialist order, it is the ultimate source of power. All important decisions on governmental policy are made at Party conventions, its committees and bureaus, especially the Party Politburo. The Government simply ratifies them. "The workers themselves," said Lenin, "do not know as yet how to rule and would first have to go through years of schooling. Hence, in order to rule, an army of revolutionaries—Communists hardened in battle—is necessary. We have such, it is Party." There cannot be any conflict of authority and opinion between the Party and the Government, because both are indissolubly joined by the reason of their membership, especially at the higher levels. No position of any significance can be obtained without membership of the Party. Only the most rigorous tests will admit a new member, and even after admission he must be devoted to the "party line" or face a purge. "The party is a united militant organization bound together by a conscious discipline which is equally binding on all its members,"—thus, runs the Preamble of the Party Charter and it further adds that the Party is "strong because of its solidarity, unity of will and unity of action, which are incompatible with any deviation from its programme and rules, with any violation of party discipline, with factional groupings, or with double dealing." The Party purges its ranks of persons who violate its programme, rules or discipline. The Party, in short, is a government inside the Government and the centre of gravitation in the Soviet Union. The dictatorship of the Proletariat is in effect the dictatorship of the Communist Party. To quote Samuel Harper, "Thus while officially it is the Government and not the Party that makes the laws, runs the State, administers industry and controls the army, it is also, though unofficially, the Party which does all these things and, in a certain sense, is even primarily responsible for them."

How does the Party guide the Soviet State and the People? If the Communist Party is the guiding and the directing force of the Soviet State, the leading force of the Soviet Society, then, the important question

Is how does it guide the Soviet State and the people? This has been answered in the preceding paragraphs and requires only summing up now. The Party determines the political line to be followed in respect of major questions of foreign and home policy. It thoroughly studies the state of the national economy—industry, transport and agriculture—problems of development of science and culture, studies the experience of the foremost people, and brings shortcomings to the surface, and on the basis of these studies the Party gives directives on particular questions of Communist construction. The directives are taken up by the USSR Supreme Soviet and after approval, ipso facto, become law. "The Communist Party," observes the author of USSR 100 Questions and Answers, "has guided Soviet Society successfully, leading the country along the path of progress year after year. It adheres to the Leninist principle of collective leadership of the country, which means that all of the Party's decisions on the affairs of the Soviet State are decided by Party leaders not individually, but collectively after thorough discussion by Party Congress, plenary sessions of the Central Committee, or the Presidium of the Central Committee. Collective leadership ensures correct decisions on problems of policy, economy and culture."¹

Strength of the Party. The strength of the Communist Party, it is claimed, lies in the fact that the people and the Party have the one and the same goal, to build Communist Society. "That is why all members of the Soviet Society support and follow the policy of the Party, regarding it as their own." The Communist Party being armed with advanced Marxist-Leninist Theory learns to know the laws of development of society, foresees the course of events, and directs them in the interests of the working people, "to outline and carry through the correct policy."

The strength of the Communist Party, it is further asserted, lies in the unity and solidarity of its "ranks, its millions of like-minded people." Lenin had very often repeated that every member of the Party was responsible for the Party, and the Party was responsible for every member. And finally, the strength of the Communist Party lies in its inseparable ties with the people. "It is a truly People's Party, for it is made up of society's best people—foremost workers, peasants and professionals—and serves the people only."²

The Monolithic Party and "Democratic Centralism." The Communist Party is, thus, a single, unified, and centralised structure, a "monolith." Only one will, one direction, must prevail. The Party demands of all its members unanimity of views, the strictest discipline, and requires that all its decisions must be carried out "unconditionally, precisely and punctually." It allows and tolerates no factionalism and purges its ranks of persons who may be suspected of slightest deviation from the proletarian discipline. Communist Party, therefore, is a compact and highly integrated body consisting of unflinching supporters of the Marxist-Leninist theory. The rules of the Communist Party of 1934 and 1939 speak of "coherence, unity of will and unity of action." A resolution of the Congress of the Communist Party of January 17, 1952 speaks of the need for

1. Op. cit., p. 126.

2. Ibid.

"monolithism." And it is, indeed, so. According to Zinoviev, "We need a monolithism that is a thousand times greater than the one up to now. We cannot allow ourselves to go so far as to permit the freedom of actions or even the freedom of groupings."

At the same time, the Communist Party takes pride in what has been called "democratic centralism." The evolution of this principle has been a stormy one. Originally, some party members felt that the central party should leave to local organizations the maximum of autonomy and should not interfere in their work except for reports of general progress. But Lenin took a strong stand against this point of view. He argued that such kind of autonomy might permit general interests to be dragged into a local situation. He asserted that the central committee of the Party has the right to intervene in the local affairs and even against local interests if furtherance of general party objectives demanded so. Lenin's view prevailed and the rule of centralized authority became clearly established. The Party Congress of 1919 made the position clear when it insisted on a single centralized Communist Party with a single Central Committee to which all provincial party organizations should be completely subordinate. The Party statutes of 1952, which preserve in identical terms those of 1934 and 1939, explain what Lenin had actually intended and named by his successors "democratic centralism." Statute 21 reads:

"The guiding principle of organizational structure of the Party is democratic centralism, meaning:

- (a) Election of all Party governing bodies from bottom to top.
- (b) Periodic accountability of Party bodies to their Party organizations.
- (c) Strict Party discipline and subordination of the minority to the majority.
- (d) The decisions of the higher bodies are unconditionally binding upon lower ones."

Statute 22. "The party structure rests on a territorial production basis: the Party organization serving any given area to all-Party organizations serving parts of this area and a Party organization serving an entire branch of production is regarded as superior to all-Party organizations serving sections of this branch of production."

Statute 23. "All-Party organizations are autonomous in deciding local questions, provided that the decisions are not contrary to the party's decisions."

Democratic centralism, therefore, implies a combination between the principle of mass participation at the bottom and the concentration of leadership at the top. The primary organs elect delegates to the city or district conference of the party. Above the city or district conference are the organizations for the Areas, Regions, Territories, and Union Republics. They in turn elect delegates to the All-Union Congress of the Party on the basis of one delegate per 1,000 members. Thus, all the leading bodies of the Party, from the lowest to the highest, are elected by Party members by secret vote.

Democratic centralism also envisages periodical accounts to be rendered by the Party bodies to the Party organizations, which elected them. The old rule of the Party provided the Congress to meet every three years and oftener, though from 1939 down to October 1952 no meetings whatever were held. The new rules call for a meeting at least every four years. The Congress hears the reports of its Central Committee, adopts the Party statutes and elects the Central Committee. The Central Committee is now required to meet at least twice a year and operates through four executive Committees with the Politburo of the Central Committee at the top.

Democratic centralism, accordingly, signifies strict Party discipline which is equally compulsory for all Communists, irrespective of their offices, and also subordination of the minority to the majority. One of the most important principles of democratic centralism is that the decisions of the higher Party bodies are unconditionally obligatory for all the lower bodies. This organizational structure of the Party ensures its solidarity and monolithic nature, "promotes purposeful, principled and efficient decisions on questions concerning the structure of the Party and the guidance of the life of the country."

Democratic centralism also attaches great importance to "inner-Party democracy," which establishes the rights and duties of the members in relation to the Party. The Party charter says that a member of the Party has the right:

- (a) To take part in free and business-like discussion at Party meetings and in the Party press, of matters of Party policy.
- (b) To criticize any Party functionary at Party meetings.
- (c) To elect or be elected to Party bodies.
- (d) To insist on personal participation in all cases when decisions are adopted concerning his activities or behaviour.
- (e) To address any questions or statements to any Party body at any level, right up to the Central Committee of the Communist Party or the Soviet Union.

It follows that the Party Charter concedes to every member of the Party the inalienable right of free and business-like discussion of questions of party policy in individual organizations or in the Party as a whole. But the official theory of democratic centralism permits freedom of discussion within the Party until a policy is adopted, and absolute obedience to the policy once it has been adopted. This has been declared to be the very foundation of "Bolshevik self-criticism" and "conscious discipline." Thus, under the rules, a member may say what he thinks wise, but subject to restrictions as to the manner in which he says it. The rules provide that extensive discussion especially on the all Union scale of party policy must be so organised that it cannot lead to attempts by any insignificant minority to impose its will over the vast majority of the party, or to attempt factional groupings. The Communist Party plainly forbids formation of minority blocks as it is tantamount to factionalism and to be guilty of factionalism is a serious breach of discipline and of the principle of Party unity. Lenin wrote in 1906 that democratic centralism involves "freedom of criticism so long as unity in a specific action is not destroyed thereby—and the inadmissibility of any criticism whatever which undermines or makes difficult unity of any action decided on by the Party." This aspect has been explained by V. Moskovsky thus, "we, Communists, have one world outlook, and we do not argue about the correctness of the general line of our Party, which is based on the Party Programme. We argue about questions of everyday policy and practical work, discuss how best and soonest to accomplish what the general line calls for. These debates are sometimes heated. Sometimes they take the form of a Party discussion in the press. In the course of this discussion every Communist freely expresses his viewpoint. But once the discussion is closed, once all the pros and cons have been expressed and a decision taken, the Communists unitedly carry out the decision of the majority. And if any of the minority do not submit to the decision of the majority, they are given a decisive rebuff, reinforced by the authority of the whole Party."

Party discipline is a frontal attack on intra-party democracy. The Communist Party is a closed party. Only those who are willing to accept the Party programme, work in a party organization, submit to Party decisions, and pay dues may be considered for membership. The preamble to the Party Charter defines Party work in these terms: "The party demands from its members active and self-sacrificing work in carrying out its programme and rules, in fulfilling all decisions of the Party and its bodies, and in ensuring the unity of its ranks and the consolidation of fraternal international relations among the working people of the nationalities of the USSR as well as with the proletarians of all countries of the world." To attack "the Party line" is the gravest offence in the USSR and amounts to "deviationism."

Another element of intra-party democracy is that all organs of the party are elected. It is true that all bodies are representative bodies. But this is also true that elections in all spheres of political life of the USSR are just a formality. There is not a single instance in the history of Soviet Russia when rival candidates have contested for office. There may be discussions preceding the personal elections when qualifications of the candidates are considered, but elections present one-candidate list. And discussions about the fitness of the candidate are always at the lower level. The higher the level the more important the office and the more evident is the will of the leader which is never disobeyed.

The accountability of the Party bodies to their respective organizations had till Stalin's death a purely theoretical concept of intra-party democracy. Meetings of the Party Congresses and Conferences had become more irregular and infrequent, despite the provision of the Party rules which demanded periodic conferences at stated intervals. There was no meeting of the Congress from 1939 down to October 1952 and the conference did not meet between 1941 and 1953. Nor could it be possible to think under such circumstances, that any official of the Party or its Committees could be removed or dissolved unless men at the top willed it.

Thus, in practice, Party unity and discipline have two results: (1) to eliminate the influence of the rank and file on major policy decisions; and (2) to concentrate policy-making in the hands of a small and virtually permanent group, the Politburo, up to 1952 of the Central Committee. That was the conception of the "monolithic" party first enunciated by Stalin in 1924 in the struggle against Trotsky and it had remained since then the guiding principle of the Party. Even Lenin's assertion that there could be criticism of major ideas and policies by the Party colleagues could not remain a matter of reality. This is self-evident from what Stalin said at the Twelfth Congress of the Party in his reply to the arguments of Lutovinov, "He (Lutovinov)," said Stalin, "wants real democracy, that all, at least the most important questions should be discussed in all the cells from bottom up, that the whole party should be going on every question and should take part in the consideration of the question. But comrades... with all such arrangements our party will be transformed into a discussion club jobbering and never deciding (people), while our party must, above all, be an acting one, because we are in power."

Intra-party democracy is, therefore, a political myth like various others and the monolithic party has achieved in theory and practice its logical apex in the Soviet Union. It follows, then, that policy is determined at the top and it always emanates therefrom; there is absolute concentration of power at the top. This is what centralism means. The Politburo of the Central Committee, dictates the policy of the Party and that of the State. But who dictated the policy in the Politburo? He was, no doubt, Stalin. From 1939 onwards and till his death unprecedented praise, no matter what occasion or the subject of address, had been showered on Stalin. Zhadnov, who until his death in 1948 was frequently mentioned as a possible successor to Stalin, typically shouted in the course of his speech, "Long live the genius, the brain, the heart of the Bolshevik Party, of the whole Soviet people, of the whole progressive and advanced humanity—our Stalin." Beria, the head of the Political Police, and afterwards accused of treason and consequently shot dead on December 23, 1953, described him: "that greatest genius of mankind." Khrushchev, a Politburo member and the First Secretary of the Party and Prime Minister till October 16, 1964, hailed him as "the towering genius of humanity." He was the "miracle-performing hero," as Khrushchev characterised Stalin at the 20th Congress, who really formulated the policy during his lifetime. Discussion and criticism vanishes in the presence of such an august personality.

Stalin today stands strikingly repudiated and he has been mercilessly condemned for the Stalin cult or the cult of personality which was spread prior to the 19th Congress. He has been vehemently accused of exaggerated centralism, suppression of initiative of workers, and flagrant violation of the principle of collective leadership and intra-party democracy. At the end of his speech at the 20th Congress Khrushchev significantly declared: "The Central Committee adopted measures for wide-scale enlightenment on the Marxist-Leninist position of the role of personality in history. The Central Committee resolutely opposes the cult of personality alien to the spirit of Marxism-Leninism, which turns one or another leader into a miracle-performing hero and, at the same time, minimises the role of the party and the popular masses." Khrushchev refrained from mentioning names, but his reference to "miracle-performing hero" was self-evident and it could be none other than Stalin. The Central Committee, giving an account of its work to the 22nd Congress, reported on the great work carried out by the Party in eradicating the harmful consequences of the personality cult, developing inner-Party democracy in conformity with the spirit of Leninism, restoring revolutionary legality, and developing Soviet democracy. It was admitted that the implementation of the policy of the 20th Congress was accompanied "with a sharp political struggle against the anti-Party actional grouping, zealous supporters of the personality cult, who tried to lead the Party and the country astray from the Leninist Road."³ The Central Committee, indeed, did everything to fully erase the consequences of the personality cult and exclude any possibility "of a repetition of mistakes and distortions of this kind in the future."

But what happened to Khrushchev himself? The weapons he used and the accusations he levelled against Stalin have now been directed against him. He has been accused of personality cult and is charged with "hair-brained scheming, immature conclusions and hasty decisions and actions divorced from reality, bragging and phrase-mongering commandism and unwillingness to take into account the achievements of science and practical experience."

But will the emphasis, which is currently being laid by Soviet leaders on collective leadership, and intra-party democracy, help to bring about more initiative and assertiveness in the Party members and eliminate centralism? Khrushchev made it clear that deviations from Party lines would not be tolerated. There is a limit to "criticism and self-criticism." He said, "While criticising shortcomings and errors... We must primarily see to it that this criticism strengthens the Soviet system, and helps us to advance still more swiftly and successfully towards our great goal—communism. The enemies hope that we shall slacken our vigilance, that we shall weaken our organs of state security. No, this will never come to pass. The proletarian sword must always be sharp, must always protect the conquests of the revolution, the conquests of the working class, the conquests of the working masses." So long as the Party cannot permit the freedom to discuss problems and views alien to the spirit of Marxism-Leninism, it contradicts the principle of intra-party democracy and the rights to discuss all questions of party policy freely. Power is still concentrated in the Communist Party, and the highly centralised structure of the Party ensures ultimate control by the top leadership. In theory, it is the Central Committee which exercises collective leadership over the Party. In practice, control is concentrated in the Politburo. But the Politburo, as Dr. Munro says, "cannot be more powerful in fact than its all-powerful predecessor."

Membership of the Party. Party discipline and unity involve two important questions: size of the party, and control over party membership. The Communist Party is not an open mass, but a closed society of the new elite. It has been purposely kept small enough to enable exacting standards to be maintained and rigid discipline enforced. The strength of the Party, it is emphasised, lies in its unity and discipline and not its numbers. Lenin preferred even a party of only one, so long as it was self-sacrificial in its conviction and will power. The Party enjoins on every one of its members that he should set an example for others, be a model worker on the job, know the technique of his trade or profession, excel in the improvement of his qualifications, in the acquisition of knowledge, in the observance of discipline and in compliance with the laws of the State demands. His entire conduct, in short, in public and in private, must be exemplary. Since men who possess such devotion and talent to build a socialist society were and are rare, it has been always the policy of the Communist leaders to admit only a small group who can maintain the necessary enthusiasm and sense of mission. Stalin declared in 1934, "It is not given to everyone to be a member of such a party. It is not given to everyone to stand the hardships and storms connected with membership of such a party. It is the sons of the working class, the sons of want and struggle, the sons of incredible privation and heroic efforts who before all should be the members of such a party."

Membership to the Party is, therefore, not gained easily. Rules have always required that applicants be supported by recommendations of Party members for the good quality of the new entrants. The number of required recommendations has varied from time to time. Before 1939, applicants were placed in different categories, graded in accordance "with anticipated loyalty to party principles." In 1939, the rules were made uniform and all restrictions abolished. All candidates for membership are now required to be recommended by three Party members of at least three years' standing who had known the candidate for at least one year. A candidacy of one year is required after admission, and during this period the candidate studies the party history, its policy, its technique of operation, and takes part in duties entrusted and tasks assigned. Those who pass the required tests are admitted to full membership by a decision of a general meeting of the primary party organization. The decision of the primary party is, then, required to be endorsed by the district or city committee.

Wartime procedure relating to admission was less strict and the relaxation was due to the heavy casualties the Party had suffered. Party members were expected to give an example of self-sacrifice and heroism and the new members were admitted on the condition of valorous service to the country. In 1947, Georgi Malenkov, Secretary of the Party, reported that half of 6,300,000 members had joined during or after the war. This comes to about 3 per cent of the total population of the USSR. As on February 1, 1956, the party had a membership of 7,215,505 of whom 6,796 were full members and 419,609 candidate members. In 1967, the total Party membership was 12.5 million.

A periodic review is made of the record of each member in order to ensure his constant loyalty and to provide for constant check on the execution of Party decisions. Failure to live up to the Party standards as well as any kind of "deviation" or "wrecking" is met with disciplinary punishment which may involve expulsion or general "cleansing" of the ranks of the Party. In 1922 and 1923, it is reported that more than a quarter of the Party members were expelled. There were historic purges in 1928-29 and 1933-38 and in between them the usual minor purges. The thought of the periodic cleansing is sufficient to keep the average member alert to his responsibilities and devoted obedience to discipline.

Youth Organizations. In addition to the regular cadre of the Communist Party, there are certain auxiliaries among which the youth organizations are more significant.

These youth organizations not only support Party principles, but provide the means of training large number of young men and women for political work. The attention of the Communist Party is, in fact, directed more towards the younger generation in order to properly indoctrinate them with "proletarian morality." The first of these youth organizations is the Little Octobrists which accepts the children between the ages of eight and eleven years. They are organized in "links" of five members with a "Pioneer" as leader. Five "links" form a "group" to which an older youth, who is a member of the Komsomols, is assigned as a group leader. The Little Octobrists have no precise tasks. But the leaders try to instil in them by group games and by assigning them small duties a sense of association and responsibility.

The Young Pioneers is the next organization which accepts members between nine and fourteen years of age. The task of this organization is to develop in children a socialist attitude towards study, labour and communal activities and inculcate in them a conscious attitude towards physical endurance, honesty and truthfulness, a sense of comradeship and respect of elders. The admission is easy and any child may join, although a candidate may be dropped within two months if he fails to come up to group standards of intelligence and efforts. Pioneers are organised into brigades, with a Komsomol as brigade leader.

The Young Pioneers is, thus, a mass children's organization uniting more than twenty million boys and girls. The main function of the Young Pioneers organization is to help the school and teachers. By their study and conduct Young Pioneers serve as an example for other school children to follow. All kinds of clubs flourish in Young Pioneers organizations. All over the country are to be found Palaces and Houses of Young Pioneers, Young Pioneer parks and sports grounds. In summer, millions of Young Pioneers go out to camps, make special tours, or go on excursions to see the country.

Youths from the ages of fifteen to twenty-six may join the Komsomols or the Leninist young Communist League, the former being the Russian abbreviation of the latter. The Komsomols are virtually junior members of the Communist Party. They are officially termed as the assistants of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (Bolsheviks) and its reserves. An applicant for membership must be recommended by two Komsomols or by one member of the Communist Party. Unworthy members are dropped during the period of candidacy, and their dismissal may also include those who recommended them for membership. Even after the age of twenty-six, members may remain as non-voting advisers, unless elected to higher organs of the society in which case they retain voting rights. If and when a Komsomol is elected a member of the Communist Party, he ceases to be its member unless he holds an executive position therein.

Komsomol organizations are set up in factories, on State and collective farms, in institutions, schools and higher educational establishments. Over 22 million youths and girls are Komsomol members. The main task set itself by the Komsomol is to educate its members and the broad masses of the youth in the spirit of devoted service to their country. The Komsomol takes an active part in the country's political life, in building Communist society, inculcates love for work among the youth, sees to it that the youth regularly improve their working skill, master knowledge and the achievements of advanced science and engineering and know how to apply it in practice in all spheres of the national economy and the culture. The education of young people in the heroic traditions of revolutionary struggle by using examples of devoted labour set by workers, peasants and intellectuals, and in the great ideas of Marxism-Leninism, are the principal tasks of the Leninist Young Communist League. Over 150,000 Komsomol members are Deputies to Soviets. Seven thousand are Heroes of the Soviet Union. Very often Komsomol organizations initiate valuable undertakings that are of importance to the entire country. During the First Five-Year Plan, for instance, the Komsomol was one of the chief initiators of socialist emulation among the working people.

Supporting Organizations. The vast majority of the Soviet citizens do not belong to the Communist Party or to the youth organizations described above. Out of a total population of 200 million people, probably no more than 40 million belong to the Communist Party and youth organizations, and a little more than 6 million only are adults. Support for the Party programme must, therefore, be found in other agencies. Stalin explained that the dictatorship of the proletariat cannot be accomplished without the aid of the labour unions, the co-operatives and the Soviets. "The proletariat needs... these organizations because without them it would suffer inevitable defeat in the fight for the overthrow of the bourgeoisie, for the consolidation of its power and for the building of socialism" The importance of the trade unions is emphasized by the Constitution and they are the first in the list of the organizations in which the citizens have the right to unite. The task of the trade unions has been described as a "school of communism," which form "a link between the advanced and backward elements of the working classes, as uniting the masses with their vanguard."

Then, there are the co-operatives. The Constitution of 1936 recognised co-operatively owned property as one of the two forms of socialist property and Soviet law protects co-operatively owned property on the same basis as the State property.

PARTY ORGANIZATION

Primary Party Organs. The strength and invincibility of the Communist Party lies in its constant contact with the masses. "A party which has lost or even only weakened its contact with the masses loses their confidence and support and is bound to go." This is the raison d'être of the Communist Party and, as such, its organization comprises an extensive network of territorial agencies. It is like a pyramid and at its base are the Primary Party organs formerly known as Party "cells." According to Party rules, Primary Party organs "are set up in mills, factories, State farms, machines and tractor stations and other economic establishments, in collective farms, units of the Red Army and Navy, in villages, offices, educational establishments, etc., where there are not less than three party members." If it has less than three Party members, the Primary Party organ is formed by candidates and members of the Komsomol under the leadership of the higher Party organs. According to Pravda, there are 250,000 Party organs.⁴

The Primary organizations are the back-bone of the Party, and it is they that carry on day-by-day work among the masses. The activities of the Primary organs are agitational and organizational. A Primary organ works among the masses for the fulfilment of the Party slogans and decisions, and carries on regular propaganda among the prospective members with a view to politically educating them. The Primary organ must fully co-operate with the higher Party organs in all matters. It should also strive ceaselessly to mobilise the workers in every enterprise for the completion of the production plan and the strengthening of labour discipline. In order to enhance the prestige of the Party organs, the rules specify that these organs "have the right to control the activity of the management of the enterprise." Their role, in short, is active participation in the economic and political life of the country.

Higher Party organs. Every Primary organ elects its executive bureau and Secretary for transacting its current work. On the next higher level are city or district (both rural or urban) Party Committees. The Primary organs elect delegates to the city or district conference. The city or district conference elects its bureau and three Secretaries who must be confirmed by the regional committee, territorial committee, or the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Republic in which the city or district is located. The city or district Committee supervises the work of the Primary Party organs within its jurisdiction and appoints and directs the work of the editorial board of the local Party publications. Its duty is also to supervise the work of Party groups within the non-Party organizations like trade unions, youth organizations or co-operatives.

Above them are the Area Party organizations which are sub-divisions of the larger regions, territories and republics. The conference or the Congress, as the case may be, meets once in eighteen months and elects its committee of not less than eleven members and two Secretaries. The next in the hierarchy are the Party organizations for entire regions, territories, or republics. The highest authority in each organization is a Party Conference which is convened every eighteen months. It chooses a Committee and this Committee in turn appoints a bureau and four or five Secretaries, who must be approved by the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. It must be remembered that the Party organization embodies the principle of "democratic centralism" and the lower units are responsible to the higher ones and function subject to their supervision. Similarly, the office-bearers selected by the lower organs are confirmed in office by higher ones.

All Union Congress. The All-Union Congress of the Party with its Central Committee crowns the Party organization. The supreme authority of the Party is vested in the All-Union Congress and the present break with Stalinism is the denunciation of the "personality cult" and affirmation of the principle of collective leadership. The delegates to the Congress are elected on the basis of one delegate per 1,000 members and there were 1,355 delegates to the 20th Congress. Sessions of the Congress are called by the Central Committee of the Party. The old Party rules provided that a Congress should be convened once in every three years. There was also a provision for a Party Conference to hold meetings between sessions of the All-Union Congress. No Congress was, however, held between 1939, and Conference after 1941. The fact that the Party had functioned without a Congress for nearly a decade and a half proves that it was never a nerve centre of the Party, although, according to the Party it determines the tactical line of the Party on major questions of current policy and elects the Central Committee. The new Party rules, as amended in 1952, call for a meeting of the Congress at least every four years.

The Central Committee. By far the most important organism in the Communist Party is the Central Committee. It is the source of policy determination and the centre of Party organisation. "Not one important political or organisational question," said Lenin, "is decided by any one State institution in our republic without guiding instructions of the Central Committee of the Party," and according to the Party rules "the Central Committee directs the work of the Central Soviet and public organizations through the Party groups in them." It is a link between the Party and Government and during intervals between Congress, it guides the entire work of the Party. It also appoints the editorial staff for the Central Party Press, confirms the appointment of editorial boards of important local papers, "organises and directs undertakings of social significance, and possesses the right to create political sections and assign special agents to key points in the economy when needed, superseding the Party organs."

According to the old rules the Central Committee was composed of approximately seventy members and an equal number of alternates, who were elected by the Party Congress, and meetings took place three to four times a year. There are now 133 full and 122 alternate members of the Committee, and according to the new Party rules it must meet at least twice a year. Formerly, the Central Committee was supposed, annually or oftener, to convene a Party Conference. This body was made up of Party Secretaries down to the regional level and a few other Communists. There is no mention of the Conference in the new Party rules.

Specialised Party Agencies. The work of the Central Committee is segregated in accordance with the various functions of the Committee. Three functions used to be the concern of the four bureaus and five administrations. The Politburo or the Political Bureau is incomparably the most important and was concerned with the general determination of policy. "The Politburo", maintained Stalin, "is the highest organ not of the State but Party and the Party is the highest directing force of the State." It consisted of ten members with four or five alternates. The second was the Orgburo or the organizational bureau. It was concerned with the planning of organization to provide for organization. It passed on the decisions of the Secretariat throughout the Party organizations.

The new Party rules of 1952, as again amended in 1953, introduced important changes particularly in the bureaus. The new statutes of 1952 provided a somewhat simplified top structure by abolishing the Politburo and the Orgburo. The Politburo was replaced by a new organ, the Presidium of the Central Committee. The Presidium was so named, according to Khrushchev, "because this is a more suitable title than Politburo to indicate the general nature of its work and its function of directing the Central Committee." Stalin's death in March 1953 was followed by some changes in the Party's rules in order to consolidate its position. The Presidium of the Central Committee created in 1952 consisted of 36 members. The new Presidium constituted, after Stalin's death, consisted of 11 full and 6 probationary members. The number approximated the size of the old Politburo. In theory, it is the Central Committee which exercises "collective leadership" over the Party. In practice, control is concentrated in the Politburo of the Central Committee. Presidium was again named Politburo in 1966.

The Secretariat is the real director of Party activities and it has been retained unlike the Politburo and Orgburo. It reviews current problems and checks the fulfilment of Party directives, thus, absorbing some Orgburo functions. The Secretariat was originally an executor of the decisions of the Central Committee. Stalin, who became the First Secretary in 1922 and remained so till his death, combining the office of Prime Minister since 1941, transformed the Secretariat completely and made it, in the words of Towster, "the gear box of the Communist Party and of the Soviet system." Malenkov's resignation as First Secretary, as soon as he became Prime Minister, and the appointment of Khrushchev to this key post marked the departure from Stalin's policy to be revived by Khrushchev himself who combined the posts of the First Secretary and the Prime Minister. After Khrushchev's exit the old arrangement has been reverted and Leonid Brezhnev is the First Secretary whereas Alexei Kosygin is the Prime Minister.

The fourth bureau, according to the old rules, was the Party Control Commission whose functions were the certification of the fulfilment of the decisions of the Party and of the Central Committee by the Party organizations and by the Soviet economic organs. It was a sort of inner disciplinary organisation and would bring proceedings against those who violated the rules and programme of the Party as determined by the Central Committee. It is now designated as the Party Control Committee and possesses the same powers as the old Party Control Commission. The Control Commission formerly had committees to represent it in the localities, but these were elected locally although responsible to the Commission. The representatives are now appointed directly by the Control Committee and are entirely independent of the local organs and the Secretaries. Their primary function is to detect cases of disobedience to the Party decisions and directives including any illegal or unseemly behaviour on the part of members and to hear appeals against expulsion from the Party at all stages down to the regional organizations. Such Committees are established in the Republics, Autonomous Republics, Territories, and Regions.

The Government of
The People's Republic of China

CHAPTER I

THE PEOPLE AND THE COUNTRY

Importance of the Study. There is a saying in the People's Republic of China: 'Tsou, tsou; ts'ou, ts'ou, kai, kai!' (Act, act, you will make mistakes; correct them, correct them). Forty centuries of slow change lay behind China when the Communists took over China in 1949 and brought to an end, as the Preamble of the Constitution of the People's Republic of China says, "a long history of oppression and enslavement." The new State of the People's Republic of China set before it the fundamental task of bringing about, step by step, the socialist industrialization of the country and step by step, to accomplish the socialist transformation of agriculture, handicrafts and the capitalist industry and commerce. By 1954, it was claimed that the necessary conditions had been created for planned economic construction and gradual transition to Socialism. On September 20, 1954, the First National People's Congress solemnly adopted, at its first session held in Peking, the Constitution of the People's Republic of China. The Constitution consolidates the gains of the "Chinese People's revolution and the political and economic victories won since the founding of the People's Republic of China; and moreover, it reflects the basic needs of the State in the period of transition, as well as the general desire of the people as a whole to build a socialist society."

The Constitution unequivocally declares that China has already built an indestructible friendship with the great Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics and the People's Democracies. It further states that China's policy of establishing and extending diplomatic relations with all countries on the principle of equality, mutual benefit and mutual respect for each other's sovereignty and territorial integrity, "which has already yielded success, will continue to be carried out." In international affairs the Constitution pledged the People's Republic of China to a firm and consistent policy "for the noble cause of world peace and the progress of humanity."

In a few years of the establishment of a people's democratic dictatorship Chinese Communists surprised the world by their success in boosting industrial production, by extending strong and effective government throughout China, by building massive army, in fact, wholesale militarization, and by improving the living conditions of industrial workers. But all this has been achieved at a very high price. Individual freedom and choice have been regimented and subordinated to the will of the State, the thinking of the people is choked and strangled and the whole Chinese people have become warped by propaganda. Cultural freedom, so much applauded and guaranteed in the Constitution, has all but vanished. The new class system has come into existence since 1949, and that, too, at the cost of hundreds of thousands of Chinese lives, in order to put the Communist Party firmly at the top and to give the place of honour in the new society to the industrial worker. The great majority of the people still live in much the same way as generation upon generation of their ancestors had lived. The hand of modernization lay fairly lightly over the land in this democratic dictatorship.

In international affairs no other country has such an unpardonable record to its credit as the People's Republic of China. Its Constitution boasts that after a century of heroic struggle, the Chinese people, led by the Communist Party of China, "finally achieved their great victory in the people's revolution against imperialism, feudalism and bureaucrat-capitalism." Within just three years of its career this champion of "the noble cause of world peace and progress of humanity" began itself indulging in expansionism. Like a hungry wolf China pounced upon Tibet and subjugated it. After consolidating its conquest there, it penetrated in the Indian territory, repudiated the international frontier, the McMahon Line, claimed thousands of square miles of Indian territory and finally invaded her frontiers and launched an undeclared war smearing the Panch Sheel with the precious blood of the gallant Indian Jawans. This is how the People's Republic of China "respects each other's sovereignty and territorial integrity." Professions of the Constitution are the deceptions of the Government and yet China claims to be a people's democracy.

The People's Republic of China's relations with Soviet Russia now verge on open hostility and ideological denunciation. The Chinese students in the Soviet Union created outrageous disturbances at the Lenin Mausoleum in the Red Square, Moscow. In Peking the Soviet diplomatic staff and other Soviet citizens including women and children were subjected to humiliation and according to the Soviet Review, "the central core of the 'cultural revolution' is its anti-Sovietism."² This is the extent of the debt of gratitude and the nature of "indestructible friendship with the great Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics" for which the People's Republic of China is constitutionally pledged.

The People and the Country. No one knows precisely how many Chinese there are. The most often quoted statistics place the number over 750 millions spread over 3,800,000 square miles. On its north are the Himalayan ranges and on the south and east is the Soviet Union. The People's Republic of China consists of China proper, with its twenty-five Provinces, inner Mongolian Autonomous region, Tibet and the three municipalities of Peking, Tientsin and Shanghai. The capital is Peking.

Only a few million Chinese work in industry. Nearabout 80 per cent of the population is rural and essentially depend upon agriculture. There is too little good arable land in China to meet the needs of ever growing population. Much of the country consists of desolate plains, barren mountains and winding paths, with paddy fields filling every inch of arable land. A bad season leaves millions hungry. No Government of China has yet been able to control the Gods of weather. Malcolm

2. Concerning the "Cultural Revolution" in China, Soviet Review, February 11, 1967, p. 3.

MacDonald, who arrived in Hongkong on November 3, 1962, after a four week tour of China, said, "The people and Government of China are confident but not complacent. They know and admit they are still inexperienced in modern affairs and the task of turning their colossal teeming country into a modern industrial and agricultural State is gigantic."³ MacDonald predicted it would take "a considerable number of years" for China to be "independent agriculturally" and "many more years than that" before it achieved this industrially."

HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION

From the Ancient to Manchu Dynasty. The history of the development of the Chinese people covers different periods, the ancient period is older than the Greek and Roman civilisations. Till the emergence of the Tang dynasty (618-907 A.D.) several dynasties had ruled over the different parts of the country. The Tang dynasty was followed by several others till the rise of Manchu dynasty towards the close of the sixteenth century. Twelve emperors of the Manchu dynasty ruled and during this period the empire was consolidated and it prospered and progressed.

The East India Company carried on its trade with China in 1664, and it destroyed the monopoly of the Portuguese that they had hitherto enjoyed. The British merchants were only concerned with the accumulation of huge profits to themselves and consequently they freely encouraged the trade in opium oblivious of its effects on the health and earning capacity of the Chinese. The trade in opium resulted into the First (1841) and Second (1858) opium wars. One of the important causes of the opium wars was the Government's opposition to the British carrying on trade with Chinese people in opium, which had been declared as a contraband. But the real fact leading to both the wars was the anxiety of the British to get special rights and privileges, including equality of status, in dealing with the Chinese Government in China. The War of 1841 ended with the treaty of Nanking which provided, inter alia, cession of the Island of Hongkong to Britain, payment of 15 million dollars to British merchants as compensation, opening of ports of Canton, Amoy, Foochow, Ningpo and Shanghai to British trade and residence. The treaty also guaranteed equality of status to the British. These terms were deemed essentially humiliating and there spread a wave of resentment throughout the country. The Chinese Government later on granted similar concessions to the Americans too.

The second opium war started on the British taking side of the Americans and French in their conflict with the Chinese over the abuses of extra-territoriality and also for the reason that the British merchants smuggled into Chinese territory contraband and other goods. The end of the Second War gave significant rights to foreigners in China particularly to British and French. Later, similar rights were conceded to Americans also. All told the total effects of both these wars were the political humiliation and economic bankruptcy of the Chinese. All this was attributed to the weakness of the Manchu Government. The enlightened class of Chinese succeeded in making the people to rise against the Government at various places. The uprising was, no doubt, crushed with the help of the foreigners, but it created an upsurge in the country which set the ball rolling for supplanting the Manchu dynasty. In the meanwhile a war was fought between China and Japan over the Korean question. Japan insisted on the recognition of Korea as an independent State whereas China claimed Korea as its tributary. China was defeated and Korea was declared an independent State.

China had to pay an indemnity to Japan also. But the most important sequel of Chino-Japanese war was a threat to the integrity of China. The Western powers took advantage of the miseries of China and offered to lend her money freely to enable to pay the indemnity to Japan for concessions of trade. Russia, France and Germany made their own demands to obtain spheres of influence and each one succeeded in getting its own price. But in these concessions Britain saw a threat to her dominant position in China. As a result of the Spanish American War, 1898, the United States had annexed Philippines and she naturally became interested in the Western Pacific and in China itself. John Hay, the Secretary of State, then enunciated the "Open Door" policy, which should provide equal opportunity to all nations to trade with China. All these happenings aroused China's deep indignation and it gave birth to a new revolutionary nationalist movement pledged to free the country from foreign domination and to establish a republican government in the country after overthrowing the Manchu regime.

Sun Yat-Sen and new Chinese Nationalism. Sun Yat-Sen was the moving force of this movement. So zealously did he plunge himself in it that in 1895, he had to flee from China with a price on his head. Boxer uprising is the most important phase of the revolutionary movement. A secret society of the Boxers, outwardly started with the object of training youngmen in gymnastics and boxing, had its avowed object of overthrowing the Manchu dynasty, which they held responsible for the surrender of China to foreign powers. The Boxers, accordingly, directed their activities on attacking the foreign legations and Chinese Christians and glorified their existence by killing a few of the foreign diplomats. The foreign powers combined together and raised forces to combat the Boxers, but they did not succeed beyond protecting their legations. It was at this stage that the United States came forward with its policy of "seeking a solution which may bring about permanent safety and peace to China, preserve Chinese territorial and administrative entity, protect all rights guaranteed to friendly powers by treaty or international law, and safeguard for the world the principle of equal and impartial trade with all parts of the Chinese empire." Russia did not accept the policy enunciated by the United States and occupied Manchuria. The Allied armies reached Peking for the relief of the foreign legations placing China entirely at their mercy. The outcome was the Boxer Protocol signed on September 7, 1901.

The Boxer Protocol was not a treaty as it did not require ratification. In fact, its terms had been fulfilled by the Chinese Government even before it could be signed. The terms provided for reparations for the assassinated, punishment for the authors of the crime, payment of indemnity of four hundred and fifty taels with interest at four per cent to be paid in thirty-nine years, occupation by allied troops of twelve specified places for keeping open communications between Peking and the Sen, improvement of commercial relations by amending the commercial treaties, etc., etc. The Boxer movement though apparently suppressed, but the revolutionary spirit of the Chinese remained unabated and soon there emerged the Reformist movement. The Reformist movement, like its predecessor Boxer movement, was anti-foreign and it aimed at overthrowing the Manchu Dynasty. It also aimed to reform the entire life of the Chinese people by improving their social, economic and political lot. The young Chinese trained in western methods of education and institutions spearheaded the movement which soon spread even in the remotest parts of the country. Province after Province revolted and the six-year-old Manchu Emperor abdicated paving the way for the establishment of a republic in 1911.

Sun Yat-Sen after his flight from China had directed the revolutionary movement from abroad. When the Manchu Emperor abdicated and the peace conference convened by the various participants in the Reformist movement was in session, he came back home and was elected the provisional President of the Republic of China. But the revolutionaries were divided amongst themselves in different parts of the country. In the South, Yuan Shih-Kai was declared President of another republic. Sun Yat-Sen was anxious to maintain the unity of the country and, accordingly, he resigned from the provisional Presidentship in favour of Yuan. Trouble again brewed up when the most powerful group under Sun Yat-Sen organised itself as Kuomintang, the National People's Party in 1912. Yuan obtained huge debts from England, France, Germany, Russia and Japan and declared himself Emperor in 1915. The Kuomintang revolted against Yuan who was obliged to postpone his coronation and eventually to restore the republic. But he soon died early in June 1916 and the former Vice-President Li Yuan Hung became the President of the Republic, thus, establishing once again the unity of the country under the leadership of the Kuomintang.

The First World War dragged the Chinese Republic in new difficulties. China sought help from the United States to preserve neutrality. But when Japan entered the war on the side of the Allies, she presented China with twenty-one demands. The Japanese demands were heavily tilted against China, but there was no way out and she was forced to concede fifteen out of twenty-one demands. Japan's position was, thus, inconceivably strengthened in the Far East. The Treaty of 1921, signed by nine powers,⁵ bound the signatory powers: (1) to respect the sovereignty, the independence and the territorial and administrative integrity of China; (2) to provide the fullest and most unembarrassed opportunity to China to develop and maintain for herself an effective and stable government; (3) to use their influence for the purpose of effectually establishing and maintaining the principle of equal opportunity for the commerce and industry of all nations throughout the territory of China; (4) to refrain from taking advantages of conditions in China in order to seek special rights or privileges which would abridge the rights of subjects or citizens of friendly States, and from counteracting action inimical to the security of the State. By another treaty, China's right to enjoy tariff autonomy was also recognised.

The October Revolution in Russia and the establishment of the Soviet State in 1917, effected the politics of China too. A number of prominent Chinese nationalists thought that only a socialist State of the Soviet pattern could remove the economic and political ills of China. The advocates of the Marxian thesis became the left-wing of the revolutionaries. The Kuomintang opposed the Communists, who were under the guidance of Joffe, the Russian Representative. But in 1923, Sun Yat-Sen entered into an alliance with the Communists. They were allowed to enter the Kuomintang while retaining their own party organization. The Russians, keen to help them in establishing their national independence, sent Borodin to Canton to organise a new revolutionary republic in China and General Blucher to train the revolutionary army. Chiang Kai-shek, who had been in Russia as Sun's emissary, was placed at the head of the Whampoa Military Academy, which produced the new leaders of the Chinese army. The intensive propaganda of the Communists and devoted indoctrinating of the youth created bright chances of China's becoming red. Sun Yat-Sen died in 1925, and the Kuomintang acknowledged Chiang Kai-shek as their chief leader. But Sun's death had removed the unifying factor and soon open conflict arose between the Communists and the Kuomintang.

Chiang Kai-shek was an able military general and his military successes resulted in the new unification of China. The old Republic came to an end as also the Nanking Constitution under which it had worked. After establishing his leadership and influence of the Kuomintang, Chiang Kai-shek resigned his military post and under the law of October 25, 1928, established a new national government at Canton and put himself at its head. A National People's Convention adopted on May 12, 1931, a provisional Constitution which aimed to put into action Sun's three principles of People's Government, People's livelihood and People's Nationalism, that is, freedom from foreign control.

The events then followed are swift to some extent. In 1931, Japan occupied Manchuria and set up there a puppet government with a new name "Manchukus." The League of Nations failed to prevent Japan from violating its covenant, and the terms of the Nine Power Treaty of Washington in 1921, to which Japan herself was a signatory. Chiang Kai-shek was left smarting under humiliation. During the Second World War Japan threw her lot with the Axis powers and China seized the opportunity and joined the Allies. Japan had occupied some part of the territory of China during the war. With the active aid of the Allies, China succeeded in getting it back and strengthened its position to the extent that it was included amongst the five great powers to get a permanent seat in the Security Council. The American forces and money also helped Chiang to combat the Communists who had started a virulent propaganda against his government. But the Communists with Russia's unprecedented help were able to drive Chiang's Government in the Island of Formosa in 1947. It was triumph for Communism and China became red. A People's Republic of China was established.

The Provisional Constitution. When the Communists came to power they did not base their government on a formal Constitution analysing the machinery of government. Nor did they attempt one for the first five years of their career. There existed alone the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference, a numerous body of 662 delegates representing the various political parties including the Communist Party, the various regions, mass organizations, the People's Liberation Army and the overseas Chinese. It was a motley of delegates, but with a common programme set forth by Mao Tse-Tung, which hinged upon his thesis of People's Democratic Dictatorship. It really served the provisional Constitution for half a decade. The Organic Law consisting of 31 Articles was promulgated and it outlined the machinery of Government which was to bring forth the fulfilment of the Common Programme and the basis for the drafting of the Constitution.

Drafting of the Constitution. A Committee to draft the Constitution for the People's Republic of China was appointed in January 1953, under the Chairmanship of Mao Tse-Tung. The draft of the Constitution was made available to the Conference, which accepted it in March 1954. Like the Stalin Constitution, and in order to give it the complexion of the Constitution ordained by the people themselves, it was submitted for discussion to the selected people representing different democratic parties and groups, and people's organizations of all sections of society. The discussions lasted for two months and certain amendments were also suggested thereto. The draft of the Constitution thus amended was published and circulated amongst the people for general public discussion. "It is estimated that about 150,000 million persons participated in the public discussions for over two months." Here, too, the procedure was identical to the one adopted in Russia in 1936. The draft of the Constitution was further amended in the light of suggestions emerging from these public discussions, which were formally adopted by the Central People's Government Council on September 9, 1954. The final draft was, then, reported to the First National People's Congress at its first session on September 20, 1954. In pursuance of this Constitution new governmental organization was set up on November 4, 1954.

CHAPTER II

SALIENT FEATURES OF THE CONSTITUTION

Gains of the Revolution. The Constitution of the People's Republic of China sums up the struggle of the Chinese people to overthrow colonialism, feudalism and capitalism. Lin Shao-Chi, while introducing the Report on the Constitution before the first session of the People's Congress, listed five important changes governing the position and status of China, said: "First China is no longer in the position of a colony or dependency under the domination for foreign imperialism. It has become really an independent State.... For more than hundred years, the Chinese people made untold sacrifices to free themselves from domination by foreign imperialism. Their aspirations have come true.... Together with the Soviet Union and the People's democracies China has become a strong bulwark of world peace. Secondly, the age-old grip of feudalism on our country is now ended.... Thirdly, our country has put an end to the long period of chaos. It has achieved internal peace and an unprecedented unification of the entire mainland.... Fourthly, our country has, to a great extent, put an end to the situation in which the people had no political power. It has attained a high degree of democracy.... And lastly, China's great ally, the Soviet Union, with which it had entered into a thirty-year treaty of friendship,¹ had aided China in rehabilitating the national economy, which had been ruined by the imperialists and the Kuomintang."

The Preamble of the Constitution itself epitomises the changes enumerated by Lin Shao-Chi. The Preamble, in fact, is a narrative of the achievements of the Chinese people led by the Communist Party of China and it states how the Constitution was formulated and adopted. It also glorifies the gains of the Chinese people's revolution and the political and economic victories won since the founding of the People's Republic of China. The Preamble expresses its deep gratitude to "the great Union of Soviet Socialist Republics" and pledges China's "indestructible friendship with peace-loving people in other countries." This is an unusual feature of the Preamble of the Constitution of the People's Republic of China. A Preamble is not a part of the Constitution and it has no juristic meaning. Yet its importance cannot be denied. A Preamble declares the intention of the government which the Constitution establishes and enshrines the ideals which the government is required to realize. But the actual policy of the Chinese Government is a complete negation of the guarantees it ensures. Its "indestructible friendship" with the Soviet Union was a plea of hypocrisy and its emphatic declaration that China's policy "to strive for the noble cause of world peace and the progress of humanity" is a cloak for treachery. The champions of anti-imperialism have proved to be worst imperialists and the advocates of "world peace and the progress of humanity" have established themselves as the warmongers whose atrocities will ever go deep in history.

A multi-national State. The People's Republic of China is a single multi-national State and it is just a coincidence that, like the Soviet Union, it contains scores of nationalities. The Preamble declares that all nationalities in China are united in one family of free and equal nations and the unity so forged would help China to gain in strength and to fight against "imperialism, against public enemies of the people within the nationalities, and against both dominant-nation chauvinism and local nationalism." In the course of economic and cultural development, the Preamble assures, that the State will concern itself with the needs of the different nationalities, and, in the matter of socialist transformation, it will strive to pay full attention to the special characteristics in the development of each.

Article 3 of the Constitution guarantees equality of status to all nationalities, prohibits discrimination or oppression against any nationality, and acts which undermine the unity of the nationalities. All nationalities have freedom to use and foster the growth of their spoken and written languages, and to preserve or reform their own customs or ways. The Constitution also grants regional autonomy to all those national minorities whose people live in compact communities. National autonomous areas are inalienable parts of the People's Republic of China.

A People's democratic State. The People's Republic of China is a People's democratic State led by the working class and based on the alliance of workers and peasants. It establishes a people's democratic dictatorship, that is, a system of people's democracy which guarantees that China can in a peaceful way banish exploitation and poverty and build a prosperous and happy socialist society. The Constitution, therefore, aims to build a classless socialist society by welding the workers and peasants, who form the large percentage of the country's population and had ever been victims of exploitation, national and international.

Building of the Socialist Society. The establishment of the People's Republic of China does not usher in a socialist society all at once. "From the founding of the People's Republic of China to the attainment of a socialist society," reads the Preamble, "is a period of transition." During this period the fundamental task of the State is, step by step, to bring about the socialist industrialization of the country and, step by step, to accomplish the socialist transformation of agriculture, handicrafts and capitalist industry and commerce." Article 4 of the Constitution reiterates what the Preamble says. It reads, "The People's Republic of China, by relying on the organs of State and the social forces, and by means of socialist industrialization and socialist transformation, ensures the gradual abolition of the systems of exploitation and the building of a socialist society." The organs of the State, through which socialist society is to be gradually established, are based upon a democratic dictatorship, or a dictatorship of the proletariat as known in the USSR. All these organs of State power are imbued with a ruthless spirit of constructing socialism and merciless destruction of capitalism. The social forces are the mass indoctrination. Hitler used it, so did Stalin. And the Chinese Communist Party is using it with alarming efficiency. It hands down "suggestions" about what should be discussed in schools, newspapers, reading groups and associations of housewives, farmers, businessmen and intellectuals thereby regimenting the entire life of the people towards a desired goal.

Ownership of the means of production. The Constitution accepts four kinds of ownership of the means of production. State-ownership is the first and it is a socialist sector owned by the whole people. "It is the leading force in the national economy and the material basis on which the State carries out socialist transformation." The State ensures priority for the development of the State or socialist sector of the economy and it embraces all mineral resources and waters, as well as forests, undeveloped land and other resources which the State owns by law.² The second is the co-operative sector of economy. This sector is either socialist, when collectively owned by the working masses, or semi-socialist, when a part is collectively owned by the working masses. Partial collective ownership by the working masses is a transitional form by means of which individual peasants, individual handicraftsmen and other individual working people organise themselves in their advance towards collective ownership by the working masses. The State protects the property of the co-operatives, encourages, guides and helps the development of the co-operative sector of economy. It regards the promotion of producers' co-operatives as the chief means for the transformation of individual farming and individual handicrafts.³

Thirdly, there is the ownership by the individual workers. The State protects the right of the individual peasants to own land and other means of production according to law. The State guides and helps individual peasants to increase production and encourages them to organise producers' supply and marketing, and credit co-operatives voluntarily.⁴ Similarly, the State protects the rights of handicraftsmen and other non-agricultural individual working-people to own means of production according to law. It also helps and guides them to improve their enterprise and encourages them to organise producers, and supply and marketing co-operatives. The policy of the State towards rich-peasant economy, the Constitution ordains,⁵ "is to restrict and gradually to eliminate it."

Finally, there is the capitalist ownership and the Constitution guarantees to protect the right of capitalists to own means of production and other capital according to law. The policy of the State towards capitalist industry and commerce is "to use, restrict and transform them. The State makes use of the positive sides of capitalist industry and commerce which are beneficial to national welfare and the people's livelihood, restricts their negative sides which are not beneficial to national welfare and the people's livelihood, encourages and guides their transformation into various forms of State-capitalist economy, gradually replacing capitalist ownership with ownership of the whole people; and this it does by means of control exercised by administrative organs of the State, the leadership given by the State sector of the economy, and supervision by the workers.⁶ The State forbids capitalists to engage in unlawful activities which injure the public interest, disrupt the social-economic order, or undermine the economic plan of the State.

The Right to property. From the types of ownership of means of production enumerated above, the right to private property becomes self-evident. The State protects the right of citizens to own lawfully earned incomes, savings, houses and other means of life.⁷ It also guarantees the right of citizens to inherit private property according to law.⁸ The State may, however, in the public interest, buy, requisition or nationalize land and other means of production both in cities and countryside according to the provisions of law.⁹ The State forbids any person to use his private property to the detriment of the public interest.¹⁰

Planned economy. For the gradual transformation of society planning is a matter of necessity and the Constitution explains its importance. Article 15 states that by economic planning the State directs the growth and transformation of the national economy to bring about the constant increase of productive forces, in this way enriching the material and cultural life of the people and consolidating the independence and security of the country. The First Five-Year Plan ended in 1957, and the Second ended in 1962. The targets of the First Plan aimed primarily at industrial expansion. The statistics in industrial improvements and modernization are impressive and account for China's might which is now being used in pursuit of imperialistic designs. The Second Five-Year Plan aimed largely at increasing agricultural production and one of the targets was to tame the Yellow River to irrigate its farms instead of flooding them.

Work a matter of honour. Like the Soviet Constitution work has been constitutionally sanctified in China too. The Constitution prescribes that work is a matter of honour for every able-bodied citizen¹¹ and guarantees enjoyment of the right to work by planned development of the national economy thereby gradually creating more employment and better working conditions and wages.¹² The State also encourages citizens to take active and creative part in their work.¹³

Fundamental Rights and Duties. The Constitution of the People's Republic of China, as in the Soviet Constitution of Russia, contains a separate Chapter on Fundamental Rights and Duties of Citizens.¹⁴ But unlike the latter political and civil rights form a place of precedence in the Chinese Constitution.¹⁵ The economic rights, like the right to work, the right to rest and leisure and the right to material assistance in old age in case of illness or disability, are there, but not so prominently enshrined. The duties of the citizens as prescribed by the Constitution are more or less the same as in the Soviet Constitution.¹⁶ It is an honourable duty of citizens to perform military service and a sacred duty to protect the homeland, to abide by the Constitution, to respect and protect public property, uphold discipline at work, keep public order, respect social ethics, and to pay taxes.

Power belongs to the people. All power in the People's Republic of China belongs to the people and is exercised through the National People's Congress and the local people's Congresses. These and other organs of the State practise democratic centralism.¹⁷ The Constitution further enjoins that all organs of the State must rely on the masses of the people, constantly maintain close contact with them, heed their opinions and accept their supervision.¹⁸ But how far the principle of democratic centralism is consistent with the provision that all organs of the State must rely on the masses of the people and heed their opinions and accept their supervision, finds its answer in Article 19. It says that the People's Republic of China safeguards the people's democratic system, suppresses all treasonable and counter-revolutionary activities and punishes all traitors and counter-revolutionaries. Absolute obedience to the policy once it has been adopted is the most essential requirement of democratic centralism and any deviation from the party line is a counter-revolutionary activity and one who dares indulge in it is a traitor whom the Constitution aims to ruthlessly suppress.

The highest organ of the State authority. The highest organ of the State authority is the National People's Congress, a sole legislative authority in the country, consisting of Deputies elected by provinces, autonomous regions, municipalities under the direct central authority, the armed forces and the Chinese residents abroad, for a period of four years.¹⁹ The National People's Congress is a unicameral legislature and here it differs from the USSR Supreme Soviet which is bicameral. Russia, like China, is a multi-national State and the second Chamber, the Soviet of Nationalities, was specifically created to give special representation to the various nationalities to safeguard their special economic and cultural interests.

A Collective Executive. The executive authority of the head of the State in the People's Republic of China is vested in the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress and the Chairman of the Republic of China who is elected for four years by the National People's Congress.²⁰ Both the Standing Committee and the Chairman of the Republic, as such, jointly exercise the functions and powers of the head of the State. "This conforms," Liu Shao-chi maintained, while presenting the Report on the Draft Constitution to the First National People's Congress, "to the actual situation of our country and is based on our experience in the building up of the highest organ of state authority since the founding of the People's Republic of China. Ours is a collective head of the State. Neither the Standing Committee nor the Chairman of the People's Republic of China has powers exceeding those of the National People's Congress."

But the position of the Chairman of the People's Republic of China essentially differs from the Chairman of the Soviet Presidium. The Constitution creates the office of the Chairman of the People's Republic of China and endows him with specifically enumerated powers²¹ similar to those vested in the executive head of the State of a non-Communist country. The Constitution of the People's Republic of China even provides for the office of the Vice-Chairman who exercises the functions of the Chairman in case of his incapacity for a prolonged period by reason of health. Should the office of the Chairman fall vacant the Vice-Chairman succeeds to the office of the Chairman.²²

Judiciary and the Procurator-General. There are three types of Courts, the Supreme People's Court, Local People's Court and Special People's Courts.²³ Judges are elected for four years. The judicial system in China aims to provide for cheaper and speedy justice. The proceedings in courts are conducted in the languages of the different minorities. The Chief Procurator exercises procuratorial authority throughout the country over all departments of the State Council, all local organs of State, persons and citizens to ensure due observance of laws.²⁴ There are local procurators at different levels of administrative units working under the direction and control of the Chief Procurator.

Amendment of the Constitution. The Constitution can be amended by the National People's Congress by a two-thirds majority vote of all the Deputies. It is similar to the process of amending the USSR Constitution except that it requires two-thirds majority vote of both the Chambers of the USSR Supreme Soviet.²⁵ In the People's Republic of China there is a single Chamber legislature.

Political asylum. The People's Republic of China grants the right of asylum to any foreign national persecuted for supporting a just cause, for taking part in the peace movement or for engaging in scientific activity. It means that China, like Russia, is the haven of notable revolutionaries.

Leading role of the Chinese Communist Party. The Constitution, unlike that of the USSR, does not contain any provision relating to the role of the Communist Party, except for a reference to "democratic centralism" in Article 1, and that the "People's Republic of China safeguards the people's democratic system, suppresses all treasonable and counter-revolutionary activities and punishes all traitors and counter-revolutionaries." As an Article 19, the Preamble too acclaims it. It says, "in the year 1949, after more than a century of heroic struggle, the Chinese people led by the Communist Party, finally achieved their great victory in the people's revolution against imperialism, feudalism and bureaucratic capitalism...."

25. Article 29.

The Communist Party, thus, commands a pivotal position in the political life of the country. The general programme of the Chinese Communist Party declares, "As the highest form of class organization, the party must strive to play a correct role as the leader and core in every aspect of country's life." It, accordingly, enjoys a monopoly power and, as in the USSR, it is really the decision making body and implementing organisation. Its members staff all key positions in government and society. "Its leaders decide government policy, regardless of their titles or constitutionally vested responsibilities. Its ideology is the only officially propagated doctrine, mandatory for non-members and members alike." It is not identical with government, but it controls the government entirely and fully, and guides and disciplines the society.

A Unitary State. China like the USSR is a multinational state. But unlike USSR, it is not a federation. It is a unitary state, divided for purposes of administration into Provinces, Autonomous Regions, and Municipalities directly under the central authority. Article 5 of the Constitution provides, "The People's Republic of China is a single multi-national State. All nationalities are equal. Discrimination against or oppression of any nationality and acts which undermine the unity of the nationalities are prohibited. All the nationalities have freedom to use and foster the growth of their spoken and written languages and to preserve or reform their own customs or ways. Regional autonomy applies where people or national minorities live in communities. National autonomous areas are inalienable parts of the People's Republic of China."

In the Soviet Union several republics, such as Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, as well as many smaller areas have been granted autonomy by the Constitution. But this autonomy certainly does not mean self-rule. The Party, which is the core of control in any Communist State, is not divided along regional lines but rather it is centrally governed and reaches into every corner of the country. In addition to this, in China, the rulers have not felt that they could afford to give any kind of autonomy to their people, especially to their non-Chinese people. In part, this denial is rooted in the ancient concept of China as a Unitary State. The term "autonomy," however, should not be confused with self-rule. As used in China, it merely means that the peoples of the areas concerned are permitted to implement central directives and to issue local regulations subject to approval by the Central Government. And whatever Autonomous Areas exist they were created during the first seven years of the Communist period, although an autonomous area may be still occasionally established today.

As decreed by the new leadership, administrative autonomy means that the people inhabiting the Autonomous Areas, are permitted to manage the following "internal matters":—administrative work, local finances, local industry, agriculture, animal husbandry, and the use of local minority languages. The Chinese Central Party leadership averred that neither the Central Government nor the Chinese officials will coerce (the non-Chinese minorities) into any course of action which they do not like. But at the same time, the Party has also stated that it will carry out certain economic and cultural "construction projects" in Autonomous Areas and will decide on the time for them to be carried out. And what this "Cultural Revolution" has actually meant is within the knowledge of everyone outside China.

A Transitional Constitution. The Constitution of the People's Republic of China is a brief document, just containing 106 Articles. And the major portion of it covers the political, economic and social objectives to be achieved. The Preamble elaborately states what the people have actually achieved and that which has yet to be achieved. The Constitution of the People's Republic of China, is, therefore, a sort of manifesto and not strictly a legal document and, as such, it is a transitional Constitution. This feature of the Constitution is clearly indicated in the Preamble. In fact, every Communist Constitution is transitional. Stalin, too, had unequivocally stated this in 1936. The Chinese leadership has frequently suggested the period of transition to extend from fifteen to twenty years. Thus, the Constitution is not an abiding document to serve the generations to come with appropriate modifications either by amendments or growth. It is meant to serve the needs of the country "from the founding of the People's Republic of China to the attainment of Socialist Society" as the Preamble says.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS AND DUTIES

The Constitution of the People's Republic of China contains a separate Chapter on Fundamental Rights and Duties and that, too, after the description of the administrative structure as it is in the Soviet Constitution. But unlike the latter the Chinese Chapter on Fundamental Rights begins with the right to vote and other civil rights. Economic rights find a secondary position in their enumeration. The Soviet Constitution specifies that civil rights in the USSR must be "in conformity with the interests of the working people, and in order to strengthen the socialist system."²⁶ The People's Republic Constitution does not say so. But it cannot be denied that in conformity with the principles of democratic dictatorship and the socialistic structure of society that the Constitution establishes the freedom of speech, freedom of press and freedom of assembly must be consistent with and conform to the interests of the working people and that their rights must be exercised in a manner which is consistent with and in accordance to the socialist way of life. To do otherwise is a counter-revolutionary activity and the work of a traitor which the Constitution ordains must be suppressed.²⁷

Political Rights. Citizens of the Republic of China, who have reached the age of eighteen years, enjoy the right to vote and stand for election irrespective of nationality, race, sex, occupation, social origin, religious belief, education, property status or length of residence, except insane persons and persons deprived by law of the right to vote and stand for election. Article 19 of the Constitution deprives feudal landlords and

26. Article 125.

27. Article 19.

bureaucrat-capitalists of political rights for specific period of time according to law, women have equal rights with men to vote and stand for election.

Five Freedoms. All citizens enjoy freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, freedom of association, freedom of procession and freedom of demonstration. The State guarantees to citizens enjoyment of these freedoms by providing the necessary material facilities. When the People's Republic of China safeguards the People's democratic system, suppresses all treasonable and counter-revolutionary activities and punishes all traitors and counter-revolutionaries, the enjoyment of the freedoms of speech, press, assembly, association, procession and demonstration must necessarily be exercised in conformity with the interests of the working people, and in order to strengthen the socialist system. The aim of the democratic system established in China is to destroy capitalism and construct socialism. The Government will, therefore, provide the necessary material facilities for the enjoyment of these guaranteed rights to those persons, groups and associations alone who advocate and propagate the cause of socialism. And those who are against the socialist system will not be provided with the necessary material facilities. In fact, they will be suppressed as traitors and counter-revolutionaries.

Inviolability of persons and homes. Freedom of the person of citizens is inviolable. No citizen may be arrested, except by decision of the People's Court or with the sanction of a People's procuratorate. The homes of citizens are inviolable, and privacy of correspondence is protected by law. These provisions are identical to Articles 127 and 128 of the Soviet Constitution. Even the wording is more or less the same. If Soviet Russia can be an index of the extent of enjoyment of these freedoms, then, in China, too, it is only a theoretical guarantee. The ubiquitous secret police and the mighty hand of the procurator gripping all departments of the State and private homes of the citizens leaves nothing which can be described as inviolable. According to Article 90 citizens of the People's Republic of China enjoy freedom of residence and to change their residence.

Freedom of religious belief. Citizens enjoy freedom of religious belief. Article 124 of the Soviet Constitution, on the other hand, provides, "In order to ensure to citizens freedom of conscience, the church in the USSR is separated from the State, and the school from the Church." Freedom of religious worship and freedom of anti-religious propaganda is recognised for all citizens. Sufficient evidence is available that freedom of religious belief is considerably restricted in China. The wholesale prosecution of the Chinese Muslims has evoked widespread resentment amongst Muslims of the world. Christians and Buddhists (or Lamaist) too have been subjected to more or less the same treatment. Like the USSR, China too permits equal freedom of anti-religious propaganda.

Right to education and scientific research. Citizens have the right to education. In order to guarantee enjoyment of this right, the State establishes and gradually extends the various types of schools and other cultural and educational institutions. The State pays special attention to the physical and mental development of young people. The State also safeguards the freedom of citizens to engage in scientific research, literary and artistic creation and other cultural pursuits. The State encourages and assists creative work in cultural education, literature, art and other cultural pursuits.

Equality of Women. Women in the People's Republic of China enjoy equal rights with men in all spheres of political, economic, cultural, social and domestic life. The State protects marriage, the family, and the mother and child. There is no provision, as it is in the Soviet Constitution in Article 122, for the State protection of unmarried mothers.

Right to work, rest and leisure. All citizens have the right to work. This right is guaranteed by planned development of the national economy, which gradually creates more employment, and better working conditions and wages. Working people have also the right to rest and leisure. With a view to ensure the enjoyment of this right, the State prescribes hours of work and holidays for workers and office employees. At the same time, the State gradually expands material facilities to enable working people to rest and build up their health.

Right to material assistance. Working-people have the right to material assistance in old age, and in case of illness or disability. The State, accordingly, provides for social insurance, social assistance and public health services and gradually expands these facilities to make possible the wider enjoyment of this right.

Rights to property and inheritance. The Constitution of the People's Republic of China protects the right of citizens to own lawfully earned incomes, savings, houses and other means of life. Inheritance of property according to law is also constitutionally protected. Article 10 recognises the right to own means of production and other kinds of capital according to law. It means, in terms of law, that the Constitution recognises and permits existence of capitalists, though the ultimate object is to establish a Socialist society. Article 4 of the Constitution speaks of "the gradual abolition of the systems of exploitation and the building of the socialist society." Continuance of capitalistic enterprise is, therefore, a transitional stage and the Constitution makes provisions for the final takeover by the State. Article 14 provides that no citizen may use his property to the detriment of public interest. It is further provided that the State possesses the power to requisition and nationalise land and other means of production in the public interest according to law. The law does not say that the payment of compensation is obligatory when the state decides to nationalise land and other means of production.

Right for redress of grievances. Citizens have the right to bring grievances and complaints against any person working in any organ of the State for transgression of law or neglect of duty by making a written or verbal statement to any organ of State at any level. People suffering loss by reason of infringement by persons working in organs of State of their rights as citizens have the right to compensation.

Right of asylum. The People's Republic of China protects the proper rights and interests of Chinese residents abroad. The right of asylum is also granted to any foreign national persecuted for supporting a just cause, for taking part in the peace movement or for engaging in scientific activity.

The Chinese Bill of Rights as incorporated in the Constitution is impressive indeed. It embraces the political, economic, social and cultural life of the individual and unlike the Soviet Bill of Rights political and civil rights precede economic rights. Viewed in terms of pure theory the Chinese Bill of Rights is a great advancement on the Bills of Rights as obtainable in the Western democracies. The Constitution of the People's Republic expresses them in absolute and unqualified terms and they are made available to all the Chinese people.

But the exact position is otherwise. All the people in China do not enjoy Fundamental Rights. There are categories of people who are "non-people." This point was elaborated by Mao Tse-tung. He declared that there are certain categories of people such as "the henchmen of imperialism, the landlord class, the bureaucratic capitalists as well as the reactionary clique of the Kuomintang" who are non-people. Non-people are not only deprived of the enjoyment of the Fundamental Rights, but it is the constitutional duty of the Government to suppress them. Article 19 analyses it. It reads, "The People's Republic of China safeguards the people's democratic system, suppresses all treasonable and counter-revolutionary activities and punishes all traitors and counter-revolutionaries." Liu Shao-chi, the real architect of the Constitution, epitomised the whole truth when he said, "Anyone who expects our Constitution to ensure freedom for traitors and counter-revolutionaries is bound to be disappointed." No one in China, as in Soviet Russia, does for certain know who is a traitor and a counter-revolutionary and Liu Shao-chi was no exception to this political truth of the Communist regime. Liu Shao-chi was deprived of his political position in November 1968 because he became suspect in the eyes of Mao Tse-tung. Enjoyment of Fundamental Rights, therefore, depends upon how one accepts the dictates of the Party leadership. The law clearly prohibits the imperialists, the feudalists and the bureaucrats to exercise the right to vote and stand for election.

Fundamental Duties. Like the Soviet Constitution, the People's Republic Constitution also imposes certain duties on citizens. All such duties carry with them a constitutional sanction and the State is enjoined to enforce them vigorously. The first commandment is that citizens must abide by the Constitution and the law, uphold discipline at work, keep public order and respect social ethics. The public property of the People's Republic is sacred and inviolable. It is the duty of every citizen to respect and protect public property. It is, again, the duty of citizens to pay taxes according to law. While it is the sacred duty of every citizen to defend the homeland, it is an honourable duty of citizens to perform military service according to law. All these duties are identical to those prescribed by the Soviet Constitution. But recent disturbances in China as a result of bid to power do not present a faithful picture of the due observance of duties and of social solidarity. Even the monolithic nature of the Party is destroyed by deep-rooted dissensions. Here is a marked difference between the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China.

CHAPTER III

STRUCTURE OF THE STATE

THE NATIONAL PEOPLE'S CONGRESS

Highest organ of State authority. The National People's Congress, like the Supreme Soviet in the USSR, is the highest organ of State authority and it is the sole legislative authority in the country. Its functions are varied; constituent, legislative, executive, electoral, and judicial too, and all told they well establish its supremacy. The National People's Congress amends the Constitution, supervises the enforcement of the Constitution, enacts laws, elects and removes the different officers of the State, decides questions of war and peace, examines and approves the budget, ratifies the status and boundaries of Provinces and other local areas. If the Congress so desires it can assume any other function as it deems necessary. The general clause makes the National People's Congress the repository of all power and authority of the State.

Composition and Organization. The National People's Congress is a unicameral legislature. It is composed of deputies elected by provinces, autonomous regions, municipalities under the direct central authority, the armed forces and the Chinese residents abroad. Deputies to the National People's Congress are divided into groups based on the units which elect them. Citizens who have reached the age of eighteen have the right to vote and stand for election whatever their nationality, race, sex, occupation, social origin, religious belief, education, property status or length of residence, except insane persons and persons deprived by law of the right to vote and stand for election. The imperialists, the feudalists, and bureaucrats are denied the right to vote and stand for election. The number of Deputies, including those representing national minorities, and the manner of their election are prescribed by electoral law. The Congress is now composed of more than one thousand deputies. The term of office is four years. The Constitution ordains that two months before the term of office of the Congress expires, its Standing Committee must complete the next election of the Deputies. If for some exceptional circumstances new elections cannot be held, then, the terms of the sitting members may be prolonged until the first session of the succeeding National People's Congress.

The Congress is convened once a year by its Standing Committee. But it may be convened also whenever the Standing Committee or one-fifth of the Deputies may propose. When the National People's Congress meets, it elects a Presidium and a Secretary-General for the session, and adopts an agenda for that session. The Presidium presides over the sittings of the National People's Congress. Executive Chairmen to preside over the sittings by turn are elected by and from the members of the Presidium. To convene meetings of the Presidium and preside at them standing chairmen are elected by and from among its members.

Before each session of the National People's Congress is convened, the Deputies in each group consult together on matters concerning preparations for the session put forward by the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress. When the Congress is in session, the groups discuss matters put forward by the National People's Congress or its Presidium. No Deputy may be arrested or placed on trial without the consent of the Congress, or, when the Congress is not in session, of its Standing Committee. Deputies are subject to the supervision of the units which elect them. These electoral units have the power to replace, according to the procedure prescribed by law, at any time the Deputies whom they had elected. The Constitution, therefore, vests in the people the power to recall their representatives if they ever feel dissatisfied with their performance.

Responsible officers of the State Council, the various Ministries and Commissions, the Council of National Defence, the Supreme People's Court, and the Supreme People's Procuratorate, if not Deputies to the National People's Congress, may, when the Presidium so decides, attend meetings of the National People's Congress and participate in the proceedings. The National People's Congress establishes a Nationalities Committee, a Bills Committee, a Budget Committee, a Credentials Committee and other Committees as it may deem necessary. The Nationalities Committee and the Bills Committee are under the direction of the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress when the National People's Congress is not in session.

Sittings of the National People's Congress are public, but secret sittings may be held when necessary and when the National People's Congress so resolves. Laws and other Bills require a simple majority vote of all the Deputies to the National People's Congress. But amendments to the Constitution require a two-thirds majority vote of all the Deputies.

Functions and Powers. The first item, which the Constitution mentions while enumerating functions and powers of the National People's Congress, is to amend the Constitution. Although it is a written Constitution, yet the procedure for amending it is simple. Amendments require just a two-thirds majority vote of the total membership of the Deputies. The Congress is the sole legislative authority of the country. Laws and other Bills require a simple majority of all the Deputies. The Congress supervises the enforcement of the Constitution and determines the infringement of its decisions and annuls decisions which contravene the Constitution. It is the fundamental duty of the citizens to abide by the Constitution and the laws. Deputies have the right to address questions to the State Council, or to the Ministries and Commissions of the State Council which are under obligation to answer. The Standing Committee must make a report on its work to the National People's Congress at each session of the latter.

The Congress elects the Chairman and the Vice-Chairman of the People's Republic of China, decides on the choice of the Premier of the State Council upon recommendation by the Chairman of the Republic, and of the other members of the State Council on the recommendation of the Premier. It also decides on the choice of the Vice-Chairmen and other members of the Council of National Defence upon recommendation of the Chairman of the Republic. It elects the President of the Supreme People's Court, and the Chief Procurator of the Supreme People's Procuratorate. It also has the power to remove from office the Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the People's Republic of China, the Premier and Vice-Premiers, Ministers, Heads of Commissions and Secretary-General of the State Council, the Vice-Chairmen and other members of the Council of National Defence, the President of the Supreme People's Court and the Chief Procurator.

The Congress approves the State budget and the financial report and decides on the national economic plans. It ratifies the status and boundaries of provinces, autonomous regions, and municipalities under the central authority. It decides on questions of war and peace, and exercises such other functions and powers as the Congress may determine. The latter is an all-embracing power and this provision vindicates the supremacy of the National People's Congress as the highest organ of State authority in the Republic of China.

The Congress elects its Standing Committee which is a permanently acting body of the National People's Congress and is essentially analogous to the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet in the USSR. The Standing Committee is responsible for all its acts to the Congress and reports to it. The Congress has power to recall members of its Standing Committee. The National People's Congress, or its Standing Committee if the former is not in session, may, if necessary, appoint Commissions of inquiry for the investigation of specific questions. All organs of State, People's organisations and citizens concerned are obliged to supply necessary information to these Commissions when they conduct investigations. Deputies have the right to address questions to the State Council, or to the Ministries and the Commission of the State Council, which are under obligation to answer. Finally, the Congress decides on general amnesties.

The People's National Congress, thus, defies the theory of Separation of Powers. Its powers extend to all spheres of State activity. It appoints and removes the head of the State, the Chairman of the Republic, as also the Premier and the various Ministers. Its authority to appoint and remove embraces the President of the Supreme People's Court and the Chief Procurator. The National Defence Council is its creation and the Council remains in office so long as the Congress wills it. And at the top, the Congress is the Constitution amending body and it also looks to the enforcement of the Constitution.

Legislative Procedure. Bills are submitted to the National People's Congress by the Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the People's Republic of China, by Deputies of the National Congress, by the Presidium of the National People's, the Standing Committee and the various other Committees of the Congress and by the State Council. It means that, like USSR, there is no difference between a public Bill and a Private Bill and it is no concern of the governmental organs alone to introduce a Bill. A Bill in China is submitted to the Congress by almost all organs of government at the centre as also by the Deputies and the various committees of the Congress. There is no need for a Bill to cover all the Readings and pass through the various stages in its career in the Congress.

Bills submitted to the Congress are brought before its session for discussion by the Presidium, or they are brought before a session of the Congress for discussion after being referred to the Committee or Committees concerned for a joint consideration. As the sessions of the National People's Congress are brief and that too once a year generally, votes are taken on a Bill immediately after discussion. Discussion can only be according to the party-line and nothing beyond as the Constitution enjoins upon the National People's Congress, the local Congress and other organs of State to practise "democratic centralism,"¹ which precludes discussion once the decision had been taken at the top. It means that, as in the Soviet Union, unanimity in the People's Republic is insisted and if a Deputy ventures to express an opinion it may relate only to the performance of the Ministry in implementing the policy rather than to criticise the policy itself.

Amendments to the Constitution undergo the same procedure as legislative measures, except that they require a two-thirds majority vote of the total membership of the National People's Congress. Laws and other Bills require a simple majority vote of all the Deputies. Bills are passed by secret ballot or by a show of hands. The Chairman of the Republic promulgates laws passed by the Congress.² He has no power to veto such laws. The Constitution does not even say anything about their authentication.

Committees of the Congress. The National People's Congress establishes a Nationalities Committee, a Bills Committee, a Budget Committee, a Credentials Committee and other Committees as it may deem necessary to constitute.³ These Committees assist the National People's Congress in its work. When the National People's Congress is not in session, the Nationalities Committee and the Bills Committee assist the Standing Committee in its work.

Each such Committee is composed of a Chairman, Vice-Chairmen and members. Candidates for chairmanship or membership of such committees are nominated from among the Deputies by the Presidium of that session of the Congress, subject to the approval by the Congress itself. Vice-Chairmen are elected by and from among members of such committees. Meetings of each committee are presided over by its Chairman, who directs the work of the Committee.

The Nationalities Committee examines Bills or sections of Bills that concern the affairs of the nationalities referred to it by the National People's Congress or its Standing Committee. It examines statutes governing the exercise of autonomy or separate regulations which are submitted by autonomous regions, autonomous chou and autonomous counties for ratification by the Standing Committee of the Congress. It also submits on its own initiative Bills or views concerning the affairs of the nationalities to the Congress or its Standing Committee, and studies matters concerning the affairs of the Nationalities.

1. Article 2.

2. Article 40.

3. Article 34.

The work of the Bills Committee is to examine statutory and other legislative Bills referred to it by the National People's Congress, to examine statutory and other Bills concerning laws and decrees referred to it by the Standing Committee. It drafts laws and decrees in accordance with decisions of the National People's Congress or its Standing Committee and submits Bills and views concerning laws and decrees to the Congress or its Committee.

The Budget Committee examines the State Budget, the financial report and Bills concerning the budget referred to it by the National People's Congress.

The Credentials Committee examines the qualifications of the Deputies in the right of their credentials and other references, when the National People's Congress meets for its first session. The Credentials Committee examines the qualifications of deputies at by-elections in the same manner.

Commissions of inquiry for the investigation of specific questions may be appointed by the National People's Congress or its Standing Committee. All organs of the State, people's organizations and citizens concerned are obliged to supply necessary information to these commissions when they conduct investigations. The organization and work of such commissions are laid down by the National People's Congress or its Standing Committee at the proper time.

THE STANDING COMMITTEE

The Standing Committee is akin to the Presidium of the USSR and as the latter so is the former a constitutional anomaly. By virtue of the powers granted to it, the Standing Committee is the highest functioning organ of the State that permanently acts on behalf of the National People's Congress which is convened once a year and that, too, for just a brief session. It performs functions which are unique as many of them are purely executive in character and are usually performed by or in the name of the Chief Executive Head of the State, although the office of the Chairman of the Republic is the one which the Constitution has specifically created.

Composition of the Standing Committee. Article 30 of the Constitution determines the status of the Standing Committee and Article 31 enumerates its functions and powers. As the National People's Congress generally meets once a year, the Standing Committee is its permanently acting body. It is composed of: the Chairman, the Vice-Chairmen, the Secretary-General, and other members, all elected at the first session of each National People's Congress. It is a numerous body like the Presidium of the USSR but its membership is presumably more than double of the USSR Presidium; more than 65.

Meetings of the Standing Committee are called by the Chairman twice a month. When necessary, the number of such meetings may be increased or reduced. The Chairman presides over such meetings and directs the work of the Standing Committee. If the Chairman is incapacitated for a prolonged period for reasons of health, or should his office fall vacant, the Standing Committee elects one from among the Vice-Chairmen until his recovery or until a new Chairman is elected. The Standing Committee has a general office which works under the direction of the Secretary-General. There are Deputy Secretaries-General, too, who are appointed by the Standing Committee.

Functions and Powers. The Standing Committee conducts the election of the Deputies to the National People's Congress. Two months before the expiry of the term of office of the National People's Congress, the Standing Committee must complete the election of Deputies to the succeeding Congress. Should exceptional circumstances arise preventing such an election, the term of office of the sitting members may be prolonged until the first session of the succeeding Congress. The Standing Committee convenes the Congress once a year. It may also be convened whenever the Standing Committee deems it necessary or one-fifth of the Deputies so propose. The Nationalities Committee and the Bills Committee are under the direction of the Standing Committee when the Congress is not in session. If the Congress is not in session, the Standing Committee may, if it deems necessary, appoint Commissions of inquiry for the investigation of specific complaints or questions. No Deputy may be arrested or placed on trial without the consent of the Standing Committee, when the Congress is not in session.

The Standing Committee interprets laws and adopts decrees. It supervises the work of the State Council, the Supreme People's Court and the Supreme People's Procuratorate. It annuls decisions and orders of the State Council which contravene the Constitution, laws or decrees. It revises or annuls inappropriate decisions issued by the government authorities of provinces, autonomous regions, and municipalities directly under the Central authority. The Committee decides, when the National People's Congress is not in session, on the proclamation of a state of war in the event of armed attack on the country or in fulfilment of international treaty obligation concerning common defence against aggression. It decides on general or partial mobilization and on the enforcement of martial law throughout the country or in certain areas.

The Committee decides on the appointment or removal of any Vice-Premier, Minister, Head of Commission or the Secretary-General of the State Council when the National People's Congress is not in session. It appoints or removes the Vice-Presidents, Judges, and other members of the Judicial Committee of the Supreme People's Court, the Deputy Chief Procurator, Procurators, and other members of the Procuratorial Committee of the Supreme People's Procuratorate. The Committee decides on the ratification or abrogation of treaties concluded with foreign States. It also institutes military, diplomatic and other special titles and ranks and institutes and decides on the award of State orders, medals and titles of honour. It decides on the granting of pardons.

Bills can be submitted to the People's Congress by the Chairman or Vice-Chairman of the Republic, by the Chairman, Vice-Chairmen or the members of the Standing Committee itself by the Nationalities Committee or the Bills Committee of the National People's Congress and by the State Council. Bills submitted to it for discussion by its Chairman are brought before the Standing Committee after having been referred to the appropriate committee of the National People's Congress for a joint or separate examination.

The Nationalities Committee and the Bills Committee are under the direct direction of the Standing Committee when the National People's Congress is not in session. Finally, the Standing Committee exercises such other functions and powers as are vested in it by the National People's Congress.

Resolutions of the Standing Committee require a simple majority vote of all its members. The Standing Committee must make a report on its work to the National People's Congress at each session of the latter. It is responsible to the National People's Congress and the members are subject to recall.

Standing Committee is the real authority. The Constitution holds the National People's Congress as the highest organ of State authority, but real authority, like the Presidium in the USSR, belongs to the Standing Committee. It is the continuous Government in China in fact as well as in law. Although the Standing Committee is the creature of the Congress, it is elected by the Congress, its members can be recalled, it is responsible and reports to the National People's Congress, yet the Congress meets ordinarily once a year and that, too, just for a brief period. The extent of authority of the National People's Congress has, thus, for all practical purposes been transferred to the Standing Committee which functions permanently. Its functions are numerous and its jurisdiction all-embracing. It conducts the election of the Deputies and convenes sessions of the National People's Congress. As an interpreter of laws, the authority of the Standing Committee is unquestioned. Next, it adopts decrees. It supervises the work of the State Council and annuls its decisions and orders which contravene the Constitution, laws or decrees. It also revise or annuls inappropriate decisions issued by the Government authorities or Provinces, autonomous regions and municipalities directly under the Central authority.

The Standing Committee also appoints and dismisses Vice-Premiers, Ministers, Secretary-General of the State Council and other functionaries in between the sessions of the Congress. Ratification or abrogation of treaties concluded with foreign States, and decisions on matters, such as, the proclamation of war, general or partial mobilization and enforcement of martial law throughout the country or in certain areas make the position of the Standing Committee enviable. And it goes to the credit of the Standing Committee that it has used all its powers effectively, though the directing force remains within the inner circle of the Communist Party. Those who direct the Party find their due place in the Standing Committee and it is the leading reason for the Standing Committee to become the real organ of state authority. Peter S. Tang has aptly said, "like the Presidium, the Standing Committee serves as a small and manageable group for giving the necessary legal form and authority to acts of State which are essentially decided upon in the high councils of the Party."

But there are significant points of difference between the Standing Committee and the Presidium. The latter is, as Stalin said, "the Collegiate President" of the USSR and the Chairman of the Presidium does not possess any powers and functions which the Constitution or law may confer upon him. The functions he performs are merely ceremonial and their basis is conventional. The Constitution of the People's Republic specifically creates the office of the Chairman of the Republic and his duties and functions are neatly enumerated in the Constitution and are comfortably vast than the conventional functions of the Chairman of the Presidium. Then, the Standing Committee is a numerous body as compared with the Presidium; near about double of the latter. It is true that democratic centralism and strict adherence to the Party discipline in both the countries leave no margin to doubt the perfect unanimity of decisions in both the bodies. Yet, one can say that a body with small membership is more informal in its deliberations and effective in its decisions than a numerous body consisting of as many as 65 members.

CHAPTER IV

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE REPUBLIC AND THE STATE COUNCIL

The Executive in the Republic. The State Council of the People's Republic of China, that is, the Central People's Government, is the executive organ of the highest State authority and, as such, the highest administrative organ of the State.¹ The Constitution creates the office of the Chairman of the Republic and vests him with functions which generally relate to the Head of the State. The Constitution emphasises the responsibility of the State Council, headed by the Premier, to the People's Congress and directs its members, popularly designated as Ministers, to answer questions which the Deputies may like to ask. This is like controlling the State Council and since control and responsibility go together, the executive appears to be like the Parliamentary system of government. But it is wrong to suppose that it is so. The essence of the Parliamentary system of government is the presence of two or more political parties with conflicting policies and programmes which they present to the people at the time of the general elections. The party or a combination of parties which are in majority in the legislature and agree to follow a common programme form the Government and other parties constitute the Opposition. The Opposition is the alternative government and its function is to criticise the government and oppose its policies with a view to defeat it in the legislature and oust the government from office. The Communist system of Government as obtainable in China permits the existence of only one party and its programme is well-defined, from which there can be no departure. The objective of the Constitution is to build Socialism and, as such, there can be no deviation from it. Then, the Constitution prescribes democratic centralism, which means that once a decision has been taken there can be no opposition to it. Clash of ideas and conflict of policies is therefore, not permissible and this is the negation of a responsible government.

CHAIRMAN OF THE REPUBLIC

Election and Term of Office. The Chairman of the People's Republic of China is elected by the National People's Congress for a term of four years. Any citizen who is in possession of political rights and has reached the age of thirty-five is eligible for election as Chairman. The Constitution also provides for the office of the Vice-Chairman, who assists the Chairman in his work. The Vice-Chairman fulfils all the conditions of the Chairman for his eligibility and is elected in the same way and for the same term as the Chairman. The Vice-Chairman may exercise such part of the functions and powers of the Chairman as the Chairman may entrust to him. Should the Chairman be incapacitated for a long period by reason of health, the functions of the Chairman shall be exercised by the Vice-Chairman. If the office of the Chairman becomes vacant, the Vice-Chairman succeeds to the office of the Chairman. The National People's Congress has power to remove from office the Chairman and the Vice-Chairman.

Functions and Powers. The Chairman in pursuance of the decisions of the National People's Congress or its Standing Committee promulgates laws and decrees, appoints and removes the Premier, Vice-Premiers, Ministers, Heads of Commissions and the Secretary-General of the State Council, appoints and removes the Vice-Chairman and other members of the Council of National Defence. He confers State orders, medals and titles of honour, proclaims general amnesties and grants pardons, proclaims the state of war, orders mobilization and enforces martial law.

As head of the State, the Chairman represents the People's Republic of China in its relations with foreign States, receives foreign diplomatic representatives and, in pursuance of the decisions of the Standing Committee, appoints or recalls plenipotentiary representatives to foreign States and ratifies treaties concluded with foreign States. He commands the armed forces of the country, and is the Chairman of the National Council of Defence. Whenever necessary, the Chairman may convene a Supreme State Conference and act as its Chairman. The Vice-Chairman of the Republic, the Chairman of the Standing Committee, the Premier and other persons concerned take part in the Supreme State Conference. The Chairman submits the views of the Supreme State Conference on important affairs of the State to the National People's Congress, the Standing Committee, the State Council, or other bodies concerned for their consideration and decision.

The Constitution establishes the Supreme State Conference and the National Defence Council. The first, the Supreme State Conference consists of more than 300 persons including the Vice-Chairman of the Republic, the Chairman of the Standing Committee, the Premier of the State Council and other persons. The Chairman of the Republic convenes and presides over the meetings of the Conference. It is a high-ranking constitutional body embracing prominent non-party people and is intended to create a sense of participation of the people in the policy process. But how far the Conference possesses any effective voice, it is hazardous to conjecture in the absence of any authenticated material.

The second body is the National Council of Defence. The Council, too, has a large percentage of prominent non-party men among its hundred or more members. The Council rarely meets for more than a few days a year. Apparently the Council must have an active and effective say in the problems of defence, but in reality its role is just to meet and endorse what has already been decided at the highest Party and Governmental levels. Rigid adherence to party-line is the basic principle of democratic centralism and with that monopoly power it is difficult to think that either of these bodies is competent or is likely to suggest counter-proposals and suggestions.

The position and authority of the Chairman. There is no authoritative material available to precisely comment upon the role of the Chairman of the People's Republic of China. The only source of reliance, therefore, is the Constitution itself, and whatever can be gathered from the writings and speeches of two occupants of the office, Mao Tse-tung and Liu Shao-chi. The provisions of the Constitution vest the Chairman essentially with ceremonial powers as head of the State. He has a constitutional power to appoint and remove the Premier, Vice-Premiers, Ministers, Heads of the Commissions and the Secretary-General of the State Council. His authority also extends to the ratification of the treaties concluded with foreign States on behalf of the People's Republic and appoints and recalls ambassadors and other diplomatic representatives on behalf of China. The Chairman is the supreme commander of the armed forces of the country and Chairman of the Council of National Defence. He proclaims a state of war and martial law and orders mobilisation.

These are vast powers, indeed and when the incumbent of the office is one of the stature of Mao Tse-tung, as he was till 1959, the authority of the Chairman is really great and his position peerless. With the control he exercised over the Party he could impose his decisions both on the People's Congress and its Standing Committee. In fact, his position could be compared with Stalin. Liu Shao-chi could not match in prestige with Mao Tse-tung, yet as a top-ranking leader of the Party, who had been the architect of the Constitution and a close associate of Mao Tse-tung he exercised considerable influence and became a rival to the authority of his master when he was denounced as a counter-revolutionary and removed from office in November 1968. No one can predict both in Russia and China the fate of the political leaders. It may, however, be noted that the Constitution gives to the Chairman of the Republic and the Standing Committee, which are supplementary and complimentary to one another, authority and the position of the Chairman essentially depends upon his Party position. If his position is commanding he carries with him the Standing Committee and the State Council otherwise he is just a figure-head.

THE STATE COUNCIL

The State Council of the People's Republic is the Central Government and "is the executive organ of the highest State authority; it is the highest administrative organ of State."² The top-Party political leaders are, therefore, associated with the decision-making in the Government and to see the proper implementation of such decisions through the different administrative departments and agencies into which administration is divided. Both these functions of the State Council resemble to that of a Cabinet in a parliamentary system of government.

Composition. The State Council is composed of the Premier, the Vice-Premiers, the Ministers, the Heads of Commissions, and the Secretary-General. There are sixteen Vice-Premiers and some thirty or more Ministers and Heads of State Commissions. The organization of the State Council is determined by law. The Organic Law, enacted on September 21, 1954, created 35 Ministries and Commissions. The addition of new Ministries or Commissions under the State Council and the abolition or merging of existing ones are decided by the National People's Congress or by its Standing Committee on the recommendation of the Premier.

The Chairman of the People's Republic of China, in pursuance of decisions of the National People's Congress or its Standing Committee, appoints or removes the Premier, the Vice-Premier, Ministers, Heads of Commissions and the Secretary-General of the State Council.³ Each Ministry has a Minister and Vice-Ministers and when necessary Assistant Ministers to the Minister may be appointed. Each Commission has a Head, Deputy Heads and Members. The Ministers and Heads of Commissions direct the work of their respective departments. They may issue orders and directives within the jurisdiction of their respective departments and in accordance with laws and decrees, and decisions and orders of the State Council. The State Council may, when necessary, establish administrative organs to assist the Premier in directing the work of the various departments under the State Council.

The State Council has a Secretariat under the direction of the Secretary-General, as also Deputy Secretaries-General to assist the Secretary-General in his work.

Meetings of the State Council. The State Council meets in a monthly plenary session. Executive meetings of the State Council are held more frequently. The Premier directs the work of the State Council and presides over its meetings.

The meetings of the State Council are, accordingly, of two kinds: plenary and executive. Plenary meetings are attended by the Premier, the Vice-Premiers, the Ministers, the Heads of Commission and the Secretary-General. They are held once every month, and may be called by the Premier at such other times as may be deemed necessary. Executive meetings are held frequently and are attended by the Premier, the Vice-Premiers and the Secretary-General. Any resolution or order issued by the State Council must first have been adopted by a plenary or an executive meeting of the State Council.

Functions and Powers. The State Council formulates administrative measures, issues decisions and orders and verifies their execution in accordance with the Constitution, laws and decrees. It submits Bills to the National People's Congress or its Standing Committee, co-ordinates and leads the work of the Ministries and Commissions and local administrative organs throughout the country. It revises and annuls inappropriate decisions and orders issued by local administrative organs, puts into effect the national economic plans and provisions of the State budget and controls foreign and domestic trade.

The State Council directs cultural, educational and public health work, administers affairs concerning the nationalities and the Chinese residents abroad. It protects the interests of the State, maintains public order and safeguards the interests of citizens, directs the conduct of external affairs, guides the building up of the defence forces and ratifies the status and boundaries of autonomous chou, counties, autonomous counties, and municipalities. The Council appoints or removes administrative personnel according to provisions of law, and exercises such other functions and powers as are vested in it by the National People's Congress or its Standing Committee.

The State Council appoints and removes the following administrative officers: (1) The Deputy Secretaries-General of the State Council, the Vice-Ministers and Assistant Ministers, the Deputy Heads and Members of Commissions, the Heads and Vice-Heads of Departments and the Directors and Vice-Directors of Bureaux under the Ministries and Commissions, (2) Heads and Deputy Heads of Boards, Directors and Vice-Directors of Bureaux under the People's Councils of Provinces and municipalities under the Ministries and Commissions; (3) Commissioners of Special Administrative offices; (4) Officers in autonomous regions whose positions correspond to those enumerated in (2) and (3) above; (5) Counsellors of Embassy and consuls-general accredited to foreign countries; (6) Presidents and Vice-Presidents of universities and colleges of higher learning; and (7) other officers whose positions are equivalent to those enumerated above.

The Premier directs the work of the State Council and presides over its meetings. He is assisted by Vice-Premiers in his work. The Ministers and Heads of Commissions direct the work of their respective departments. They may issue orders and directives within the jurisdiction of their respective departments and in accordance with laws and decrees, the decisions and orders of the State Council.

The State Council may, when necessary, establish organs directly subordinate to it to take charge of various specific matters. The establishment, merging or abolition of such organs is subject to approval by the Standing Committee on the recommendation of the Premier. It may also establish various administrative organs to assist in the working of the various departments under the State Council. The State Council is responsible to the National People's Congress and reports to it, or when the National People's Congress is not in session, to its Standing Committee. Deputies to the National People's Congress have the right to address questions to the State Council, or to the Ministries and Commissions, which are under obligation to answer.

Appraisal of the State Council. The powers of the State Council are, indeed, very wide and impressive. There is no sphere of administration which it does not control and direct. The Constitution ordains it as the highest executive and administrative organ of the State. It is the creation of the National People's Congress and is responsible to it in the exercise of all its functions and powers, or when the Congress is not in session to its Standing Committee. The responsibility of the Council and the Ministers and Commissions of the Council is further invoked through the medium of questions which the Ministers are required to answer when directed by the deputies of the National People's Congress. But these provisions do not make the system of government so established in China responsible and responsive. The Prime Minister is not the head of the government and he does not lead a team of colleagues who man the administration, formulate the legislative programme, pilot it through the National People's Congress and are collectively and individually responsible for all their acts. The Ministers do not make a team who may owe a personal allegiance to the Premier, although they are the top-ranking leaders of the Communist Party. Nor has the Premier any choice in the selection of his colleagues and he does not control the deputies either through his leadership of the legislative majority or his power of dissolution. So far as the Ministers are concerned the Constitution definitely says that they assist the Premier. In a country where centralism is the key-note of the administrative set up, nay, that of the whole system of society, the Premier and the Ministers both are the mouth-piece of the inner circle of the Party which decides the Party line. It may be democratic centralism, but really it is minus democratic principles and practices. The democratic dictatorship does not permit otherwise.

A country which does not permit the existence of political parties other than the Communist Party, cannot present even the semblance of a responsible government no matter in what colourful phrases the Constitution may describe its structure of government. The responsible system of government demands more than one party. It encourages discussion and criticism to make possible an alternative government. In the People's Republic of China the Constitution safeguards the people's democratic system, suppresses all treasonable and counter-revolutionary activities and punishes all traitors and counter-revolutionaries. It does not, accordingly, permit advocacy of a system of government other than the democratic dictatorship as it is a counter-revolutionary activity and it is a treason to be a counter-revolutionary. And what is the usual punishment for the traitors and counter-revolutionaries?

This apart, there is a striking overlap in membership of the State Council, the Standing Committee of the National Congress and the Politburo of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party. In 1962, Premier Chou En-lai and twelve of his Vice-Premiers "were all regular or alternative Politburo members, while the remaining four Vice-Premiers were in the CCP (Chinese Communist Party). By changing rooms or titles, this group could sit as the top political group of either the Government or the party."⁴ The Premier, the Vice-Premiers and the Secretary-General constitute the inner ring of the State Council and they meet in executive meetings.⁵ The Constitution requires that any resolution or order issued by the State Council must first have been adopted "by a plenary or an executive meeting."⁶ Plenary meetings are held once a month whereas executive meetings are held frequently even once or twice a week. What it exactly happens is that the Party Politburo, which has among its members nearly all those who constitute the inner-ring of the State Council, formulate the decisions. In order to give them a legal shape the executive meeting of the State Council is held. When it is reported to the Standing Committee and the National People's Congress their approval is ipso-facto. Acceptance is always unanimous. The published material, though meagrely issued by the Peking Government, does not refer to any questions or debates in the National People's Congress. If any Deputy does really venture, it relates to the details of fulfilment. "In the last analysis," concludes Allen S. Whiting, "both the NPC (National People's Congress) and its Standing Committee seem to be window-dressing on a constitutional facade, with only the State Council serving important governmental functions at the top level."

CHAPTER V

THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM

Functions of the Judiciary. The set up of the judicial system in China is described in Section VI of Chapter Two of the Constitution and it covers twelve brief Articles including the Procuratorate. The aim of the judiciary, as stated in the Report presented to the First People's Congress, is to provide for cheaper and speedy justice to the citizens. Article 78 of the Constitution says that in administering justice the People's Courts are independent and are subject only to the law. The law of the land is construction of Socialism and in the fulfilment of this fundamental task the whole people are enjoined to mobilize and rally their energies and, at the same time, to oppose enemies of Socialism within and without the country. The judiciary, therefore, like other organs of the State structure, are to educate the citizens in the spirit of devotion to the Fatherland and to the cause of Socialism. While analysing the need of the courts in the USSR, Lenin and Stalin emphasised the necessity of fighting the enemies of Socialism—the enemies of the people, traitors to the country, spies, saboteurs, and wreckers—and to fight for the "consolidation of the new Soviet system to firmly anchor the new socialist discipline among the working people." The Preamble of the Constitution of the People's Republic of China, too, emphasises this and Article 3 of the Organic Law of the People's Courts says, "The People's Courts, in all their activities, educate citizens in loyalty to their country and voluntary observance of law." The oft-repeated Article 19 clearly states that the People's Republic of China safeguards the People's democratic system, suppresses all treasonable and counter-revolutionary activities and punishes all traitors and counter-revolutionaries. The work of the courts in China is accordingly the same as that of Soviet courts. They must severely punish the violators of labour and State discipline and other offenders whose actions are detrimental to the building of Socialist society. It is the Constitutional duty of the citizens in China to abide by the Constitution and the law, uphold the discipline at work, keep public order and respect social ethics.

The judiciary in the People's Republic is not a separate branch of government, but a part of regular administration. The administration of justice is carried on by the law courts in co-operation with the Supreme People's Procuratorate, which exercises procuratorial authority over all departments of the State Council, all local organs of State, persons working in organs of State, and citizens, to ensure observance of law.

Organization of Courts. The judicial authority of the People's Republic of China is exercised by the following Courts:

- (1) Local People's Courts;

- (2) Special People's Courts;
- (3) The Supreme People's Court.

Local People's Courts are divided into three grades: basic people's courts, intermediate people's courts and higher people's courts. The establishment of higher people's courts and special people's courts is determined by the recommendation of the Ministry of Justice and the approval of the State Council. The establishment of intermediate and basic courts is determined by the recommendation of the judicial administrative organs of the provinces, autonomous regions or municipalities directly under the central authority, and the approval of the Councils of the Provinces or municipalities, or of the organs of self-government of the autonomous regions.

The task of the courts is to try criminal and civil cases, and, by judicial process, to punish criminals and settle civil disputes, in order to safeguard the people's democratic system, maintain public order, protect public property, safeguard the rights and lawful interests of citizens, and ensure the successful carrying out of socialist construction and socialist transformation in the country. The courts, in brief, in all their activities educate citizens in loyalty to their country, the socialist society it establishes, and voluntary observance of law.

Article 4 of the Organic Law of the People's Courts asserts that Courts administer justice independently, subject only to the law. It is applied to all citizens equally, irrespective of their nationality, race, sex, occupation, social origin, religious belief, education, property status or length of residence. Citizens of all nationalities have the right to use their own spoken and written languages in court proceedings and courts are to provide interpretation for any party unacquainted with the language commonly used in the locality. Cases are heard in public unless otherwise provided by law. The accused has the right to defence. The court may also, when deemed necessary, appoint a counsel for the accused.

The People's courts carry out the collegiate system in the administration of justice. In cases of first instance, justice is administered by a collegiate bench of a judge and people's assessors with the exception of simple civil cases, minor criminal cases and cases otherwise provided by law. In cases of appeal or protest, justice is administered by a collegiate bench of judges. People's courts at all levels are to set up judicial committees. The tasks of the judicial committees are to sum up judicial experience and to discuss cases of great importance or difficult cases as well as other questions relating to the judicial work. Members of judicial committees of local courts are appointed and removed by the people's councils at the corresponding levels upon the recommendation of the presidents of the local people's courts. Members of Judicial Committee of the Supreme People's Court are appointed and removed by the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress, upon the recommendation of the President of the Supreme Court. Meetings of the judicial committees of different sets of courts are presided over by the presidents of the courts. The Chief Procurators of the People's Procuratorates at the corresponding levels have the right to attend such meetings and participate in the discussions.

An appeal may be brought by a party from a judgment or order made by a local court as a court of first instance to the court at the higher level in accordance with the procedure prescribed by law. The people's procurate may lodge a protest against such a judgment or order before the court at the next higher level in accordance with the procedure prescribed by law.

If a person sentenced to capital punishment considers as erroneous the judgment or order of an intermediate court or a higher court as a court of last instance, he may apply to the court at the next higher level for re-examination. A judgment of a basic court and a judgment or order of an intermediate court, in a case of capital punishment, shall be submitted to the higher court for approval before execution. If the president of a court finds, in a legally effective judgment or order of his court, some definite error in the determination of facts or application of law, he must submit the judgment or order to the judicial committee for disposal. If the Supreme Court finds some definite error in a legally effective judgment or order of any lower court, or if an upper court finds such error in such a judgment or order of a lower court, they have the authority to review the cases themselves or to direct a lower court to conduct a retrial. If the Supreme People's Procuratorate finds some definite error in a legally effective judgment or order of a court at any level, or it finds such error in such a judgment or order of a lower court, they have the authority to lodge a protest against the judgment or order in accordance with the procedure of judicial supervision.

The Supreme People's Court is responsible to the National People's Congress and reports to it, or when the Congress is not in session, to its Standing Committee. Local courts are responsible to the local people's congresses at corresponding levels and report to them. The judicial work of the lower courts is subject to supervision by the upper courts. The judicial administrative work of courts at all levels is directed by the judicial administrative organs.

The term of office of Presidents is for four years. Citizens who are in enjoyment of political rights and have reached the age of 23 years are eligible to be elected Presidents, or appointed Vice-Presidents, Chief Judges of divisions, associate chief judges of divisions, judges and assistant judges. Presidents of local courts are elected by the local Congresses at the corresponding levels. Vice-Presidents, chief judges of divisions, associate chief judges of divisions and judges are appointed and removed by the local councils at the corresponding levels. A people's Congress has the power to remove from office the Presidents of the People's Courts whom they elect.

Citizens who have the right to vote and stand for election and have reached the age of 23 are eligible to be elected people's assessors. Their term of office and the method of their selection at all levels are to be prescribed by the Ministry of Justice. The assessors exercise their functions in the courts, are members of the divisions of the courts in which they participate, and have equal rights with the judges.

Basic People's Courts. Basic People's Courts are County People's Courts and Municipal People's Courts; People's Courts of autonomous counties; People's Courts of municipal districts. A basic court is composed of a President, one or two Vice-Presidents, and Judges. A basic court may set up a criminal division and a civil division, each with a chief judge and, when necessary, associate chief judges. A basic court may, according to the condition of the locality, population and cases, set up people's tribunals. A tribunal is a competent part of the court and its judgments and orders are the judgments and orders of the basic court.

Basic courts take cognisance of civil and criminal cases of first instance, except such cases as are otherwise provided for by laws and decrees. Besides trying cases the courts settle civil disputes and minor criminal cases which do not need a trial, direct the work of conciliation committees and direct the judicial administrative work within their competence.

Intermediate People's Courts. Intermediate courts are established in various areas of a province or autonomous regions, municipalities directly under the central authority, large municipalities and autonomous chou. An intermediate court is composed of a President, one or two Vice-Presidents, chief judges of divisions and judges. It has a criminal division and a civil division, and such other divisions as are deemed necessary.

Intermediate courts take cognisance of:

- (1) Cases of first instance assigned by laws and decrees to their jurisdiction;
- (2) Cases of first instance transferred from the Basic Courts;
- (3) Appeals and protests against judgments and orders of the Basic Courts;
- (4) Protests lodged by the People's Procuratorate in accordance with the procedure of judicial supervision.

Higher People's Courts. Higher Courts are those of provinces, autonomous regions, and municipalities directly under the central authority. A Higher Court is composed of a President, Vice-Presidents, chief judges of divisions, associate chief judges of divisions and judges. The court has criminal division and a civil division and such other divisions as deemed necessary.

Higher People's Courts take cognisance of cases of first instance assigned to their jurisdiction; cases of first instance transferred from lower courts; appeals and protests against judgments and orders of the lower courts; and protests lodged by the procuratorate in accordance with the procedure of judicial supervision.

Special People's Courts. Military Courts, Railway-transport courts and water-transport courts come under the category of Special Courts. Their organization is to be prescribed by the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress.

The Supreme People's Court. The Supreme People's Court is the highest judicial organ. It supervises the judicial work of local courts and special courts. It is composed of a President, Vice-Presidents, Chief Judges of divisions, associate Chief Judges of divisions and Judges. It has a criminal division and a civil division, and such other divisions as are deemed necessary.

The Supreme Court takes cognisance of :

(1) Cases of first instance assigned by laws and decrees to its jurisdiction or which it considers that it should try;

(2) Appeals and protests against judgments and orders of Higher Courts and Special Courts;

(3) Protests lodged by the Supreme People's Procuratorate in accordance with the procedure of judicial supervision.

Chief Procurator and People's Procuratorate. For the whole Republic there is the Supreme People's Procuratorate headed by the Chief Procurator who is elected for four years by the National People's Congress and is removed from office by the same authority. The Supreme People's Procuratorate exercises procuratorial authority over all departments of the State Council, all local organs of State, persons working in organs of State, and citizens, to ensure observance of the law. The Supreme Procuratorate is responsible to the National People's Congress and reports to it, or when the Congress is not in session to its Standing Committee. The Supreme Procuratorate consists of Chief Procurator apart, of the Deputy Chief Procurator, Procurators and other members of the Procuratorial Committee, all appointed and removed by the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress.

Local organs of the people's procuratorate and special people's procuratorates exercise procuratorial authority within the limits prescribed by law. Local organs of the people's procuratorate and the special people's procuratorates work under the leadership of the people's procuratorates at higher levels, and all work under the co-ordinating direction of the Supreme People's Procuratorate. In the exercise of their authority local organs of the people's procuratorate are independent and are not subject to interference of local organs of State.

The institution of the Procuratorate is unique in the judicial system of the People's Republic as it is in the Soviet Russia. The powers of the Chief Procurator are so extensive and his authority is so pervasive that it embraces all organs of administration as well as citizens. "The Soviet prosecutor officer," writes Vyshinsky, "is the watchman of the socialist legality, the leader of the Communist Party and of Soviet authority, the champion of Socialism." Similar is the position of the Chief Procurator in China. In the discharge of his supervisory functions the Chief Procurator has to ensure that there is the correct application and strict execution of the laws by all Ministries and other agencies subordinate to them, as well as by all officials and citizens of the Republic of China.

The work of the Procuratorate is closely associated with the Courts. Being the official guardian of law and consequently that of social legality it is the business of the Procuratorate to investigate all cases of violation of law and other crimes held as anti-revolutionary. The Procuratorate also protects the personal rights of citizens and safeguards the inviolability of their persons. No citizen in China may be arrested except by decision of the People's Court or with the sanction of the People's Procuratorate.

CHAPTER VI

ADMINISTRATIVE AREAS AND THEIR ADMINISTRATION

Administrative Divisions. The People's Republic of China is divided, for purposes of administration, into provinces, autonomous regions, and municipalities directly under the Central authority. The Provinces and autonomous regions are sub-divided into autonomous chou, counties, autonomous counties, and municipalities. The counties and autonomous counties are further divided into hsiang, and towns. Municipalities directly under central authority and other large municipalities are divided into districts. Autonomous chou are divided into counties, autonomous counties and municipalities. Autonomous regions, autonomous chou and autonomous counties are all national autonomous areas. It is, accordingly, complex divisions and sub-divisions.

Administrative set-up. For purposes of administration there have been established people's congresses and people's councils, the former representing the legislative organ and the latter executive, in provinces, municipalities directly under the central authority, counties, municipalities, municipal districts, hsiang, nationality hsiang and towns. Organs of self-government are established in autonomous regions, autonomous, chou and autonomous counties.

Local People's Congress. Local people's congresses at all levels are the organs of government authority in their respective localities. Deputies to the people's congresses of provinces, municipalities directly under the central authority, counties and municipalities divided into districts, are elected by the people's congresses of the next lower level. Deputies to the people's congresses of municipalities not divided into districts, municipal districts, hsiang nationality, hsiang and towns are directly elected by the voters. The number of deputies to local people's congresses and the manner of their elections are prescribed by electoral laws. The term of office of the provincial people's congresses is four years. The term of office of the people's congresses of municipalities directly under the central authority, counties, municipalities, municipal districts, hsiang nationality, hsiang, and towns is two years.

The local people's congresses at every level ensure the observance and execution of laws and decrees in their respective administrative areas, draw up plans for local economic and cultural development and for public work, examine and approve local budgets and financial reports, protect public property, maintain public order, safeguard the rights of citizens and the equal rights of national minorities. The local people's congresses elect, and have power to recall, the members of the people's councils at corresponding levels. The people's congresses at county level and above elect and have power to recall the presidents of people's courts at corresponding levels. The local people's congresses adopt and issue decisions within the limits of the authority prescribed by law. The people's congresses of nationality hsiang may, within the limits of the authority prescribed by law, take specific measures appropriate to the characteristics of the nationalities concerned. The local people's congresses have power to revise or annul inappropriate decisions and orders issued by people's councils at corresponding levels. The people's congresses at county level have power to revise or annul inappropriate decisions issued by people's congresses at the next lower level as well as inappropriate decisions and orders issued by people's councils at the next lower level. Deputies to the people's congresses of provinces, municipalities directly under the Central authority, counties and municipalities divided into districts are subject to supervision by the units which elect them. Deputies to the people's congresses of municipalities not divided into districts, municipalities districts, hsiang, nationality, hsiang, and towns are subject to supervision by their electorates. The electoral units and electorates which elect the deputies to the local people's congresses have power at any time to recall their deputies according to the procedure prescribed by law.

The Councils. Local people's councils, that is local people's government, are the executive organs of local people's congresses at corresponding levels, and are the administrative organs of State in their respective localities. A local people's council is composed, according to its level, of the Provincial Governor and Deputy Provincial Governors, or the Mayor and Deputy Mayors, or the county head and deputy county heads, or the district head, and deputy district heads, or the hsiang head and deputy hsiang heads, or the town head and deputy town heads, as the case may be, together with council members. The term of office of a local people's council is the same as that of the people's Congress at corresponding level. The organization of local people's councils is determined by law.

The local people's councils administer their respective areas within the limits of authority prescribed by law. The local people's councils carry out the decisions issued by the people's congresses at corresponding levels and decisions and orders issued by administrative organs of State at higher levels. The local people's councils issue decisions and orders within the limits of authority prescribed by law. The people's councils at county level and above direct the work of all their subordinate departments and of people's councils at lower levels, as well as appoint or remove personnel of organs of State according to provisions of law. The people's councils at county level and above have power to suspend the carrying out of inappropriate decisions of people's congresses at the next lower level, and to revise or annul inappropriate orders and directives issued by their subordinate departments, and inappropriate decisions and orders issued by people's councils at lower level. The local people's councils are responsible to the people's congresses at corresponding levels and at the administrative organs of State at the next higher level, and report to them. The local people's councils throughout the country are administrative organs of State, and are subordinate to and under the co-ordinating direction of the State Council.

Organs of Self-Government. The organs of self-government of all autonomous regions, autonomous chou, and autonomous counties are formed in accordance with the basic principles governing the organization of local organs of State as described above. The form of each organ of self-government may be determined in accordance with the wishes of the majority of the people of the nationality or nationalities enjoying regional autonomy. In all autonomous regions, autonomous chou and autonomous counties where a number of nationalities live together, each nationality is entitled to appropriate representation on the organs of self-government.

The organs of self-government of all autonomous regions, autonomous chou and autonomous counties exercise the functions and powers of local organs of State as in the case of local people's congresses and local people's councils. The organs of self-government of all autonomous regions, autonomous chou and autonomous counties exercise autonomy within the limits of authority prescribed by the Constitution and the law. They administer their own local finances, organise their local public security forces in accordance with the military system of the State. They may draw up statutes governing the exercise of autonomy or separate regulations suited to the political, economic and cultural characteristics of the nationality or nationalities in a given area, which statutes and regulations are subject to endorsement by the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress.

In performing their duties, organs of self-government employ the spoken or written language or languages commonly used in the locality. The higher organs of State are required to fully safeguard the right of organs of self-government of all autonomous regions, autonomous chou and autonomous counties to exercise autonomy, and should assist the various national minorities in their political, economic and cultural development.

CHAPTER VII

THE COMMUNIST PARTY OF CHINA

Leader and Core in the Country's Life. The general programme of the Chinese Communist Party declares, "As the highest form of class organization, the party must strive to play a correct role as the leader and core in every aspect of the country's life." Liu Shao-chi, in his report on the Draft Constitution of the People's Republic of China presented to the First National People's Congress,¹ maintained that the leadership of the Communist Party of China was essential not only to the Chinese people's democratic revolution, but also to the realization of socialism. It must also combat any tendency to departmentalism, which reduces the party's role and weakens its unity.

There is no mention of the Party in the Constitution of the People's Republic of China. But though the Party exists outside the government, yet as a teacher and leader it functions as the prime force inside the government. In the politics of China there is only one party which operates and since it is clearly the decision-making centre and implementing organization to the realization of socialism, it brooks no rival in its monopoly of power. Its members staff all the key positions in government and society. "Explicit injunctions weld them into a disciplined body under central direction from party organizations and officials at parallel or higher levels. Its leaders decide government policy, regardless of their titles or constitutionally vested responsibilities. Its ideology is the only officially propagated doctrine, mandatory for members and non-members alike." Party members are not to limit their loyalties just to government and thereby be the tools of "departmentalism." They must respectfully and rigidly accept the higher dictates of Party. The rules of the Party Constitution prescribe, "Party decisions must be carried out unconditionally. Individual party members shall obey the party organization, the minority shall obey the majority, the lower party organs shall obey the higher party organs, and all constituent party organs throughout the country shall obey the National Party Congress and the Central Committee."²

Democratic Centralism. This is democratic centralism. Article 2 of the Constitution of the People's Republic of China also emphasises the practice of democratic centralism within the structure of the government. It says, "The National People's Congress, the local people's congresses and other organs of state practise democratic centralism."— In his Report on the Draft Constitution, Liu Shao-chi explained this provision in the Constitution and said, "Our system of democratic centralism is explained by the fact that the exercise of state power is unified and concentrated in the system of people's congresses...., we Marxist-Leninists have long since publicly declared that we stand for centralisation....In the Draft Constitution, we have combined a high degree of centralism with a high degree of democracy. Our political system has a high degree of centralism but it is based on a high degree of democracy." Mao Tse-tung, in his book On Coalition Government, stated that the political system of China is "at once democratic and centralised, that is, centralised on the basis of democracy and democratic under centralized guidance." Democratic centralism is, therefore, a keynote of Communist doctrine and it is applied meticulously at all levels, governmental and social.

The democratic aspects of "democratic centralism" are manifested in free discussions before decisions are taken and in elections of higher bodies by lower groups. Elections are unanimous otherwise it creates factionalism, and decisions once arrived at must be obeyed vigorously and regularly. Deviation therefrom is tantamount to indiscipline which is a heinous crime in Communist ideology. The General Programme of the Party repeats at every step that "the party is a united militant organization, welded together by a discipline which is obligatory on all its members. And members of the Party, as said earlier, staff all the key positions in government and society. To sum up, the Chinese Communist Party, which for all intents and purposes means the Politburo, and more appropriately its Standing Committee, is the ultimate authority for all political decisions, although others may be politically vested with public responsibility. It will be instructive to repeat that the State Council, the Standing Committee and the Politburo present a striking overlap in membership. In 1962, Premier Chou En-lai and twelve of the sixteen Vice-Premiers were all regular or alternate Politburo members, while the remaining four Vice-Premiers were in the Central Committee. "By changing rooms or titles, this group could sit as the top political group of either the government or the party." This is democratic centralism in actual practice and it is the most important doctrine of communism.

The Chinese Communist Party. In 1921, thirteen anarchists, radicals and Marxists met in Shanghai and established the First Congress of the Chinese Communist Party. In 1951, their number had grown to 5.8 million and in another decade this number went up to 17 million. Although the Chinese Communist Party is the largest Communist Party in the world, yet it still comprises only 2 per cent of China's total population. The membership is strictly limited. Anyone who has attained the age of eighteen and who does work and does not "exploit the labour of others" is eligible to become a member. But a prospective member, according to the rules of the Party, must be recommended by two full members of the Party. If the Party branch as well as the next higher Party Committee approves, he is given a probationary status. After a satisfactory completion of one year of "elementary education," during which his "political qualities" are carefully observed, he is admitted as a full member of that group which approved him first for the probationary status.

Organization of the Party. At the bottom is the local cell and the local branch chooses delegates to county or municipal party Congress, which in turn elects provincial party Congress. The provincial Congress sends delegates to a National Party Congress which then chooses a 196 man Central Committee as "the highest leading body of party organization... when the National Party Congress is not in session." It means that the Central Committee directs the entire work of the Party when the National Party Congress is not in session. The elections at all levels are to be held periodically according to the Party Constitution. But in practice they prove to be less than periodic and at the higher levels, therefore, the party positions are held beyond their constitutional tenure. The Party Congresses are to elect the National Party Congress after every five years. But actually, only two such congresses have been elected during the last two decades.⁵

The National Party Congress, consisting of more than one thousand members, is elected for five years and it must meet every year unless the Central Committee decides that "extraordinary conditions" do not permit such a meeting. There has been only one meeting since 1956. It means that the Central Committee has exercised its extraordinary power of not convening annual meetings of the National Party Congress for more than a decade now. Since the Congress elects the Central Committee "and therefore is legally superior to it, failure to convene the parent body removes the problem of co-responsibility to the membership at large. In this manner, reality mirrors theory, reversing the image in the process." In fact, the Congress does not elect the Central Committee. It is the outgoing Politburo and to be more precise its Standing Committee of seven men, which actually select the Central Committee. The Standing Committee of the Politburo includes the top-ranking leaders, such as Mao Tse-tung, Liu Shao-chi, and Chou En-lai, and the choice actually rests with them if not with Mao alone.

The Central Committee does not even formulate policy. It is a numerous body which meets once or twice yearly and that, too, for only two to three weeks. It is on record that at times of particular or prolonged crisis, the Central Committee does not meet at all. No Central Committee plenum was held in 1960, despite the marked deterioration of Sino-Soviet relations and the decline of agricultural productivity that had begun in 1958. When the tenth plenum of the Central Committee met in 1962, only four days were allotted for discussion of Party as well as national affairs. Taking into account the infrequency and short duration of its meetings, the Central Committee functions mainly as a sounding board for previously determined policy.

The Politburo with a membership of twenty is the core of the important decision makers and "probably acts as a controlling nucleus for the larger body." The Politburo decides and transmits these decisions to the Central Committee and it endorses them to become a party line. Consistent with the principle of democratic centralism it is obligatory on all to accept and implement all such decisions without demur. Here is a matter of fact summing up of the position and functions of the Central Committee: "...the Central Committee is too large and meets too infrequently and too briefly to be the real decision-making centre of the CCP

5. In 1945 and 1956.

(Chinese Communist Party). Yet it is much more than a rubber stamp for the Politburo. It gives legitimacy to Politburo decisions in accordance with the party constitution. It transmits decisions to lower levels linking the peak of the political pyramid with its mass base. It provides status to worthy party members and, finally, offers a proving ground for potential leader."

Politburo, like various other Party organs, is a numerous body^a and has, accordingly, its Standing Committee which constitutes the brain trust of the Politburo. And it consists of men of the stature of Mao Tse-tung, Chou En-lai, Chou Teh, Ch'en Yun, Teng Hsiao-p'ing and Lin Piao. With this galaxy of Party men, it is but natural that the Standing Committee should constitute the apex of national policy formulation.

Other Central Committee organs are the Secretariat and Departments, as of Rural Work, Industrial Work Propaganda, Organization, Social Affairs, Control Committee, etc. The Secretariat monitors the execution of policy on a daily basis through the Party Central organs, bureaus, and committees. The Control Commission, according to the Party rules, is empowered "to examine and deal with cases of violation of the party constitution, party discipline, Communist ethics, and the state laws and decrees on the part of party members; to decide on or cancel disciplinary measures against party members; and to deal with appeals and complaints from party members." It consists of seventeen regular and four alternate members. In September 1962, the tenth plenary session of the Eighth Central Committee decided to enlarge the membership in order "to strengthen the work of the party Control Commission." It emphasises the importance of the Control Commission which is entrusted with a duty to combat "improper" attitudes and "sectarian" tendencies of the Party members. The party rules enjoin that every Party member "has the duty to report to the party control committees whatever he knows about infractions against party rules, party discipline, Communist morality, national laws and decrees on the part of other party members. Moreover, it is his duty to help the party control committee struggle against such phenomena." Control committees exist at every Party level, except in primary branches and cells.

Government of Japan

CHAPTER I

THE HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Geography

The Japanese archipelago, situated off the east of the Asian Continent, consists of the four principal islands of Honshu, Hokkaido, Shikoku, and Kyushu, plus thousands of small islands. In area Japan is 369,662 square kilometres or 142,727 square miles (only for the area under actual administration of Japan) and it stretches 2,400 kilometres or 1,500 miles in a north, south-west direction, between 27 and 45 degrees north. Japan is roughly one-twentieth the size of the United States of America, one-eighth of the size of India, but is slightly larger than that of the United Kingdom or Italy. Japan lies in the temperate zone and enjoys abundant foliage. It offers much in the way of scenic beauty, with many lakes, rivers and mountains.

Japan is 80 per cent mountainous. There are 250 mountains higher than 2,000 metres. The highest is Mt. Fuji which towers to 3,776 metres. These mountains are the results of the extreme instability of the earth's crust. There are still about 50 active volcanoes. Hot springs are counted by thousands. As very few plains can be found in Japan, they are of great economic import. It is here that a great deal of food must be produced to support a very large population and ever expanding industries. The cultivated land is 16 per cent of the total land area.

Japan has many rivers, but they are in general short and mostly unnavigable. They are most useful for irrigation and for hydro-electric power. With an extremely irregular coast line of 26,500 kilometres, Japan abounds in good natural harbours which are a great aid to industry, communication and trade. By the end of World War I, she had achieved the position of the world's third greatest naval and maritime power.

The climate in Japan is favourable for the growing of rice, the basic agricultural product in the Japanese diet. Where snowfall is frequent there are no winter crops, but in Southern Japan, the growing season is quite long. Prominent features of the Japanese climate are the rainy season in early summer typhoons. The rainy season is caused by low pressure areas, originating in Formosa, and the Yangtze Valley of China. Rainfall ranges from 1,000 to 2,500 mm. annually.

Japan is thus an island empire characterised by complex geographical features and this fact has profoundly affected the political character of the country during the past two thousand years and more. In the first place, the island and the mountains make land communications pretty difficult and consequently have produced regional outlook and psychology of the people. Each region has its own distinct history and traditions and possessed in the past some sort of political identity too. This sort of localism and political fragmentation disappeared after the Restoration in 1868, when Japan was unified for the first time in her history. Yet, this outlook did not disappear altogether from the minds of the people. Their political behaviour and, as such, the practical politics of the country are still prominently influenced by the historical legacy of the political decentralisation and localism.

Secondly, Japan's insularity provided for her a well defined national frontier which created amongst her people a sense of group identity and strong nationalist feelings. Japan's nationalism is proverbial. Then, unlike Korea which is physically contiguous to China, the Japanese have developed their own culture by selecting only those elements of Chinese civilisation which suited their genius and served their needs. In due course such elements "were assimilated into Japanese culture so completely and in such a manner as to lose their original identity, frequently giving rise to products far different from, and even superior to original." The cultural homogeneity of the Japanese has produced such a sense of social solidarity amongst them that at no stage of Japan's history there has been development of any kind of racial antagonism. "Racism, therefore, has been unknown throughout her history and racial problems have never arisen in Japanese politics for racial groups have never existed to form a minority of any sort." According to the latest available statistics, Japan has a population of 9,71,90,000² out of which only 0.7 per cent belong to registered minority groups. "There is no other major nation," writes Ward, "with so small an admixture of identifiable minority elements." This also helps to explain, he further adds, "the strong nationalism frequently displayed by the Japanese in modern times. Their geographical isolation, common language and long history combine with racial identity to facilitate the development of a very strong "in group" feeling against foreigners. The result is a nation which although subject to a number of domestic cleavages, has in the past usually presented a strong and united front to the rest of the world."³ Nature has also endowed Japan with a degree of National Security. Prior to 1945, no one had ever successfully invaded Japan since the pre-historic times. Her national development was, therefore, achieved without the disruptive effects of foreign invasions and in accordance with the expression of the native genius. "This fact," according to Ward, "has had two prime consequences for the Japanese. First, it has enabled them to turn on and off almost at will the stream of intercourse with the Asian countries or the rest of the world. It made possible, for example, the effective adoption of deliberate policy of national seclusion for almost 250 years prior to 1854. Second, it has enabled the Japanese to concentrate exclusively and almost fiercely on domestic political issues, domestic power struggles and internecine strife with little or no concern for the effect that might have on the external safety of the nation. National Security carried to this extent is unparalleled among the other great states of modern history."⁴

The People

The origin of the Japanese is shrouded in mystery. There is no conclusive proof or definite evidences are available to determine how and when the original Japanese came to settle in the archipelago. "However, of one thing there is no doubt whatever. Even at the dawn of history the Japanese people were already a mixed race and not of a single racial stock."⁵ The first people to settle on the islands were the Ainu in the neolithic period. As to who they were and from where did they actually come, it is not known. During the stone-age the Ainu population were displaced and gradually driven northward by successive migrations of Mongoloid people who came from Mongolia and Manchuria through Korea. At a much later period came the migration of the Han people and this continued down into the early stages of Japan's historic period, "but numerically they constituted only a minor addition." Thus, the Japanese people are of a very heterogeneous origin, "combining practically all the major strains of the human race, namely Caucasoid, Negroid, Mongoloid and all other variations, mixtures and mutations."⁶ In spite of their hybrid origin, the Japanese are today a remarkably homogeneous nation with a common language and common culture and common way of life acquired and transmitted in the course of a long common history.

Japan is one of the world's most literate nations. As early as 1886, three to four years of elementary education were required for all Japanese children. In 1908, this was increased to six years and since 1947, nine years of combined elementary and junior secondary education is compulsory. It comes to practically universal literacy when 97-98 per cent of the total population are literate. In Great Britain and the United States of America the percentage of literacy comes to 90. In most of the countries of Asia literacy ranges between 20 and 30 per cent.

Japan's rapid rise and attaining meritorious stature in the field of science and technology has been regarded as unparalleled even by any Western nation. Since the late nineteenth century Japan has produced a number of scientists of huge repute whose eminent contributions had attracted the attention of the scientific world. Before World War I, Dr. Hantaro Nagaoka developed a theory of atomic structure anticipating the discovery of the atomic nucleus. In 1934, Dr. Hideki Yukawa postulated on theoretical grounds the possible existence of mass (meson), intermediate between a proton and electron.

In the development of technology Japan made amazing strides. By the end of World War I, she had achieved the position of the world's third greatest naval and military power. The automatic power loom invented by Sakichi Toyoda in 1930, revolutionised the Japanese textile industry thereby paralysing Lancashire in her own home market. Japan also led the world in the production of synthetic fibre. The heavy industry, which was slow in its development in the early stages, made rapid growth since World War I, and in spite of the heavy damage on its productive facilities and resources caused by Japan's involvement in World War II, she had made amazing recovery. The index of industrial production increased by 2.7 times in the seven years from 1955 to 1962.

But agriculture still accounts for 27 per cent of total employed persons in Japan and this proportion is larger than those of Western nations. Japan being a group of small volcanic islands with countless hills and mountains, there is little arable land—60,720 square kilometres or 16 per cent of the total land area. Formerly, Japanese farmers earned just a small income from land by intensive cultivation of tiny plots of land. In recent years, an intensified cultivation, use of better seed and improved fertilizers and machines has brought about great increase in crop yields, but the average income per capita engaged in agriculture is still low. The income that can be attributed to the agricultural population is as small as 10 per cent of the total national income. And the income gap between agriculture and other industries is one of the social problems in Japan, which created a marked impact together with the imbalance created by small enterprises on the political behaviour of the people.

There are three major religions in Japan, Shintoism, Buddhism and Christianity. Shintoism is the traditional religion of ancestor worship. It offers worship to the imperial ancestors and the ancestral spirits, and, accordingly, its association with the mythology of the origin of the Japanese nation made it an accepted religion of the government. In 1868, immediately after the Meiji Restoration, the government established a Shinto office and declared Shinto Shrine as a national institution. The Goddess enshrined in the Central Shrine was Amaterasu-Omikami (Heaven shining—Great Goddess) believed to be the founder of the Japanese nation. Shintoism, therefore, instilled in the Japanese religious worship of the nation which accounted for their extreme patriotism and inconceivable sacrifices which the Japanese made and were called upon to make for the integrity and supremacy of the nation. But since 1947, Shinto does not remain a government religion and has been reduced to the same status as all other religious institutions in Japan are.

Buddhism came to Japan from India through China and Korea in 538 A.D. It has the largest following in the country (65,114,000 in 1962) and it has exercised a great influence on the social institutions and customs of the country and its people. It has also greatly contributed to the promotion of learning and arts.

Christianity was first introduced in Japan by Saint Francis Xavier, a Jesuit Father, when he came to Kyushu in 1549. It spread quite rapidly at first with the encouragement of some feudal lords, but in the latter half of the sixteenth century, it was banned. It was not until the middle of the nineteenth century, when Japan opened its doors to foreign nations, that Christianity returned. Christians, both foreign missionaries and Japanese, became very active and the number of believers in Christianity has steadily increased. In 1962, they numbered 858,083. Christianity is regarded as representing Western civilisation which modernised all aspects of Japanese life after the Meiji Restoration.

Constitutional Development.

There are three stages which cover the development of Japan's constitutional history—from the dawn of history to 1185 A.D., from 1185 to 1868, and the third from 1868 onwards. Chitoshi Yanaga describes the three stages as pre-feudal period, the feudal period, and the post-feudal period. An insight into these three stages serves “as a background and setting, of past and present Japanese politics and government.”

The primitive Japanese society was a confederation of clans, each composed of households claiming origin from a common ancestor and led by a common chieftain. Around the 5th century B.C., strong and well-organized kingdoms developed in the Kyushu and Kinki (Osaka-Kayoto) areas. One of them was ruled by the House of Yamato. The present Imperial family is descended from this House. Around 200 A.D., the power and influence of the House of Yamato began to increase rapidly. By the beginning of the fourth century, the Japanese became a unified nation as a result of the merger of small states with an Emperor as their head. But the authority of the Emperor was neither direct nor absolute. It was indirectly exercised through the chiefs of the clans. This condition of diffused political power continued until 645, when Japan entered the second stage of the pre-feudal development. This stage extends up to 1185, when feudalism had been completely established. During this stage the national unity was further strengthened by taking away the political power from the clan chiefs and consolidating it in the Emperor.

Round the beginning of the fifth century Japan had greatly come under the influence of Chinese civilisation by borrowing her culture as well as institutions. In 604, the Regent Prince Shotoku composed in Chinese his famous “Seventeen Article Constitution” which incorporated Chinese exhortations enjoining on the officials harmony, obedience, and honesty in the administration of public affairs. Consistent with Confucian precepts, the ideology of centralised monarchy was emphasised in the Shotoku Charter. Article 12 provided for oneness of the Emperor and supremacy of his authority.

So profound was the Chinese influence on Shotoku that the ruler adopted for himself the same title, the Wa, as it was used by the Chinese Emperor. This title continued to be used for a little more than a century when the Wa ruler of Japan incurred the displeasure of the Emperor of China. In a message to the Emperor of China the ruler of Japan had innocuously thus written, “The Son of Heaven in the land where the sun rises addresses a letter to the son of Heaven in the land where the sun sets.” It enraged the Chinese Emperor. He considered such an address derogatory to his position and might and, therefore, immediately directed his courtiers that such discourteous messages in future should not be brought to his attention. The Japanese Emperor felt insulted and discarded the title of Wa. But the Japanese invariably since then referred to their country as “the land of the rising sun,” Jile-pen in Chinese and Nippon in Japanese. This is how the country became Japan.

Then came the Great Reform of 646, which aimed to redistribute the economic power in favour of the Central Government by abolishing all hereditary guilds and depriving local magnates of the manors and serfs which they had appropriated to themselves. Governors were appointed, communications were improved and made safer. Registers of population were drawn up and land was redistributed according to the "mouth-share-field," that is, each household was allotted land in proportion to the number of the people of each household. Old taxes and forced labour were abolished and a system of commuted tax in kind was set up. This process of centralizing the authority of the monarch was based upon the Chinese doctrine, "under the heavens there is no land which is not the King's land. Among the holders of land there is none who is not the king's vassal."

It took well over half a century for the reforms to come to complete fruition. According to the Shinto injunction the palace of the Emperor was required to be changed after his death and consequently the Yamato Court maintained no fixed residence. In 710 this custom was abandoned and a permanent Japanese capital was constructed at Nara, near the present city of Kyoto thereby establishing a Central Government. The Central Government took the model from China with court ranks and an elaborate system of legal code.

In this way the Great Reform initiated in 646 finally helped to establish a powerful monarchy in Japan. Both Confucian and Shinto doctrines were used to raise the prestige of the Imperial power. Shinto worship was actually given precedence over mere administrative matters and it was regarded as the most important business of the State. The Emperor, accordingly, combined in himself three functions. He was the high priest of the nation, the ruler exercising sovereign power over the people and their lands, and the Commander-in-Chief of the nation's military forces.

But towards the end of the ninth century there appeared conditions which helped to reverse the existing order. Native traditions of clan privilege and local autonomy reasserted themselves to imperil the Imperial rule. The unprecedented ascendancy in power of the Fujiwara clan aside, the great increase in the number of the tax-exempt manors, and the rise of military nobility in the provinces were important factors which helped to diminish the power and influence of the monarch. From the beginning the lands of the church and certain officials were exempt from the payment of tax. The Emperor in his bid to encourage reclamation of land would temporarily make it tax free but in the long run decreed all such exemptions permanent. Provincial and court officials were granted tax-free manors in compensation for their services. The Emperor would also, very often, make gifts of land to his courtiers. With such an increasing number of tax-free possessions, the entire burden of tax fell upon the non-exempt small-holders. They also found an escape by commending their lands to exempt-holders and in this way started the vicious circle. Even the manor nobles did not hesitate to resort to the same device. "Thus, hierarchical structure of vassals—commendors and commendees—came into being. The Fujiwara Princes of the court and Toadiji (temple) were among the greatest immune land holders of the country and thousands of the Emperor's subjects looked to them for protection from the imperial tax-gatherer."

With depleted exchequer the authority of the Emperor declined. Administrative supervision and police protection outside the capital became deplorably inadequate and virtually there was no protection to life and property. Many manor-owners began to maintain peasants as their private soldiers to safeguard their holdings and, thus, came into existence the Samurai, the warrior class. At a later stage, the nobles, who out of dissatisfaction with the Fujiwara rule left the court and settled in the outlying areas, became the leaders of the warrior class, and a most important segment of the society. They belonged to the Taira and Minamoto clans. But both these clans soon clashed with each other for supremacy and control of the provinces. In 1192, Yoritomo, head of the Minamoto clan, defeated the Taira clan and established his final supremacy. Yoritomo's Shogunate, military government, assumed all administrative functions that had hitherto belonged to the Emperor. Thus, "after a period of nearly a century of chaos and fighting, peace and order were finally restored. But the usefulness of the court aristocracy was now at an end. In its place appeared a feudal system under the domination of the military which lasted for nearly seven centuries leaving a deep impress upon the character of the people and their ideas, institutions and behaviour."

Feudalism, 1192—1868

During the feudal period, when the warrior class, Samurai, held the political power instead of the nobility, the Imperial Family was rendered politically impotent though never eliminated from the political scene. Indeed, they were ever in the look-out for an opportunity "to get control of the person of the Emperor because whoever controlled him could rule in his name and thus acquire an aura of legitimacy."⁹ After the death of the second successor to Yoritomo, the Hojo clan came to power. It extended and strengthened the military government and even the manors of the nobility remained free from Samurai administration.

The decentralised feudalism which emerged after the disappearance of the nobility and lasted till the beginning of the seventeenth century was characterized by vigour and simplicity of administration. Private property was fully entrenched. The relationship between the lord and the vassals was stressed "to the point of extolling and elevating loyalty to one's master as the highest virtue, for which no sacrifice was too great." Laws were simplified and justice was administered with speed and impartiality. The great achievement of the Hojo regime was the repulse of two Mongol invasions in 1274 and 1281. But the Samurai heroes responsible for repulsing the Mongols demanded rewards as a compensation for their sacrifices. It was not possible to meet such a demand due to the financial difficulties of the Shogunate. The dissatisfied war heroes revolted and the local administration began to break down. It was a green signal for the Imperial court to make a bid for the restoration of power by overthrowing the Shogunate. Their efforts succeeded and the Imperial rule was restored once more.

But it was short-lived. Fief-hungry barons found an opportunity for satisfying their ambitions. The Ashikaga clan began to defy the Imperial court and it was joined by other Samurai. This led to the establishment of two Imperial courts, the Northern Court and the Southern Court. The Ashikaga clan established a military government at Muromachi, Koyto, and supported the Northern court. For some time, armed strife continued between the two rival courts when in 1590 order was finally resorted to by Hideyoshi Toyotomi. He succeeded in bringing national unity and sought to extend Japanese influence overseas. Hideyoshi's work of pacifying and uniting the country was consolidated by Ieyasu Tokugawa, founder of Tokugawa Shogunate.

The Tokugawa family ruled Japan for a period of 264 years. The centralised political structure of feudalism under the Tokugawa regime was in fact government by the Samurai. The successive Shoguns, supreme military commanders, were appointed by the Emperor from the Tokugawa family, and they ruled the whole nation. Under the command of the Shogunate the feudal lords governed their domains with absolute power over their people and property. It was during this period that Japan adopted a policy of seclusion which practically closed her doors to the outside world and, thus, the nation lost contacts with foreign States.

Under the Tokugawa Shogunate there gradually emerged a rigid class distinction between the Samurai, farmers, artisans, and merchants. The division of the people into four distinct classes was accompanied by inequalities of treatment and the worst sufferers in this respect were the peasants, although they outranked the artisans and the merchants in the social hierarchy. The Samurai, who were the smallest in number, held political power and enjoyed all kinds of political and social privileges. The peasants were not permitted to leave their lands and were burdened with heavy taxes. However, one redeeming feature of this era was that unprecedented peace under the Tokugawa led to the growth of manufacturing industries and commerce. New cities developed and prosperity of the merchants increased their social influence.

It was towards the middle of the eighteenth century that the Japanese people came into contact with the Western nations for the first time. The first to come were the Portuguese traders in 1754 to be followed by the Jesuit missionaries and a group of Spaniards. Trade relations with the Dutch and the British were also established. The missionaries were successful in converting a sizable number of the Japanese, particularly in the South, to Christianity. The activities of the missionaries, however, alarmed the Shogunate as they apprehended political interference by the Western powers in Japan through religious infiltration. Christianity was, accordingly, banned in Japan and the country was closed to all foreigners, except the Dutch and the Chinese traders, who were confined to a small land at Nagasaki.

The Meiji Restoration, 1868

The end of the eighteenth century witnessed vital changes in the political and social life of Japan. The country was being put to an increasing pressure for opening her ports to foreign ships and there appeared to be no alternative left to the Government but to revise the previous decision. There were also quite visible signs everywhere indicating decay of the feudalistic social and political structure. Historic clan enmities against the Tokugawa became significantly prominent. All these factors coupled with the dissatisfaction of the Samurai on their deteriorating economic and social status gave birth to a movement for the restoration of the power to the Emperor. The movement was strengthened when in 1854, Japan abandoned the policy of isolation and concluded a treaty of amity with the United States to be soon followed by similar treaties with other European countries. The enemies of the Shogun found a favourable climate to impress upon the Japanese people that such treaties posed a serious threat to the integrity of Japan and would lead to Western imperialistic exploitation. The movement gained momentum and its leaders rallied round the Emperor by proclaiming "Revere the Emperor, expel the barbarians." The spark set in the slogan had the desired effect. The Tokugawa regime ultimately collapsed despite the frantic efforts to keep it in power. In 1867, Shogun Tokugawa declared the end of the military government, bakufu, and in 1868, the sixteen-year-old Emperor Mutshito ascended the throne.

Immediately after the assumption of power by the Emperor the "Five Article Charter Oath" was issued which summed up the policies of the new regime. Its immediate issuance was deemed imminent in order to calm the apprehension of the rival factions that were vitiating the atmosphere. "The Five Article Charter Oath" provided that:

- (1) Deliberative assemblies shall be widely established and all matters decided by the public opinion;
- (2) The whole nation shall unite as one in carrying out the administration of the affairs of the State;
- (3) Every person shall be given the opportunity to pursue his own calling so that there may be no discontent;
- (4) Evil customs and usages of the past shall be discarded and justice shall be based upon the just laws of Nature;
- (5) Wisdom and knowledge shall be sought throughout the world in order to strengthen the foundations of the imperial rule.

The period intervening the Restoration and promulgation of the Meiji Constitution (1868-89) is described as pre-parliamentary. This period, according to Chitoshi Yanaga, "was an interlude, a transition stage, between feudalism and constitutionalism which was dominated by a small oligarchy under an interim system of absolute monarchy."¹¹ Every effort was made to stabilize monarchy and to make the Emperor's writ run throughout the length and breadth of the country. The Imperial capital was moved from Kyoto where it had been located since 794, to Edo, the capital of Tokugawa Shoguns. And to mark the transfer of political authority, Edo was renamed Tokyo, and the Shogun's palace was taken over by the Emperor. A "constitution" was also promulgated in 1868 which provided for the revival of the Chinese-inspired institutions of pre-feudal epoch. The traditional division of society into four classes—Samurai, peasant, artisan and merchant—together with the rights and privileges of the Samurai and the Tokugawa fiefs were abolished as also the old land tenure system. In their place, "came mass public education, conscription, equality before the law, railroads, modern industrial plants, technology, a merchant marine, and a modern army and navy."¹²

11. Japanese People and Politics, op. cit., p. 118.

But it was not a smoother switch over at least in the first decade after the Restoration. Opposition was intense on all sides. The sweeping changes from feudalism to oligarchically-run absolute monarchy headed by a minor Emperor, were subjects of bitter dispute. The people were neither friendly nor sympathetic to the new regime and its economic and political policies. Opposition within the government itself made its task uneasy and hampered the stability of the new regime. In 1877, discontented Samurai rebelled. The entire attention of the government was, therefore, in the first decade of its career, devoted to putting down peasant uprisings and beating down obstructive opposition.

Conditions, however, settled down when the Satsuma Rebellion was put down "as the last futile attempt to use force against the government." The time was, accordingly, opportune to determine finally the form of government which should mould and shape the destinies of the nation. But there was fundamental disagreement on this issue. The opposition was pretty vocal in demanding an early establishment of a representative parliament and organised political parties manifesting the will of the people. The government was reluctant to accede to this demand in the beginning, but ultimately yielded to the irresistible pressure and ceaseless agitation of the opposition. In 1881, the government declared that a constitution providing for elective parliament would be promulgated in 1890. Immediately after this announcement, political parties came into existence. The first was the Liberal Party which came into being on October 29, 1881 and it was followed by the Constitutional Progressive Party on March 15, 1882. Only four days later, on March 19, the Constitutional Imperial Party appeared on the scene. "All the parties concentrated their energies on influencing the substance of the Constitution, each one intent on making its views prevail."

Prince Ito Hirobumi was entrusted with the task of formulating the Constitution. He went to Europe to study the working of the constitutional systems of the West and returned to Japan after a stay of eighteen months. He visited almost all the countries of Europe but he came with a conviction that a Constitution similar to Prussia would best suit Japan. In March 1884, the Bureau for the study of the Constitution in the Ministry to Imperial Household was set up and it functioned under the direct supervision of Ito. It took two years to complete the research preliminary to the drafting of the Constitution. The drafting Committee consisted of Ito Hirobumi, Ito Miyoji, Inoue Tsuyoshi, and Kaneko Kentaro. "The committee carried on the work on the little Island of Natsushima off Yokosuka where they lived in isolation, out of contact even with their families. Absolute secrecy was maintained to prevent any premature publicity which might lead to obstruction and delay if not failure. Only two foreign authorities were consulted for advice, Dr. Herman Raessler, a German Professor of Constitutional Law at the Tokyo Imperial University, and Sir Francis Taylor Piggot, a British diplomat. The Drafting Committee completed its labours in 1888, and the Draft Constitution was submitted to the Privy Council for its approval. Prince Ito Hirobumi was then the President of the Privy Council. After receiving its approval, the Constitution was bestowed on the Japanese nation as a gracious gift from the Emperor on February 11, 1889. The Meiji Constitution remained in force until Japan's surrender to the Allied Powers.

The Meiji Constitution, 1889

The Constitution of 1889 "was a splendid manifesto of the Shinto revival." Article I provided, "The Empire of Japan shall be reigned over and governed by a line of Emperors unbroken for ages eternal." Article III stated that "The Emperor is sacred and inviolable." There were to be Ministers "to give advice to the Emperor and be responsible to him." Prince Ito stoutly opposed the principle of ministerial responsibility. He maintained that responsibility of the Ministers to the Diet would mean denial of the principle that the Emperor really ruled. "Lest the power of the purse be used by the Diet to control the executive, Ito's Constitution provided that when the Diet failed to enact the budget, the government would carry out the budget of the preceding year."¹

The Emperor was, thus, the central figure in the structure of government established by the Meiji Constitution and the State of Japan was intelligible only in terms of its Imperial institution. The Ministers simply advised the Emperor and it was for His Majesty to decide. In fact, all the powers of the State, executive, legislative and judicial, were concentrated in the person of the Emperor. Prof. Fuji Shinchi, an eminent authority on Constitutional Law, while summing up the powers and position of the Emperor, observed, "The supreme power of the Tenno (Emperor) over state affairs covers, in its broad sense, the same sphere as His Sovereign power, comprising the fields of legislation, administration and judiciary. The judicial power exercised by the courts of justice in the name of the Tenno, the executive power exercised by various administrative organs outside of matters personally attended to by the Tenno, and the legislative power exercised with the consent of the Imperial Diet all merge into the supreme power of the Tenno. Although these powers are not personally wielded by the Tenno, they all emanate from the supreme power of the Tenno." The various wings of the government, therefore, derived authority from the Emperor and exercised only those powers delegated to each branch of Government.

The legislative branch, the Imperial Diet, consisted of two Chambers. The Upper Chamber was designated as the House of Peers and it consisted of Peers, representative Peers, representatives of the highest tax payers, and Imperial appointees. The peerage was created by Ito in 1884 with a view to gather support for the Emperor and the new regime from the court nobility, leading Samurai and wealthy merchants. The members of the Lower Chamber, the House of Representatives, were elected by a relatively small electorate which met minimum tax paying requirements.

The Judiciary was not an independent department of the government, but was made an arm of the Executive. Nor did the Constitution ensure the independence of the judges and there was no provision for judicial review. The judiciary was, accordingly, not the custodian of the Constitution and it had no power to maintain and safeguard the sanctity of the Constitution. A separate administrative court, similar to one in France, was provided for the adjudication of administrative matters.

The Imperial Ordinance promulgated in 1888 established the Privy Council consisting of a President, Vice-President, and 25 Councillors, all appointed by the Emperor on the advice of the "ministers of state." The Constitution provided that the Privy Council would "deliberate upon important matters of state when they have been consulted by the Emperor." The functions of the Privy Council were made more explicit by the Imperial Ordinance of 1890. It empowered the Privy Council to advise the Emperor concerning the Imperial House Law, the interpretation of the Constitution, the proclamation of martial law and Imperial ordinances, international treaties and agreements, the organization of the Privy Council and other matters submitted for its deliberations. Cabinet Ministers were entitled to participate in its deliberations and to vote. Decisions were taken by majority vote. Prince Ito Hirobumi regarded the Privy Council as "the highest body of the Emperor's constitutional advisors" and "the palladium of the constitution."

Another distinctive feature of the Meiji Constitution was that it contained a Bill of Rights. There was an enumeration of all the basic rights, such as freedom of thought, speech, religion, assembly, association, press and property. But all these freedoms, except the right to property, were qualified by the expression "subject to and within the limits of law," and the law included not only legislation enacted by the Diet, but also regulations and ordinances issued from time to time. The actual operation of the rights and freedoms of the people was, therefore, of a restricted nature and scope.

The Constitution remained in existence for 58 years, but it was never amended. The achievements of the Restoration and Meiji Constitution can best be summed up in the words of a publication, issued by the Bureau of Statistics, Office of the Prime Minister. It states, "The Meiji Restoration was like the bursting of a dam behind which had accumulated the energies and forces of centuries. Japan set out to achieve in only a few decades what had taken centuries to develop in the West—the creation of a modern nation, with modern industries, modern political institutions and a modern pattern of society. The surge and ferment caused by the sudden release of energies made themselves felt overseas. Japan emerged victorious from the Sino-Japanese War of 1894-95 and the Russo-Japanese War of 1904-05. By the end of World War I, which she entered under the provisions of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance of 1902, Japan was recognized as one of the world's greatest powers."¹⁴

While Japan's progress as a modern industrial nation and one of the world's greatest powers was spectacular and speedy, there were problems which confronted the nation's social, economic and political life in the mid-twenties. The World Economic Depression of 1929 intensified all these problems. Elements, particularly in the army, who advocated that overseas expansion was the only solution of difficulties facing Japan, eventually dominated and controlled the national policy. The militarists and ultranationalists predicted the destiny of Japan to become an empire that would ultimately dominate all Eastern Asia. They, accordingly, preached the doctrines of racist mythology, national superiority and divinely sanctioned imperialism. They engineered the establishment of Japan's domination over Manchuria and attempted other military ventures in China, and finally drove the nation into the Pacific War and disastrous defeat. After the War, Japan was placed under Allied Occupation, and a new Constitution, based on the ideals of democracy and peace as conceived by the Occupation Authorities, was promulgated in 1947. Japan regained her independence in 1952, and a few years later she was admitted into the United Nations.

CHAPTER II

THE NEW CONSTITUTION (1947)

The Potsdam Declaration and Occupation of Japan

On July 26, 1945 in Potsdam, Germany, President Truman and Prime Minister Clement Attlee (who had just succeeded Winston Churchill), with the concurrence of Chiang Kai-shek, issued a declaration incorporating the terms for the surrender of Japan. It was essentially the handiwork of America, for it was drafted by the United States and was based on a paper originally prepared by two officials of the State Department. Russia was not a signatory to the Potsdam Declaration as she was then not at war with Japan. Two weeks later when Russia entered the War, she signified her approval to the principles contained in the Potsdam Declaration. Since the Potsdam terms of surrender have important bearing on the Constitution of 1947, these are quoted here in full:

"There must be eliminated for all time the authority and influence of those who have deceived and misled the people of Japan into embarking on world conquest, for we insist that a new order of peace, security and justice will be impossible until irresponsible militarism is driven from the world.

Until such a new order is established and until there is convincing proof that Japan's war-making power is destroyed, points in Japanese territory to be designated by the Allies shall be occupied to secure the achievement of basic objectives we are here setting forth.

The terms of the Cairo Declaration¹ shall be carried and Japanese territory shall be limited to the islands of Honshu, Hokkaido, Kyushu, Shikoku, and such minor islands as we determine.

The Japanese military forces, after being completely disarmed, shall be permitted to return to their homes with the opportunity to lead peaceful and productive lives.

We do not intend that the Japanese shall be enslaved as a race or destroyed as a nation, but stern justice shall be meted out to all war criminals, including those who have visited cruelties upon our prisoners. The Japanese Government shall remove all obstacles to the survival and strengthening of democratic tendencies among the Japanese people. Freedom of speech, of religion and of thought, as well as respect for the fundamental human rights, shall be established.

1. The Cairo Declaration of Roosevelt, Chiang-Kai-shek and Churchill of December 1, 1943, had provided that Japan would be deprived of all the islands in the Pacific which she had seized and occupied since the beginning of World War I and all that Japan had stolen from the Chinese, such as Manchuria, Formosa, and the Pescadores would be restored to the Republic of China. Japan would be expelled from "all other territories which she had taken by violence and greed." Korea "in due course" would become free and independent.

Japan shall be permitted to maintain such industries as will sustain her economy and permit the execution of just reparations in kind, but not those which would enable her to rearm for war. To this end, access to, as distinguished from control of, raw materials shall be permitted. Eventual Japanese participation in world trade relations shall be permitted.

The occupying forces of the Allies shall be withdrawn from Japan as soon as those objectives have been accomplished and there has been established in accordance with the freely expressed will of the Japanese people a peacefully inclined and responsible government."

The first offer of the Japanese Government to accept the terms of the Potsdam Declaration was delivered through the Swiss Government on August 10, 1945, "with the understanding that the said declaration does not comprise any demand which prejudices the prerogative of His Majesty as a Sovereign Ruler." The Allies in their reply referred to the position of the Emperor somewhat indirectly in the following terms: "From the moment of surrender the Authority of the Emperor and the Japanese Government to rule the State shall be subject to the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers who will take such steps as he deems proper to effectuate the surrender terms. The ultimate form of government of Japan shall, in accordance with the Potsdam Declaration, be established by the freely expressed will of the Japanese people." This clearly implied that the Allied Powers would like to continue with the monarchy in Japan after Occupation subject to two conditions. Firstly, the Emperor would be subject to the authority of the Supreme Commander of the Allied Powers, and, secondly, the future form of government, as also the role the Emperor would play therein, would be determined by the Japanese people themselves.

The assurances that the Emperor would continue to reign, and that the Japanese Government would continue in existence after the surrender were accepted by Japan. On September 2, 1945, Allied and Japanese representatives signed the Instrument of Surrender aboard the U.S.S. Missouri in Tokyo Bay. General Douglas MacArthur was appointed Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers to direct the Occupation and to effectuate the surrender terms which for brevity could be reduced to demilitarization, disarmament and democratization.

Although the Occupation was complete and the authority of the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers was absolute, the Japanese Government continued as before with the Emperor at the head of the nation. The Allied Powers and for that matter the Supreme Commander never ruled Japan directly. This was unlike Germany. The relationship between the Supreme Commander and the Japanese Government was clearly stated in "United States Initial Postsurrender Policy for Japan." It was determined that:

2. While the Potsdam conference was still going on, a highly important development in the area of policy formulation for a defeated Japan was taking place inside the U.S. Government. The State, War and Navy Co-ordinating Committee (SWNCC) produced a policy paper entitled "United States' Initial Postsurrender Policy for Japan." It was approved by the President and became the basis of policy that General MacArthur was to execute.

"The authority of the Emperor and the Japanese Government will be subject to the Supreme Commander, who will possess all powers to effectuate the surrender terms and to carry out the policies established for the conduct of the occupation and the control of Japan."

"In view of the present character of the Japanese society and the desire of the United States to attain its objectives with a minimum commitment of its forces and resources, the Supreme Commander will exercise his authority through Japanese Government machinery and agencies, including the Emperor, to the extent that this satisfactorily furthers United States' objectives. The Japanese Government will be permitted, under his instructions, to exercise the normal powers of government in matters of domestic administration. The policy, however, will be subject to the right and duty of the Supreme Commander to require changes in governmental machinery or personnel or to act directly if the Emperor or other Japanese authority does not satisfactorily meet the requirements of the Supreme Commander in effectuating the surrender terms. This policy, moreover, does not commit the Supreme Commander to support the Emperor or any other Japanese governmental authority in opposition to evolutionary change looking toward the attainment of United States' objectives. The policy is to use the existing form of Government in Japan, not to support it. Changes in the form of Government initiated by the Japanese people or government in the direction of modifying its feudal and authoritarian tendencies are to be permitted and favoured. In the event that the effectuation of such changes involves the use of force by the Japanese people or government against persons thereto, the Supreme Commander should intervene only where necessary to ensure the security of his forces and the attainment of all other objectives of the occupation."

The Japanese Government was, therefore, an instrument by which the United States' objectives were to be realized. The authority of the Supreme Commander was complete in all respects and it was his "right and duty" to see that the changes which he deemed necessary and consistent with and in pursuance of those objectives were properly and expeditiously implemented. If the Emperor or any other Japanese authority did not meet the requirements of the Supreme Commander in effectuating the surrender terms, he could order changes in the governmental machinery or personnel as he deemed necessary or to act directly. The procedure actually adopted was that directions were issued under the authority of the Supreme Commander and the Japanese Government was required to act thereupon. The Occupation Authorities kept a close watch on the actions of the Japanese Government to ensure that the directions issued were faithfully observed. "Of almost equal significance were the informal aspects of the relationship between the government and the occupation, ranging from "suggestions" from General MacArthur to Japan's Prime Minister, through conferences between occupation authorities and Japanese bureaucrats, to private, after-hour conversation between Japanese and Americans who found a common interest in solving the problems created by the peaceful evolution."³

Demilitarization was relatively a simple problem and it was speedily and efficiently accomplished by the Occupation Authorities. By the end of 1948, Japan had been completely demilitarized. Democratization, however, was rather a complicated problem and it raised enormous difficulties. Any programme of democratization was deemed impracticable and futile unless a sizeable Japanese population, especially its critical elements, were convinced of its value and supported its implementation. To enable the people to adequately appreciate the implications of a democratic set up, the first attempt was made on October 4, 1945 by issuing a series of fundamental directives entitled the "Removal of Restrictions on Political, Civil, and Religious Liberties." It was also enjoined upon the Japanese Government to forthwith release all political prisoners, to abolish all governmental agencies responsible for maintaining restrictions and discriminations, to remove all such officers from office and to bar their future appointments in any important capacity. The object was to abolish all privileges and vested interests and to create a climate of liberty in which the Japanese should be in a position to demand and safeguard the basic human rights, hitherto denied to the people of Japan, and to provide them with an opportunity to determine their political fortune.

Closely in its wake, General MacArthur informed the Prime Minister of Japan on October 11, 1945 that "In the achievement of the Potsdam Declaration the traditional social order under which the Japanese people for centuries have been subjugated will be corrected." Accordingly, the Supreme Commander required the Government to institute the following reforms: the emancipation of women by their enfranchisement, the encouragement of the labour unions, the opening of the schools to more liberal education, the abolition of "systems which through secret inquisition and abuse have held the people in constant fear," and the democratization of economic institutions by curbing monopolies in order to widen the distribution and trade. The Shidehara Government in consultation with the Occupation Authorities immediately took measures to enact necessary laws relating to the social and political reforms in implementation of the policy of the Allied Powers.

Another directive from the Supreme Commander issued on December 15, 1945 demanded the abolition of Shinto, the State religion. The aim was to convert the Emperor "from an absolute ruler with allegedly divine attributes to a mere mortal who serves as the symbol of the nation and of the people's unity." Two weeks after this directive which demanded abolition of Shinto, the Emperor declared in his 1946 New Year Message that the ties between the Throne and the people "do not depend upon mere legends and myths. They are not predicated on the false conception that the Emperor is divine and that the Japanese people are superior to other races and fated to rule the world."⁴ Thus, the ideological basis of ultranationalism and militarism which had for centuries been the cult of the Throne was effaced from Japan. This was followed by a great purge. On January 4, 1946, the Supreme Commander directed the Japanese Government to plan for the removal and exclusion from office of those persons arrested as suspected war criminals, commissioned officers in the Imperial Japanese Armed Forces and others who had served in the military police and secret intelligence and high ranking civilians in the Ministry of War and Navy, influential members of ultranationalistic, terroristic, or secret patriotic organisations, persons influential in the activities of the Imperial Rule Assistance Association and other allied organizations, officials of financial and development organizations involved in Japanese expansion, Governors of occupied territories, and additional militarists and ultranationalists.

First Effort to Revise the Japanese Constitution

The declared object of the Potsdam Declaration was to establish in Japan a peacefully inclined and responsible government in accordance with the freely expressed will of the Japanese people and it was made a condition precedent for the withdrawal of the Occupation Forces of the Allies. On October 4, 1945, General MacArthur urged upon Prince Konoye Fumimaro, Vice-Premier in the Higashi Kumi Cabinet, to take the initiative in revising the Meiji Constitution. Prince Konoye was not taken in the succeeding Shidehara Cabinet, but he managed to obtain a commission from the Emperor to investigate whether the Constitution required any revision and if so to what extent. Konoye held a number of private conferences with George C. Atcheson Jr., SCAP's⁵ Political Advisor and three U.S. State Department Officials who happened to be in Tokyo then. Various parts of the Meiji Constitution which these officials felt required revision were pointed out to Konoye, but no reference was made for the abolition of the institution of the Emperor.⁶ There was, however, widespread feeling among the Allies that Konoye should have nothing to do with any scheme of constitutional reforms because of his alleged war guilt. It had been stated that the conference held between U.S. Senate Government officials and Konoye angered the Supreme Commander and he directed them to have no more parleys with Konoye. On November 1, SCAP Headquarters announced that MacArthur "had not chosen Konoye to reform the Japanese Constitution."

But Konoye continued on his job and late in November submitted his report on constitutional reforms to the Emperor. He recommended that the Meiji Constitution required revision with a view to strengthen the Diet, but such revisions should not destroy the basic principle of the Constitution that sovereignty resided in the Emperor. In December Konoye was indicted as a war criminal, but before he could be arrested he committed suicide.

In October, just when Prince Konoye had obtained his Commission from the Emperor authorizing him to investigate whether the Constitution needed revision, General MacArthur summoned Prime Minister Shidehara and pointedly advised him that the Government of Japan must immediately be reformed and, accordingly, the Constitution required to be liberalised. The Prime Minister pleaded that the legislation enacted by the Diet to enlarge the franchise and other reforms connected thereto adequately served the purpose and consequently there was no need to revise the Constitution. But MacArthur did not agree. He rather pulled up the Prime Minister and forced him to set up a committee to recommend proposals for reforms and revision of the Constitution.

The Committee on the Constitution, headed by Matsumoto Togi, was not in the beginning inclined to propose substantial alterations in the Constitution. But towards the end of December when pressed hard it was made to suggest some concrete proposals for revision. By this time the political parties, too, had presented their proposals for reforms. The Liberal and Progressive Parties proposed that the power of the Diet should be increased, but without impairing the principle that sovereignty resided in the Emperor. The Social Democratic Party recommended that while sovereignty resided in the State the political authority should vest in the Diet and the Emperor, the Diet sharing the most important part of it. The Communists, on the other hand, pleaded for the establishment of a Republic, and the trial of the Emperor as a war criminal.

MacArthur Constitution

The Matsumoto Committee submitted its draft of the revised Constitution on February 1, 1946, which was rejected by the Supreme Commander. He characterised it as reactionary. MacArthur thereupon directed the SCAP Government Section to prepare the draft which should serve as a "guide" for the Japanese Government. In his directive to the SCAP Government Section, MacArthur's instruction was that "guide" should provide for the institution of the Emperor but the powers of the Emperor should be exercised according to the will of the people. The Government Section worked with utmost speed to prepare the draft Constitution and within a week's time it completed the job. The draft Constitution was presented to the Japanese Government on February 13. It is reported that General Courtney Whitley, Chief of Government Section, while presenting the draft Constitution, which was intended to serve as a "guide" to the Cabinet, made its members clearly understand that if they did not accept the general principles contained therein, General MacArthur would present the Constitution straightaway to the people of Japan and in that case "The person of the Emperor" could not be guaranteed.

The Shidehara Government was left with no option but to accept the draft. When it was shown to the Emperor he also observed that there was no other alternative. The Prime Minister, then, reported to his Cabinet that "we are making an extremely grave commitment in accepting such a Constitution as this. Perhaps this commitment will also bind our posterity. When this draft is made public, some will applaud and others will keep silence. The latter will undoubtedly be highly indignant at bottom towards us. However, I believe that we are following the only possible course in view of the situation confronting us." There was a deep sense of shock and it was known to all that almost all ministers wiped tears from their eyes.

The Constitution was, thus, an accomplished fact. Still to observe the formality, the draft was sent to the Matsumoto Committee to serve as a "guide." The Committee made some minor revisions in it in close consultation with the Government Section. It was then sent back to the Cabinet. The draft was made public on March 6 as if it was actually Shidehara Government's own revision of the Constitution. To make it still reassuring an Imperial Rescript announced the adoption of the draft and explained the democratic principles on which it was based. General MacArthur, too, kept with the track and issued his approval of the draft Constitution to authenticate that it was the handiwork of the Japanese themselves and not an American made Constitution.

The draft Constitution was, then, finally submitted to the Diet for its approval in accordance with the provisions of the Meiji Constitution. But the Houses of the Diet took pains to fully debate it "always honouring the fiction that it was of Japanese origin." The Diet made some minor alterations too. But all this was done with the final approval of the Occupation Authorities. The Diet gave its approval on October 7, 1946, and the Constitution was promulgated on November 3 to synchronize with the birthday of Emperor Meiji. The new Constitution became operative six months later on May 3, 1947. "It was the occupation," succinctly remarks Maki, "that originated, directed, and obviously controlled the drafting, the content, and the process of approval of the new Constitution." It may aptly be called the MacArthur Constitution.

BASIC FEATURES OF THE CONSTITUTION, 1947

The Constitution as a Document

Although the Constitution was adopted as an amendment of the Meiji Constitution 1889, but actually it was a total revision which drastically transformed the nature and structure of the Government in Japan. It consists of 103 Articles in XI Chapters written in a simple style and easily comprehensible language. Both in broad principle and in specific details the Constitution of 1947 differs completely from the Constitution of 1889, which is replaced. Its three basic principles are: sovereignty of the people, the guarantee of the Fundamental Rights, and the renunciation of war, the last being a most peculiar feature of the Constitution and an object of the country's greatest constitutional controversy. Japan's Constitution is the only instance which constitutionally renounces war.

The structure of the government which the Constitution sets up completely supplants the institutions Japan had proudly inherited since the "ages eternal." It was the avowed policy of the Allied Powers to obliterate the image of divinity which the Japanese people believed surrounded the Throne and to eliminate completely from their minds the concept of national polity. Shidehara Cabinet had hoped that the process of democratization, which the Supreme Commander had urged as the most important element of the Potsdam Declaration, would not entail demolishing the past entirely. They had, in fact, expected that the proposals of the Matsumoto Committee would form the basis of discussion and compromise in order that a part of the old system might be retained. The Supreme Commander, however, had left no alternative for the Shidehara Government, but to accept the draft Constitution as prepared, under his instructions, by the SCAP Government Section. Although the draft Constitution was claimed to serve as a "guide" for the Japanese Government, but in reality it was the Constitution they were required to accept and a few minor changes which the Matsumoto Committee and the Diet made therein had the full approval of the SCAP. This "American-inspired Constitution" is replete with the fundamentals of American political philosophy. "The preamble to the Constitution," says Chitoshi Yanaga, "reminds the reader of the ideas and language of such historic documents as the Declaration of Independence, the federalist Papers, the Preamble to the Constitution, the Gettysburg Address, and even the Atlantic Charter."⁸

Sovereignty of the People

Sovereignty of the people which runs through the entire Constitution is its basic feature. It is a revolutionary change as it destroys the old principle of Imperial Sovereignty. The Meiji Constitution was a gift of the Emperor to the nation and its Preamble declared that "the right of sovereignty of State, We (the Emperor) have inherited from our Ancestors, and we shall bequeath to our descendants." It further provided, "the Empire of Japan shall be reigned over and governed by a line of Emperors unbroken for ages eternal." Article IV provided that "The Emperor is the head of the Empire, combining in himself the rights of sovereignty and exercises them according to the provisions of the Constitution."

Under the Constitution of 1947 sovereignty belongs to the people and the Emperor is only the "symbol of the State and unity of the people," and he derives "his position from the will of the people with whom resides sovereign power."⁹

The transfer of sovereignty from the Emperor to the people finds full expression in the Preamble which states, "we, the Japanese people, acting through our duly elected representatives in the National Diet, . . . do proclaim that sovereign power resides with the people and do firmly establish this Constitution." It further provides that "Government is a sacred trust of the people, the authority for which is derived from the people, the powers of which are exercised by the representatives of the people, and the benefits of which are enjoyed by the people." Sovereignty of the people, the Preamble asserts, "is a universal principle of mankind" upon which the new Constitution of Japan is founded and the people of Japan through this Constitution "reject and revoke all constitutions, laws, ordinances and rescripts" which are in conflict with this principle. Accordingly, the Constitution establishes a representative and responsible government manifesting the will of the people at the national as well as the local level. The institutions of referendum, initiative and recall also prevail in one way or the other.

Fundamental Rights and Duties of the People

The Constitution bestows on the people a truly imposing list of Rights which itself is an expression of the sovereignty of the people. Chapter III of the Constitution is exclusively devoted to the enumeration of these Rights. Out of a total of 103 Articles which comprise the Constitution, 31 are contained in Chapter III and embrace civil and political Rights as also Duties, though the latter are not many. The Rights are fully guaranteed and the Constitution declares them "eternal and inviolate" and include political, social and economic equality as well as suffrage, welfare and liberty for the people. All told, the emphasis throughout is on respect for the dignity of labour. A section of the Japanese people feel that the constitutional emphasis on the role of the individual is rather excessive and suggest some modification thereto. But this suggestion has not been favourably accepted and the majority of the people feel that it is not desirable to effect any change.

Renunciation of War

A peculiar rather unprecedented feature of the Constitution is that it unequivocally renounces war for ever. Article 9, which constitutes a single Article in Chapter II and is entitled "Renunciation of War," reads: "Aspiring sincerely to an international peace based on justice and order, the Japanese people forever renounce war as a sovereign right of the nation and the threat or use of force as means of settling international disputes." It is provided that "in order to accomplish the aim of the preceding paragraph, land, sea, and air forces, as well as other war potential, will never be maintained. The right of belligerency of the State will not be recognized."

This provision should, indeed, be the most cherished goal of State policy if all other States provided for the same in their constitutions and their governments pursue the path of international amity by renouncing war and settling their disputes by and through peaceful means. But none has done so far, not even the United States of America which was at pains to specifically enshrine it in the Constitution of Japan. The Occupation Authorities in their bid to militarily cripple Japan made this provision in the Constitution and also ordained that Japan would never maintain land, sea, and air forces, as well as other war potential. The right of belligerency of the State is also not recognized by the Constitution. The provisions of Article 9 are, however, now interpreted by the Government to mean that defensive armament is permissible and the Constitution outlaws only war and threat or use of force as means of settling international disputes. "It has been very plausibly argued," remarks Theodore McNelly, "that war and threat or use of force as means of self-defence are permissible."¹⁰

Supremacy of the Constitution

Article 98 specifically provides that "this Constitution shall be the supreme law of the nation, and no law, ordinance, imperial rescript or other act of government, or part thereof, contrary to the provisions hereof, shall have legal force or validity." It means that all laws, ordinances, imperial rescripts and Cabinet orders prevailing at the time when the Constitution became operative in 1947, and were inconsistent with the provisions of this Constitution became ipso facto invalid and consequently inoperative. And after the Constitution became operative nothing shall be enacted by the Diet which is not consistent to and in accordance with the fundamental law. Similarly, no act of government will be valid which is contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. Article 99 explicitly holds responsible all those engaged in public acts, the Emperor or the Regent as well as Ministers of State, members of the Diet, judges and all other public officials, to uphold and respect the Constitution. It is their constitutional duty and any deviation therefrom makes them liable to punishment as prescribed by the Constitution or the laws made thereunder. Nothing in Japan, therefore, can be enacted or done by any agency of the government which is not permitted by the Constitution. To safeguard against invasion on the liberties and freedoms of the people, Article 97 reiterates that the fundamental Human Rights guaranteed by the Constitution "are fruits of the age-old struggle of man to be free, they have survived the many exacting tests for durability and are conferred upon this and future generations in trust, to be held for all time inviolate."

10. Contemporary Government in Japan, p. 202.

A Rigid Constitution

The supremacy of the Constitution is ensured if it is not alterable under the ordinary law-making procedure. The Constitution of Japan prescribes the procedure for amending the Constitution and it is distinct from that of an ordinary law. It means that the constitutional law is not at par with the statutory law and the former has precedence in status over the latter, that is, the constitutional law is fundamental and supreme. Article 96 provides that proposals for amending the Constitution may be initiated either in the House of Councillors or in the House of Representatives. Such a proposal must separately pass in each House by a majority of two-thirds or more of its membership. After the amendment has been passed by the Diet, it is submitted to the people at a referendum for their ratification. If majority of the people voting at the referendum approve it, it becomes an amendment of the Constitution and is immediately promulgated.

The Constitution has not so far been amended even once. In spite of the strong pressure of the Conservatives for its revision, and the setting up of a Commission on the Constitution under the law of the Diet,¹¹ the Constitution reads today as it did in 1947. The Commission on the Constitution has not yet finalized its deliberations.¹² Moreover, it is difficult to obtain a concurring vote of two-thirds or more of all the members of each House plus an affirmative vote of a majority of the votes cast at a referendum. Because of the relative difficulty of the amendment process, the Constitution of Japan can reasonably be characterised as an example of a rigid Constitution.

If the Constitution has seen no amendment, it does not mean that the Constitution has not expanded. The laws enacted by the Diet, interpretation of the Constitution and elaboration of its provisions by the courts have considerably helped the Constitution to grow, though the latter make a minor contribution. But a number of basic laws passed by the Diet have sufficiently supplemented the provisions of the Constitution as, for example, the Imperial House Law, the National Diet Law, the Finance

11. The legally stipulated duties of the Commission are: to study the Constitution, to investigate and deliberate on problems relating to it, and "to report the results to the cabinet and through the cabinet to the Diet."

12. It was not until almost fifteen months after the law was passed that the Commission held its first meeting.

Law, the Cabinet Law, the Public Autonomy Law, etc. Since changes in the basic law can be made under the ordinary process of legislation, it makes the Constitution to some extent flexible.

Judicial Review

The Constitution explicitly vests in the Supreme Court the power of judicial review, though it establishes a unitary system of government. Article 81 provides that the Supreme Court is the court of last resort with power to determine the constitutionality of any law, order, regulation, or official Act. Here Japan introduces an American element of institutions. But whereas in the United States the Supreme Court does not derive its power of judicial review from the Constitution, the Japanese Supreme Court has the constitutional power to interpret the Constitution and to maintain its sanctity and supremacy.

The Supreme Court in Japan has not so far held, with the exception of certain laws passed to implement Occupation Directives, any law, order, regulation or official Act void and unconstitutional, but has upheld a few as constitutional. In the Sunkawa case (1959) the Supreme Court declared that the stationing of American forces in Japan did not violate Article 9 of the Constitution. It also set the principle that unless a treaty is "obviously unconstitutional and void, it falls outside the purview of the power of judicial review granted to the Court."

Emperor, the Symbol of the State

The Constitution preserves the institution of the Emperor but deprives His Majesty of all powers, privileges and prerogatives he formerly enjoyed and exercised. The Constitution now declares him to be the symbol of the State and of the unity of the people.¹³ He has no powers and authority related to government. He performs only those "acts" which are enumerated in the Constitution¹⁴ subject to the provision that the "advice and approval of the Cabinet shall be required for all acts of the Emperor in matters of State, and the Cabinet shall be responsible thereof."¹⁵ As the Emperor derives "his position from the will of the people,"¹⁶ and he performs acts in matters of State as specified in the Constitution, he must do so on the advice and approval of the Cabinet.¹⁷ The Constitution also prescribes that no property can be given to, or received by, the Imperial House, nor can any gifts be made therefrom without the authorization of the Diet.¹⁸

Parliamentary System of Government

The Government of the United States had decided to establish in Japan a parliamentary system of Government in preference to the presidential system and the Secretary of State, Mr. Byrnes, had accordingly advised Mr. George Atcheson, Jr., SCAP's Political Adviser. But a peculiar feature of the parliamentary government, which the Constitution establishes in Japan, is that the Emperor does not perform even those acts which are associated with the constitutional head of the State. The Emperor is the symbol of the State and of the unity of the people who derives his position from the will of the people. The executive power is vested in the Cabinet and it is made collectively responsible to the Diet. The Prime Minister heads the Cabinet and a majority of the number of Ministers, including the Prime Minister, must be members of the Diet. The Diet designates the Prime Minister and on his resignation the Cabinet resigns en masse.¹⁹ If the House of Representatives passes a no confidence resolution or rejects a confidence resolution, the Cabinet resigns en masse.²⁰ All these are the attributes of a parliamentary system of government and ensure the smooth working of the Cabinet. In the United Kingdom these well-recognized principles of Cabinet government are the result of deep-rooted conventions. In Japan, they have been specifically incorporated in the Constitution.

Local Autonomy

Finally, the Constitution prominently introduces the principle of local autonomy. Local Governments, prefectures and city, town and village municipalities have been granted by the Constitution extensive rights of self-government. Article 93 provides that the "local public entities shall establish assemblies as their deliberative organs" and that "the Chief executive officers of all local public entities, the members of their assemblies, and such other local officials as may be determined by law shall be elected by direct popular vote within their several communities." The Local Autonomy Law, 1947, which supplements Article 92 of the Constitution, provides for the exercise of initiative and recall by the voters of local entities. Such a democratic potential was hitherto unknown in Japan.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF THE PEOPLE

The Constitution bestows on citizens an imposing list of civil and political rights and thirty-one Articles out of a total of 103 are contained in Chapter III under the caption "Rights and Duties of the people." It is probably one of the world's most detailed and ambitious constitutional statements which guarantees that these human rights "conferred upon the people of this and future generations of the people" are "eternal and inviolate."²¹ The Constitution further provides that the freedoms and rights guaranteed to the people shall be maintained by the constant endeavour of the people, and enjoins upon them that they "shall refrain from any abuse of these freedoms and rights and shall be responsible for utilizing them for the public welfare."²² It means that the Constitution explicitly impresses upon citizens that vigilance is the price of democracy and since they have the inalienable right of determining their political destiny, they must not abuse any of these freedoms and rights and utilize them for their own good and the public welfare. Accordingly, the Constitution emphasises respect for the individual, without any kind of discrimination,²³ and guarantees to him the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, provided it does not interfere with the public welfare which would "be the supreme consideration in legislation and other government affairs."²⁴

The provision in Article 11 that "the people shall not be prevented from enjoying any of the fundamental human rights...conferred...as eternal and inviolate rights" is an unconditional guarantee of rights and the government is debarred from imposing any restriction or curtailment on their rights. But Articles 12 and 13 impose restrictions. Article 12 prescribes certain responsibilities for the people. The first is that they should maintain their rights through their constant endeavour, and refrain from any abuse of them. Secondly, the people should be responsible for utilising their rights for the public welfare. Article 13 while declaring that all of the people shall be respected as individuals, conditions their right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to the extent that none of them does interfere with the public welfare. Some fears have been expressed in Japan that incorporation of public welfare provision and making enjoyment of rights subject to public welfare is likely to be misinterpreted and the liberties of the people might be infringed or curtailed in the name of public welfare. It is argued that public welfare has ever remained a misleading concept. There is no activity of the State and no action of Government, down to the most ruthless and tyrannical, which has not been defended on the ground of public welfare. And Japan has a legacy of the long authoritarian tradition.

But this issue, as Maki observes, "is an important one in every democracy, because it involves the balance between the enjoyment of freedom by the individual and the good of the entire community."²⁵ Rights cannot be divorced from obligations and human rights cannot subsist without limitations. While imposing responsibilities on the people of Japan, the Constitution also makes the government responsible for serving the people's right to life, liberty and pursuit of happiness.²⁶ No representative and responsible government, which is accountable to the people, can afford to infringe Fundamental Rights on the plea of public welfare which it cannot adequately defend. The government is ever under scrutiny and it cannot forget that tomorrow is the day of election and it shall have to account for its public welfare which it cannot adequately defend. The Supreme Court of Japan has upheld that public welfare is a valid justification to restrict freedom. But it has also equally insisted that the doctrine of public welfare "cannot be used by any governing authority as an abstract justification for the limitation of freedom, it can be applied only under duly enacted legislation and under clearly defined circumstances."²⁷ It is creditable that during the past twenty years when the Constitution became operative there has been "no erosion of any constitutionally guaranteed freedoms through legislative, executive or judicial action."²⁸

Specific Rights

Here is a summary of rights the Constitution guarantees to citizens: freedoms of thought, conscience, religion, assembly, association, speech, press and all other forms of expression, choice of residence and occupation, choice to move to a foreign country and to give up nationality, academic freedom,²⁹ freedom from discrimination in political, economic or social relations because of race, creeds, sex, social status, or family origin,³⁰ equality before law and under the law, the inalienable right to choose public officials and to dismiss them; the right of petition for the redress of damage, for the removal of public officials, for the enactment, repeal or amendment of laws, ordinances or regulations, or for other matters, the right to sue the State or public entity for damage resulting from an illegal act of any public official,³¹ freedom to marriage based on mutual consent, equal rights of husband and wife, the right to maintain the minimum standards of wholesome and cultural living, the right to receive an equal education correspondent on their ability, the right to work, the right of the workers to organize and bargain and act collectively, the right to own or hold property, and the right to due process of law.

From the rights and freedoms enumerated above, it should be noted that the concept of equality has received a prominent and practical place in the Constitution. Social equality is guaranteed by abolishing special privileges by not recognising peer and peerage and excluding any privilege from any award of honour or any distinction which is not limited to the lifetime of the recipient. No person can be held in bondage and involuntary servitude except as punishment for crime. Equality of the sexes, the right to equal education and equality of the rights of husband and wife enhance the dignity of the individual and his social stature. The equality before the law finds yet more emphasis. Ten Articles out of a total of thirty-one in the Chapter on Rights and Duties are devoted to what may be characterised as the due process of law. It includes: freedom from deprivation of life or liberty or the imposition of other criminal penalty except according to procedure established by law, freedom of access to courts, no arrest except upon warrant, no arrest or detention without immediate notification of the nature of the charges, privilege of counsel, security of home, papers and effects except under warrant, security against torture or cruel punishments, the right of speedy and public trial by an impartial tribunal, right of examination of witnesses and of compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his behalf at public expense, freedom from compulsion to testify against himself, freedom from being criminally liable for an act which was lawful at the time it was committed, or of which he has been acquitted, and from double jeopardy, and the right to sue the State for redress after acquittal following arrest or detention.

Political equality finds expression in guaranteeing universal adult suffrage with regard to the election of public officials, giving the people the inalienable right to choose public officials and to dismiss them, declaring all public officials as servants of the whole community, ensuring secrecy of ballot in all elections and not making a voter answerable, publicly or privately, for the choice he has made, and granting to every person the right of petition for the redress of damage, for the removal of public officials, for the enactment, repeal or amendment of laws, ordinances or regulations and for other matters. The Constitution guarantees that no person shall be in any way discriminated against for sponsoring such a petition.

Duties

The Constitution also places emphasis on the duties of the individual, though they are not many. Chitoshi Yanaga says that the "traditional attitude has for centuries been to emphasize duties practically to the exclusion of rights, this was especially the case under feudalism. For the purpose of encouraging democratic development it was imperative that individual rights be stressed to effectively counteract the altogether too powerful influence of the authoritarian tradition and its legacies in Japanese society. The result has been the inclusion of only a few basic obligations of citizenship...."³² The duties and responsibilities of the citizen include: refraining from the abuse of any freedom or right, the responsibility for preserving and maintaining by constant endeavour the freedoms and rights guaranteed by the Constitution,³³ the obligation to work which is also a right,³⁴ liability to taxation,³⁵ and the obligation of all people to have all boys and girls under their protection receive ordinary education as provided for by law."³⁶

THE EXECUTIVE

The Emperor in History

Chitoshi Yanaga gives a matter of fact description of the Emperor. He says, "The Emperor has been and still is the living symbol of the nation's history, heritage, and achievements, of all that is glorious in the nation's past and present, of its continuity and durability. He is the incarnation of history and religion. In his person are epitomized the nation's hopes, aspirations and promise. He is the spiritual anchor, the moral rudder, and the political gyroscope that insure the safety and steadiness of the course of the ship of state. As a symbol he is enshrined in the hearts of the people who attribute everything good to his virtue."¹ He was and still is the nation's rallying point descending in direct and unbroken line from Amaterasu-Omikami, the Goddess of the Sun. The Emperor pictured as a Kami or heaven-descended, divine, sacred, virtuous and all-wise became the accepted ideology of the State and these attributes of the monarch were taught in the schools. Near the entrance to every schoolyard there was a small shrine in which were installed the pictures of the Emperor and the Empress. Every schoolchild had to uncover and bow before this shrine each time he entered or left the school. "On national holidays, usually at 10 A.M. all Japanese inside or outside the country were supposed to bow respectfully in the direction of the Imperial Palace in Tokyo. It was a custom, not rigidly enforced, for Japanese to bow each time they passed the main entrance to the Palace ground."² It was sacrilege to discuss any aspect concerning the person of the Emperor.

The Emperor was, thus, for the Japanese the State, the repository of sovereignty which was eternal and unalterable, that is, "co-extensive with the Heavens and with the Earth." His authority was supreme and inalienable to which all religiously bowed. In interpreting the Peace Preservation Law of 1925, which forbade, inter alia, advocating the alteration of Kokutai or national polity, the Supreme Court declared that the Emperor, of a line unbroken for ages eternal, reigned and exercised sovereignty in Japan.

Despite this fact of political loyalty and unbounding reverence and devotion of the people, the Emperor actually possessed very little political power and His Majesty usually had never made any important political decision. At least during the past 750 years, he had always followed the advice of the effective government of the time that was in the saddle and was in no way responsible for the formulation and execution of public policy. The Emperor was the ceremonial head of the State and performed only the ceremonial functions. The Constitution of 1889 gave him absolute power. Article IV stated that "The Emperor is the head of the Empire, combining in Himself the rights of sovereignty, and exercises them, according to the provisions of this constitution." But even then he had always acted on the advice of his ministers. He did no wrong and performed no public act on his own initiative and responsibility. He could, thus, be described as the constitutional monarch even under the Meiji Constitution, the most powerful symbol of the unity and solidarity of the Japanese nation. The Japanese adored their nation by adoring the Throne and the Royal Family provided a useful focus for patriotism and patriotic devotion. Here the Emperor of Japan resembled the British monarch. "The reverence of the Emperor," writes Chitoshi Yanaga, "is almost unbelievable especially to those who have not witnessed its manifestation. Perhaps the British alone of the Western peoples today can come closest to understanding attitude toward the sovereign."

The Emperor as He is Today

In their bid to efface the doctrine of Kokutai or national polity, which vested the power to rule ultimately in the Emperor, the Occupation Authorities strived to "humanize" the Emperor. They contrived a Constitution which reduced the Emperor to a mere symbol of the State and of the unity of the people. The Emperor derived his "position from the will of the people with whom sovereignty resides." With a view to vindicate the sovereignty of the people the ultimate authority of amending the Constitution is vested in the people themselves. It means that if the majority of the people acting through their representatives and ratified at a referendum so desire, the institution of the Emperor can be abolished. This is a revolutionary change and perhaps the Japanese will never venture to abolish it, yet it is a legal truth that they can do it if they so desire. It is an irony that the Emperor, who had advised his Cabinet on August 14, 1945, to accept the Allied Surrender Terms in order to save national polity from destruction and the nation from annihilation, was left with no option but to accept the Constitution which ordained his own political demise. The mind of the Occupation Authorities and the shape of the things to come was fully reflected in the Emperor's New Year Day Rescript of January 7, 1946. He declared that the ties between him and his people "have always stood upon mutual trust and affection" and not "upon legends and myths," nor are they "predicated on the false conception that the Emperor is divine and that the Japanese people are superior to other races and destined to rule the world."³ It is reported that the day the new Constitution was made operative, Shimizu Cho, the Constitutional Adviser to the Emperor and Chairman of the Privy Council which approved the Constitution, drowned himself at Atami. The note, which Shimizu Cho left, read, "I have decided to die so that I from the spiritual world may help to protect our national polity and wish the safe-being of His Majesty."⁴

There was almost the entire nation which thought likewise. In a survey conducted by the United Nations Educational and Cultural Organization, it was found out that "74 per cent of the Youth of postwar Japan strongly believe the Emperor remains, at the very least, the symbol of the nation, not only on paper, but in the hearts and minds of the people."⁵ This was really a shock for the Western nations especially the Americans who had really engineered the Constitution of 1947. Since the time Japan regained her independence determined efforts are afoot for restoring that universal reverence for monarchy as it prevailed before the defeat of Japan in 1945. The Conservatives are the most active and their advocacy is more enthusiastic. They hold that the Emperor's position as a mere symbol of the State and of the unity of the people "does violence to the historical tradition and sentiment of the people." Some of the critics of the Constitution maintain that Japan is not a constitutional monarchy, as it is claimed, but a Republic. They maintain that the symbolic role of the Emperor, derivation of his position from the people and their possessing the ultimate power of even abolishing monarchy, and denial of even nominal powers to the Emperor are the characteristics of a republic, although the Imperial Throne is dynastic. This is, however, a wrong interpretation of a republican form of government so long as the Imperial Throne remains dynastic. But the Conservatives cannot be induced to reconcile themselves to the position which the Constitution assigns to the Emperor. Accordingly, the Liberal and Progressive parties set up in 1954 their separate committees for a thorough study of the problem of constitutional revision with special reference to the powers and position of the Emperor. Both the committees came to the conclusion that the constitution need be immediately revised and the position of the Emperor elevated to the constitutional head of the State as the British King is. The Government has also appointed a Commission on the Constitution. Nothing tangible has yet come about, but there is a strong feeling among the Japanese people that the Emperor be restored to his former position. In some parts of Japan a movement called Kigensetsu (National Foundation Day) is strengthening its activities. Kigensetsu, February 11, is the traditional anniversary of the founding of the Japanese State by the first Emperor Jimmu Tenno in 600 B.C. It reveals the reverence and affection of the people of Japan towards the Imperial family of which the present ruler, Emperor Hirohito, is the 124th in the line of succession. There has been only one dynasty which has ruled Japan in lineal succession unbroken for ages eternal.

Succession to the Throne

Article 2 of the Constitution provides that the Imperial Throne is dynastic and shall be succeeded to in accordance with the Imperial House Law enacted by the Diet. According to the Meiji Constitution the Imperial Diet could not amend or repeal the Imperial House Law which determined succession to the Throne. The Emperor alone, with the advice of the Imperial Family Council and the Privy Council, could amend it. But under the prevailing Constitution of 1947, it is the Diet alone which makes, amends or repeals the existing Imperial House Law enacted in 1947, and which came into effect simultaneously with the inauguration of the Constitution on May 3, 1947.

The Imperial House Law of 1947 provides that the "Imperial Throne shall be succeeded by a male offspring in the main line belonging to the Imperial lineage." Primogeniture is the rule with succession running through the main line and the law rigidly defines the composition of the Imperial Family. No adoption is permitted. If there is no member of the Imperial Family in the main line of succession, the Throne is passed to members of the Imperial Family next nearest in lineage, precedence being given to the senior member of the senior line. The Imperial House Council, which consists of ten members,⁶ at a meeting presided over by the Prime Minister may change the order of succession in case the heir to the Throne suffers from an incurable and serious disease. A regency is established in case the Emperor has not come of age (18 years) or when the Emperor suffers from a serious disease, or there is a serious hindrance in the performance of his public acts. The regent performs his acts in the name of the Emperor.

Imperial Household Finances

The Imperial Household affairs are now completely under the jurisdiction and authority of the Diet. Before 1945, the Imperial Family was extremely wealthy and possessed extensive property holdings both in land and big industries. The Emperor was really "the greatest of the Zaibatsu (cartels) and exercised a powerful influence on the economy of the country. But now the greater part of that extensive property has been transferred to the State and the needs of the Imperial Household are provided by appropriations subject to the approval of the Diet. Article 8 of the Constitution specifically provides that "No property can be given to, or received by the Imperial House, nor can any gifts be made therefrom, without the authorization of the Diet."

The Imperial Family was reduced in size in 1947, when eleven princely families, consisting of fifty-one Princes and Princesses, renounced their status and privileges and became commoners. The Imperial Family now includes the families of the present Emperor and his three brothers. The Constitution of 1947 abolishes the titles and, accordingly the former eleven princely families are not even titled.

The Emperor and His Functions

Articles 1, 3 and 4 determine the position of the Emperor under the Constitution and Articles 6 and 7 list his functions. Article 1 makes the Emperor "the symbol of the state and the unity of the people, deriving his position from the will of the people with whom resides sovereign power." The effect of this Article is adequately expressed in Articles 3 and 4. Article 3 ordains that "The advice and approval of the Cabinet

6. The composition is: two members of the Imperial family, the Presidents and Vice-Presidents of both Houses of the Diet, the Prime Minister, the Head of the Imperial House Agency, the Chief Judge and one other Judge of the Supreme Court. Two members of the Imperial Family are chosen by election within the Imperial Family, and a Judge by other Judges of the Supreme Court.

shall be required for all acts of the Emperor in matters of State, and the Cabinet shall be responsible therefor." Article 4 prescribes that the "Emperor shall perform only such acts in matters of state as are provided for in the Constitution and he shall not have powers related to government." The combined effect of all these provisions may, thus, be summed up:—

- (1) that the Emperor no longer exercises any power or authority relating to government;
- (2) that he only performs certain acts in matters of State and such acts are as specified in the Constitution. There is no prerogative which he enjoys and no privilege or authority he can exercise;
- (3) that the advice and approval of the Cabinet is required for all acts of the Emperor and there is ministerial responsibility for all such acts;
- (4) that the Emperor is only the symbol of the State and the unity of the people; and
- (5) that the Emperor derives his position from the will of the people in whom resides sovereign power. If the people so will they can abolish monarchy and the Emperor be deprived of his position.

Articles 6 and 7 specify the following acts in matters of State which the Emperor performs on behalf of the people and on the advice and approval of the Cabinet:—

- (1) the appointment of the Prime Minister as designated by the Diet;
- (2) the appointment of the Chief Judge of the Supreme Court as designated by the Cabinet;
- (3) the promulgation of amendments of the Constitution, laws, Cabinet orders and treaties;
- (4) the proclamation of general election of members of the Diet;
- (5) the convocation of the Diet;
- (6) the dissolution of the House of Representatives;
- (7) receiving of foreign ambassadors and ministers;
- (8) attestation of instruments of ratification and other diplomatic documents as provided for by law;
- (9) attestation of the appointment and dismissal of Ministers of State and other officials as provided for by law, and of full powers and credentials of Ambassadors and Ministers;
- (10) awarding of honours;
- (11) attestation of general and social amnesty, commutation of general punishment, reprieve, and reservation of rights; and
- (12) performance of ceremonial functions.

Role of the Emperor

The functions enumerated above are a part of the overall functions which generally belong to the head of the State. But all such functions the Emperor performs on behalf of the people and on ministerial advice and approval. Neither of them involves any initiative, discretion or influence on his part. The Constitution does not only debar him from performing any personal act related to government, but also so incapacitates him politically that the Emperor cannot even claim to be the chief of the State or the representative of the nation. "It appears," writes Theodore McNelly, "that the term symbol of the state" may have been suggested by the British Statute of Westminster (1931) which provides that the British monarch is the symbol of the British Commonwealth." But such a use of the term is not happy in the case of the head of a Sovereign State as Japan is.

The Emperor is, thus, relegated to the position of a mere cypher and he stands no comparison with the constitutional monarch of England who plays a definite role in the governmental process. The Emperor of Japan performs only ceremonial functions and nothing beyond. He has absolutely no discretion in the appointment of the Prime Minister and must appoint one designated by the Diet. Nor can he influence dissolution. It is the constitutional right of the Cabinet alone; the Emperor must accept the advice tendered and promulgate dissolution. Treaties are not negotiated and concluded in the name of the Emperor. He simply promulgates them on behalf of the people and as concluded by the government and approved by the Diet. The assent of the Emperor is not needed to validate laws passed by the Diet. In England a Bill becomes a law after it is passed by Parliament and on receiving the Royal assent. The King has the power to veto a Bill duly passed by Parliament, although it has never been done since 1707. The Emperor has no power to withhold assent. A Bill, ipso facto, becomes a law when passed by the Diet. The Emperor simply promulgates it. Finally, he does not enjoy the prerogative of mercy. The Emperor simply attests general and special amnesty, commutation of punishment, reprieve, and restoration of rights.

The Emperor is, no doubt, provided with requisite information about the affairs of the State and political policies by the Cabinet, but he possesses none of those rights—the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, and the right to warn, which Bagehot assigned to the British King. And a King of great sense and sagacity, he said, "would want no other." The Emperor of Japan is never consulted and his opinion is not solicited on any matter related to government by the Ministers. He performs only those functions which are specifically detailed in the Constitution and that, too, on behalf of the people from whom he derives his position. The Ministers are responsible for all such acts of the Emperor. He has neither a legal nor a theoretical right to intervene and influence important decisions. Asquith, in a Memorandum on the rights and obligations of the British King, wrote, "He (King) is entitled and bound to give his ministers all relevant information which comes to him, to point out objections which seem to him valid against the course which they advise, to suggest (if he thinks fit) an alternative policy. Such intimations are always received by ministers with the utmost respect and considered with more respect and deference than if they proceeded from any other quarter."⁹ The moral influence of the Emperor of Japan is still considerable and he may exert it in exceptional circumstances, but it will be a purely personal function carrying with it the weight of his institutional prestige. Constitutionally he has no locus standi to do so. Nor can the Emperor act as a mediator and use his prestige to settle political conflicts as the British monarch has done on many occasions. The Constitution insists that he should not take interest in politics and express any shading of public opinion.

It cannot, however, be denied that in spite of the political incapacitation of the Emperor, the popular attitude towards the throne remains unabated. The Emperor of Japan was and is still the most powerful symbol of the unity and solidarity of the Japanese nation. The Japanese adore their nation by giving ardent adoration to the Throne. The Emperor symbolizes two thousand years of "Japaneseness" of the unity and stability of the nation and, thus, provides a strong focus for patriotism and patriotic devotion. "The reverence of the Emperor," observes Chitoshi Yanaga, "is almost unbelievable especially to those who have not witnessed its manifestation at first hand. Furthermore, it is unfathomable since it is an emotional and practically a religious manifestation. Perhaps the British alone of the Western people can come closest to understand the Japanese attitude toward the sovereign."¹⁰ The role of the Emperor, therefore, cannot be discounted. He is the rallying point of the nation and majority of the Japanese people wish and strive to elevate him to the position and status of a constitutional head of the State. Parliamentary democracy requires the presence of some dignified and detached person who should play a definite role in the governmental process as the British monarch does.

THE CABINET

The Cabinet System in Retrospect

The beginning of the Cabinet system in Japan goes back to the Imperial Ordinance of 1885, which set up the Cabinet. But it did not establish the Cabinet system of government as obtainable in Great Britain. In fact, it was unlike the evolution of Cabinet Government in Great Britain where the Cabinet was the last element to evolve. In Japan "the cabinet antedated the promulgation of the Constitution by four years and the opening of Parliament, that is the Diet, by full half decade."¹¹

But the beginning had been made, though in the Constitution of 1889, itself the terms "Cabinet" and the Prime Minister occurred nowhere. Article 55 simply stated that there would be "ministers of state" who were

"to give advice to the Emperor and be responsible to it." From this provision it could be implied that the Meiji Constitution established a sort of Cabinet to advise the Emperor and be responsible to him for that advice.

Since the "ministers of state"¹² did not constitute a Council of Ministers and they were individually responsible to the Emperor alone, it was not necessary that they should have been members of the Diet and belong to its majority party or a combination of parliamentary groups agreeing to form a Coalition Government. In the beginning the Emperor selected his own Prime Minister on the recommendation of his advisers who included the Elder statesmen, the Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal and the Minister of the Imperial Household. The Prime Minister would, then, select the ministers in consultation with the Emperor. By the second decade of the present century, the Emperor began summoning, but not invariably, the leader of the majority party in the Diet and would command him to recommend other ministers. But the Prime Minister did not make a team by selecting ministers from his own political party. Besides the multiplicity of political parties, there were other considerations which weighed heavily with the Prime Minister in making his choice. He had always to give premium to the wishes of the oligarchy and the views of the armed forces. The obvious result was a weak Cabinet which had to work under various pressures and influences. Nobutaka Ike correctly remarks that "the power of the pre-war Cabinet, therefore, was greatly circumscribed both in theory and practice. Nevertheless, of all the organs of government the Cabinet was perhaps most consistently in the public eye, and almost all political figures came to consider appointment as Prime Minister, or even as a Cabinet Minister, the crowning achievements of their careers."

Cabinet System under the Constitution, 1947

The terms "cabinet" and the "Prime Minister" are now constitutionalized, and the Constitution of 1947 incorporates all the basic principles which are the essence of the system of Cabinet government. The executive power vests in the Cabinet¹³ and the Emperor is only the symbol of the State and of the unity of the people.¹⁴ The Cabinet consists of the Prime Minister as its head and other Ministers of State who are appointed by the Prime Minister.¹⁵ The Prime Minister is designated from among the members of the Diet¹⁶ by a resolution of the Diet, and the post goes invariably to the leader of the majority party or majority coalition in the Lower Chamber of the Diet. The Prime Minister and other members of the Cabinet must be civilians¹⁷ and a majority of them must be chosen from among the members of the Diet.¹⁸ The Cabinet in the exercise of its executive powers is collectively responsible to the Diet¹⁹ and the Prime Minister may remove the Ministers of State as he chooses them.²⁰ The Cabinet must resign when the Lower Chamber either passes a no-confidence resolution or rejects a confidence resolution.²¹ The Cabinet, thus, remains in office so long as it can retain the confidence of the House of Representatives. While the collective responsibility of the Cabinet is to the House of Representatives, individual Ministers are responsible to the Prime Minister and they can be removed from office at his will. A hand which had made them can also unmake them.

Composition and Organization of the Cabinet

The size of the Cabinet varies from time to time but usually 16 Ministers of the State are appointed. All ministers are technically of equal rank and status. In practice, however, only twelve hold Portfolios and head the various Ministries. Ministers without Portfolios do not hold charge of Ministries and are as a matter of distinction designated State Ministers.

Cabinet meetings are held twice a week, on Tuesday and Friday, at the Prime Minister's official residence. The Prime Minister presides over meetings of the Cabinet and in his absence the Vice-Premier presides. It is an established practice now that Cabinet decisions must be unanimous. If a Minister does not agree to the decision or policy of the Cabinet, he should resign from office. The Cabinet proceedings are strictly secret and no minutes are maintained. The Ministers have explicit instructions not to divulge what transpires in the Cabinet meetings. The Cabinet Secretariat, headed by a Director and two Deputy Directors, assists in the work of the Cabinet, arranges the agenda, prepares documents and handles other matters. It is customary that the Director of the Cabinet Secretariat, and the Director and Deputy Directors of the Bureau of Legislation attend the meetings of the Cabinet, participate in its deliberations but they cannot vote.

Sixteen Ministries or Departments have been established in addition to the Prime Minister's Office. The Prime Minister himself heads his office and it is the nerve centre and operational matrix of the government. The Cabinet Secretariat and the Legislative Bureau are the auxiliary organs of the Cabinet. The former is charged with the function of preparing the agenda of Cabinet meetings and other miscellaneous affairs of the Cabinet. The Legislative Bureau examines and drafts government Bills and Cabinet orders as well as examines drafts of treaties and other matters of equal importance. There are three extra-ministerial agencies, the National Personnel Agency, the Commission on Constitution, and the Economic Planning Agency. The Board of Audit is independent of the Cabinet and it is constitutionally charged with the duty of finally auditing every year the accounts of the expenditure and revenues of the State.

The two principal committees of the Cabinet are the Ministerial Defence Council and the National Defence Council. The Ministerial Defence Council consists of the Prime Minister, Foreign Minister, Finance Minister, Agriculture and Forest Minister, International Trade and Industry Minister, the Transport Minister, and the State Minister who serves as Director of the Economic Planning Agency. The National Defence Council consists of the Prime Minister, Foreign Minister, Finance Minister and the State Ministers serving as Director of the Defence Agency and Director of the Economic Planning Agency. The Prime Minister is the Chairman of both these Committees.

The average life of the Cabinet is little more than ten months. Paradoxical as it may seem, Prime Ministers have been more durable than Cabinets. The average life of the Prime Minister is twenty-five months. Intra-party and intra-factional differences on policy or personnel of the Cabinet are the two main reasons for short Cabinet tenures. "And there is constant factional and intra-party pressure on all Cabinets to step aside in favour of other deserving colleagues. This pressure is so strong on any Prime Minister that frequent Cabinet changes are almost the necessary political price for his own continuance in power."²²

Functions of the Cabinet

Under the Constitution of 1889, the executive power was vested in the Emperor. The Ministers of State advised His Majesty. It was for the Emperor to make decisions and the Ministers exercised only those functions which the Emperor was pleased to delegate to them. The Constitution of 1947 vests the executive power in the Cabinet²³ and the Emperor possesses no powers related to the government.²⁴ In regard to acts specified in the Constitution which the Emperor performs, the advice and approval of the cabinet is necessary.²⁵ There is no act which the Emperor can perform in his discretion. The Cabinet, thus, formulates and decides policy and co-ordinates and controls the Ministries and other agencies of administration.

But for the implementation of policy necessary legislation must be available. If the existing frame-work of law does not provide it, old laws may be amended, or new laws enacted. Administration and legislation go together. It is for the cabinet to decide what laws need be amended and the new laws which are required and their priority. The Cabinet is, thus, the magnet of policy and it integrates and guides the work of the legislature. It is the instrument through which the executive branch of government is linked with the legislature. To express it in the words of Bagehot, Cabinet is a "hyphen that joins, the buckle that binds the executive and legislative departments together."

But administration cannot be divided rigidly into sixteen or more Ministries. The action of one Ministry affects another and, indeed, every important problem cuts across departmental boundaries. It is the function of the Cabinet to co-ordinate the functions of several Ministries or departments of government. Finally, the Cabinet is responsible for the whole expenditure of the State and to raise necessary revenues to meet such expenditure.

The functions stated above are the general functions inherent in a cabinet and are of universal application. The Constitution of Japan as a measure of abundant caution specifies various functions with which the cabinet is charged. The most important of them are enumerated in Chapter V. According to Article 72, the Prime Minister representing the Cabinet:

- (1) submits Bills to the Diet,
- (2) reports on the general national and foreign affairs to the Diet, and
- (3) exercises control and supervision over various administrative branches.

Article 73 prescribes that the Cabinet, in addition to other general administrative functions, shall perform the following functions:—

- (i) administer the law faithfully and conduct affairs of the State,
- (ii) manage foreign affairs and conclude treaties,
- (iii) administer the civil service, in accordance with standards established by law.
- (iv) prepare the Budget, and present it to the Diet,²⁶
- (v) enact cabinet orders in order to execute the provisions of the Constitution and of law,
- (vi) decide on general amnesty, special amnesty, commutation of punishment, reprieve and restoration of rights,
- (vii) all laws and Cabinet orders are to be signed by the competent Minister of the State and countersigned by the Prime Minister.²⁷

The Cabinet also performs functions connected with other organs of government:

- (a) advises the Emperor on acts in matters of State,²⁸
- (b) designates the Chief Judge of the Supreme Court,²⁹
- (c) appoints Judges of the Supreme court, excepting the Chief Judge,³⁰ and Judges of the inferior courts from the list of persons nominated by the Supreme Court,³¹
- (d) determines the convocation of extraordinary session of the Diet,³²

THE PRIME MINISTER

Designation and Appointment of the Prime Minister

There is no Act of the British Parliament which establishes the office of the Prime Minister in the United Kingdom.⁴⁰ But the Constitution of Japan specially provides for it, and determines his status. Article 6 of the Constitution says that the Emperor shall appoint the Prime Minister as designated by the Diet. This is repeated in Article 67 with a further addition that the Prime Minister shall be designated from among the members of the Diet by a resolution of the Diet. At the same time, the Constitution requires that the Prime Minister and other Ministers must be civilians.⁴¹ It, however, does not provide that the Prime Minister must always belong to the Lower House of the Diet. Legally, therefore, if the Prime Minister belongs to the Upper House, there is no Constitutional bar to it. But it has never happened since the Constitution became operative in 1947, and it is now a well established practice that the Prime Minister must come from the House of Representatives. That the Prime Minister should belong to the House of Representatives is implied in proviso to Article 67. It provides that if the House of Representatives and the House of Councillors disagree, and if no agreement is reached in a Joint Committee of both the Houses, or if the House of Councillors fails to make designation within ten days after the House of Representatives has made designation, the decision of the House of Representatives is the decision of the Diet. Added to it is the responsibility of the Cabinet to the House of Representatives. Since the Prime Minister leads the Cabinet, it is logical to infer that he belongs to that Chamber to which the Cabinet is constitutionally responsible.

The procedure actually followed in designating the Prime Minister is the same in both the Houses of the Diet. For clarity it may be divided into two stages. The first stage consists in nominating the candidates. If one single party commands a majority, its leader will be automatically designated as a majority of the members present and voting is required to designate the Prime Minister. If one single party does not command a majority and a few of them combine to form the majority coalition, its leader is again an obvious choice. If this is not possible, parties nominate their candidates. Since voting is on strict party lines, none can command a majority vote. In that case the first two candidates securing the maximum votes run the final nomination and one securing the majority of votes stands designated. In the event of a tie, decision is made by lot. This completes the first stage or step in the designation of the Prime Minister. Then, a resolution of formal designation is presented and voted upon. In the event of disagreement between the two Houses a Joint Committee is appointed to resolve the difference. If the Joint Committee does not come to a decision and the disagreement continues, the decision of the House of Representatives finally prevails, and that decision is deemed as the decision of the Diet. "This actually occurred in 1948, when Prime Minister Ashida won over his rival, Yoshida." The person who is officially designated by the Diet becomes the Prime Minister on appointment by the Emperor. The appointment by the Emperor is just a ceremonial function as he is not legally competent to refuse such an appointment.

Powers of the Prime Minister

The extent of the powers of the Prime Minister can well be appreciated from his constitutional position as the chief executive, and the head of the administration. Article 66 of the Constitution declares the Prime Minister as the head of the Cabinet. He appoints Ministers and possesses the undisputed right of keeping them in office at his pleasure.⁴² He represents the Cabinet in submitting Bills, reporting on general national affairs to the Diet, and exercising control and supervision over various administrative branches.⁴³ All laws and Cabinet orders are signed by the competent Minister and countersigned by the Prime Minister.⁴⁴ The Prime Minister presides at the Cabinet meetings⁴⁵ and decides disputes of jurisdiction among Ministers of Cabinet.⁴⁶ The Prime Minister may suspend the official act or order of any administrative office pending action by the Cabinet.⁴⁷ The identity of Ministers is unknown to law without the Prime Minister. Article 70 of the Constitution declares that the entire cabinet must resign in case there is a vacancy in the post of the Prime Minister. It falls within the special competence of the Prime Minister to fix the date of the Diet elections, to convene the Diet, and to conclude and ratify international agreements.⁴⁸ With a constitutionalised office as the head of the Cabinet and the enormous powers which the Constitution conferred on the Prime Minister, his position is not a whit less than his prototype in England. Under the Meiji Constitution the Prime Minister was no more than primus inter pares, first among equals. His appointment was a matter of Imperial prerogative and all officers of the State, civil and military including the Ministers of State, were appointed and dismissed by the Emperor.⁴⁹ Now the Prime Minister is a member of the Diet and a leader of the party in majority. He is vested with the power to appoint his Ministers and they retain office at his pleasure, though the cabinet as a whole is collectively responsible to the Diet. In the appointment of Ministers, he has the right to select his own team which in his opinion would be able to ensure the solidarity and stability of the government. There may be certain political exigencies which may influence his choice, but the last word rests with him. It is his decision, choice and preference which the Emperor must accept. The Emperor simply performs a ceremonial function and attests the appointment and dismissal of ministers.

It is, thus, the constitutional authority of the Prime Minister to ask a colleague to resign and if he does not, to dismiss him from office as Prime Minister Katayama and Yoshida did. The Prime Minister can also reshuffle his Cabinet as and when he likes and this happens frequently in Japan. Prime Minister Yoshida is famous for the number of Ministers he had appointed. "Twice Mr. Kishi and twice Mr. Ikeda made wholesale changes in the personnel of their cabinets in such a way that the "re-constructed" cabinet (Kaizo naikaku) were virtually new ones."⁵⁰ There are two other powers which the Constitution vests in the Prime Minister. The cabinet resigns as a whole whenever there is a vacancy in the post of the Prime Minister,⁵¹ and secondly, no legal action can be taken against Ministers, during their tenure of office, without the consent of the Prime Minister.⁵² As head of the Cabinet, the Prime Minister calls the meetings of the cabinet and presides over its proceedings, "holding a tight rein over the members."

There are no rules, customs and precedents governing the transaction of business in the cabinet meetings. Nor is there a quorum fixed for the meeting, and votes are never taken. Decisions must always be unanimous. The members express their views on the issues before the cabinet, discuss pros and cons and strive to arrive on an agreement. The Prime Minister "sums up the results of discussion and determines the consensus of opinion." Being head of the cabinet and leader of the party in office, the Prime Minister enjoys a position of pre-eminence which enables him to impose his decision. He enjoys great power especially in emergency. The Prime Minister is empowered to proclaim national or local emergencies. He is also competent to issue direct orders to the public authorities in the areas involved in emergency proclamations.

The Prime Minister is the voice of the cabinet in the Diet. He alone is authorized by the Constitution to submit Bills and reports on general national affairs and foreign relations to the Diet. He also exercises control and supervision over various administrative branches. The Prime Minister is, thus, the Manager-in-Chief of the government's business. The Cabinet Law empowers him to decide disputes of jurisdiction between one Minister and the other,⁵³ and may even suspend the official act or order of any administrative office pending action by the cabinet.⁵⁴ These powers of the Prime Minister together with the constitutional provision that all laws and cabinet orders require countersignatures of the Prime Minister eclipse the position of the Ministers.⁵⁵ The Prime Minister is really the master of the government, for he makes and unmakes the government and determines the policies at the meetings of the cabinet of which he is the head. And for the members of the cabinet, he appoints them and can dismiss them. An apt description of the position of the Prime Minister of Japan is, therefore, in essence similar to the one Jennings gives to the British Prime Minister. "He is, rather, a sun, around which planets revolve."

The Civil Service

The Civil Service in a modern State is the core of government. The cabinet formulates policies but the real work of administration is done by thousands of civil servants who staff the various Ministries or Departments of government. It is not the business of the Minister, who heads the Department, to work the department. His business is to see that the department pursues a determined policy and it functions efficiently in that particular direction. Those who actually run the department and implement the policies of the government constitute the civil service of the country. They have a permanent status and tenure and are selected for their administrative capacity alone and are graded accordingly. They have no interest in party politics and remain rigidly neutral and rigorously impartial in economic and political issues. Permanency of tenure gives them security of service and furnish to Ministers, who are amateurs in administration, and the legislature all necessary information for shaping and enacting policies on a multitude of subjects. Laski has aptly said that "every State is enormously dependent upon the quality of its public officials." The welfare of the people, therefore, normally depends upon the honest performance of the duties assigned to the civil servants, high and low. Their duties have become tremendously complex and onerous with expansion in the scope of governmental activities. The new responsibilities devolving on the civil servants demand greater expertise knowledge, promptness in the performance of their duties, efficient diagnosis of the social ills and suggestion of appropriate remedies, and consequently rendering service with equal fidelity whatever governments may come and go.

The Civil Service Before 1946

Japan had nothing like the civil service until the seventh century. The patriarchal clan system had seriously undermined the authority of the Emperor and in their bid to strengthen the political structure, the Japanese looked to China for inspiration, which was then at the height of her glory. They found that the most important factor that contributed to China's greatness and power was her highly developed administrative system. Japan, accordingly, imported from China a highly centralised administrative system with the Confucian tradition that conferred high prestige upon the government officials. But there was one major difference. Whereas in "China the civil service had been instituted to destroy the old power structure based on the aristocracy," in Japan, "it was used to strengthen the political structure dominated by the aristocracy." For a little over five centuries the administration of national affairs was concentrated in the hands of a civilian aristocracy which operated out of the Imperial Court at the national capital.

Feudalism lasted for nearly seven centuries. The administrative system that developed during this period was dominated by the military and hierarchical organization and it was based upon the strong bond of fealty between the lord and the vassal. It was precisely not a civil service system "but a feudal bureaucracy based on status, and official posts were hereditary." In the early years of the Meiji era, the officials of the State were largely drawn from the old Samurai-class, but soon there spread a wrong feeling of discontentment against the government personnel and the method of entry into the service. It was complained that appointments went generally to friends of those already in the service and the able and talented youngmen were eliminated from entering public service. The agitation had the desired effect and in 1885 the foundation of a modern civil service was laid by adopting the principle that appointments to government posts should be based on competitive examination. The first examination for recruitment to second and third rank services was held in 1887. There was no competitive examination for recruitment to first rank service and it embraced Cabinet Ministers, ambassadors and highest judicial officers, accounting for less than five per cent of the total number of civil servants.

Civil Service under the Constitution of 1947

Under the Meiji Constitution all government officials were appointed by the Emperor and they remained in service at the pleasure of His Majesty. Imperial Ordinances rather than laws enacted by the Imperial Diet determined the conditions of the Imperial Civil Service. Since it was an Imperial Civil Service, in "its dealings with the public the Japanese bureaucracy acquired the reputation of being arrogant and overbearing. Officials were, in theory, responsible to the Emperor, and therefore each official was vested with a segment of imperial authority."⁵⁶ At functions of the Imperial Court the officers of the first rank were placed in precedence with the President of the House of Peers and the Speaker of the 56. Kahin, George McT. (ed.), Major Governments of Asia, p. 197.

House of Representatives. And as the officials were responsible to the Emperor "and not to the public, officialdom was never very much concerned with the matter of public relations."⁵⁷

The Constitution of 1947 has now changed the entire concept of public service. Article 15 provides that (1) the people have the inalienable right to choose their officials and to dismiss them, (2) all public officials are servants of the whole community and not of any group thereof. If any public official does any wrong to a person and the person concerned suffers damage through an illegal act of such official, he can sue for redress as provided by law.⁵⁸ The National Service Law enacted in 1947, provides "for service-wise standards of personnel administration." The National Personnel Authority, which was set up in 1949 and administers the National Public Service Law, is "charged with the responsibility of introducing democratic methods, providing scientific personnel management, and creating a job classification system."⁵⁹

All public officials are now divided into two categories, Special Government Service, and the Regular Government Service. In the Special Government Service are included members of the cabinet, all such positions the appointment to which requires approval of the Diet, high officials in the Imperial Court, Judges, Ambassadors and Ministers, Diet employees, common labourers, and employees of State Corporations. The Regular Government Service includes the personnel of the National Government, administrative and clerical, except those classified belonging to the Special Government Service.

The National Public Service Law is essentially concerned with the Regular Government Service. The National Personnel Authority, modeled after the Civil Service Commission of the United States of America, administers the National Public Service Law. It functions independently of the Diet and the Cabinet and consists of three Commissioners, one of whom is the Chairman. The Chairman is appointed by the Cabinet with the approval of the Diet. The functions of the National Personnel Authority, inter alia, are to conduct the civil service examinations, classify positions, promote employee training and welfare, deal with employee grievances, fix hours of work, leave of absence, temporary retirement, discipline, compensation for illness and injury while on duty, issue directives, within the law, which are binding on all departments, and to recommend administrative and salary reforms to the Cabinet and Ministries.

Consistent with the demands of expanding governmental activities there has been an enormous increase in the size of the national government employees. Just before the War in 1940, the National Government had, excluding the military and certain temporary employees, a total of 231,898 persons on its pay roll. In 1960, the figure was 1,428,049, a more than fivefold increase. In 1963, for which the figures are available, it touched a total of 1,851,777. Out of this huge total of national employees a little more than five thousand belong to the higher civil service comprising the first, second and third grades in the administrative service. Access to these positions is usually restricted to persons who pass the Higher Civil Service Examination, and the training and preparation of this Service are rigorous.

Despite the institutional changes, referred to above, "the Japanese bureaucracy continues to be officious and given to feelings of self-importance."⁶⁰ Summing up the nature of the Japanese civil service, Robert E. Ward says, "Displays of individual initiative on the part of junior employees are not highly valued. Loyalty and obedience to superiors, tact, anonymity, patience, and a capacity for the endless details and rituals of administration are the normal virtues. Personal and job security is complete, accountability to the public is practically nil."⁶¹ Confucianism had normally exalted the role of the government officials and this idea continues to prevail during the present time too. The public at large also stresses the superiority of the officials and obedience to their authority. And then the civil service is a step up the social ladder. Thus, it "hardly needs to be emphasised," remarks, Chitoshi Yanaga, "that, while under the new Constitution it has been made very clear that Government officials are public servants, it will be some time before the new legal status is accepted socially and psychologically by the officials themselves as well as the general public."⁶²

Another feature of higher bureaucracy in Japan is that it is deeply involved in politics. Ever since the War such an involvement has become notable. It is now believed that one of the best ways to begin a political career is to enter the civil service. After retirement, which is comparatively at an early age and the pension is inadequate, an aspiring civil servant is apt seriously to consider a political career as the crowning of his ambitions. He has "already proved his administrative competence, and he enjoys a measure of prestige in his home community where people regard him as a home-town boy who made good, and they take a personal interest in his political career."⁶³ According to the analysis given by Robert E. Ward, in 1959, 84 members of the Lower House (48 per cent of the total membership) and 81 members of the Upper House (32 per cent) were former career civil servants. Some 35 per cent of the Cabinet members holding office between 1954 and 1961 were civil servants⁶⁴ and most of the post-War Prime Ministers have had long careers in the civil service—Shidehara, Yoshida, Ashida Kishi and Ikada. "Bureaucrats naturally regard their own opinion," concludes Theodore McNelly, "as more informed than that of the layman, and Cabinet Ministers with bureaucratic origins often take a scornful attitude towards legislators, the press and the general public. Ikada Hayato was notorious for his lack of tact before he became Prime Minister."⁶⁵

THE DIET

The Diet. The Constitution describes the Diet or Parliament of Japan as the highest organ of State power and the sole law-making organ of the State.¹ It further states that the Diet consists of two Houses, the House of Representatives (popularly designated as Lower House), and the House of Councillors² (Upper House). These two provisions are sharply distinguishable from the corresponding provisions of the Meiji Constitution. The Emperor, according to that Constitution, had alone the right of sovereignty and the sole ultimate repository of State power, and he exercised "the legislative power with the consent of the Imperial Diet." Moreover, the Emperor and the cabinet both had the power to issue decrees which had the force of law. The Constitution of 1947 vests sovereignty in the people and the Diet, which is the expression of the will of the people and is the sole law-making organ of the State. "The Government has thus been transformed from an Emperor-centred to a Parliament-centred mechanism,"³ and the elected representatives of the people are charged with the task of deliberating on national policies, formulated by the cabinet, which collectively responsible to the Diet,⁴ approving them finally, and enacting them into laws to make them valid for implementation and obedience.

Although the Diet reflects the opinion of the people, it also guides and leads public opinion. It is here that the representatives of the people ventilate grievances and seek redress. The Opposition opposes and criticises the policies and actions of the government while the party in office explains and clarifies in order to make issues intelligible to the people. It is a government by publicity and is subject to daily and periodic assessment. In other words, the Diet is the national forum where all kinds of matters are debated and discussed and it equips the people with sufficient political knowledge to determine what policies and politics they will like to own. Since the powers of the Diet extend to all aspects of government activity, its authority is all-embracing. It deliberates and legislates, sanctions and controls the finances of the State, designates the Prime Minister who forms the government and controls it through many processes. The government is ever under scrutiny of the Diet and the Constitution now vests it with investigative power⁵ which the Imperial Diet did not possess under the Meiji Constitution.

A Bicameral Legislature

Japan has a bicameral legislature since 1890. Under the Meiji Constitution the Upper House was named as the House of Peers and it consisted of 416 members made of Peers, representative Peers, representatives of the highest taxpayers, and Imperial appointees. "It was natural, given its make up, that House of Peers was highly conservative, and since its powers were equal to that of the House of Representatives, it served for decades as a bulwark against popular control of the government."⁶ The Lower House, the House of Representatives, was elected by a small electorate which met a high payment of tax. Originally, it consisted of 300 members. Women had no votes. In 1902 tax qualification was reduced and the membership increased. With the enactment of universal suffrage in 1925, which entitled all males over 25 years of age to vote, the number was set at 466. The term of office of the members was four years. But there were serious limitations on the powers of the House of Representatives, particularly relating to finances.

The Occupation Authorities, especially General MacArthur, favoured a unicameral legislature by doing away with the House of Peers and nothing resembling with it was desired to be put in its place. There was also a strong objection to an Upper House constituted on the basis of vocations or economic groups. But the Japanese did not favour tampering with bicameralism. They felt that an Upper Chamber in any democratic set up was necessary as a check against hasty and ill-considered legislation. It was, accordingly, proposed that a House of Councillors be established consisting of "members elected for the various districts or professions and members appointed by the cabinet upon resolution of a committee consisting of members of both Houses."⁷ The Occupation Authorities eventually agreed to retain bicameralism, but the Upper House consisting of only elected members, representing all the people and not of groups or any section of society.

THE HOUSE OF COUNCILLORS

Composition

The House of Councillors, which replaced the House of Peers, consists of 250 members. The Constitution does not fix the number of the Councillors. It simply says, "The number of the members of each House shall be fixed by law."⁸ The Law fixed the number at 250 of whom 150 are elected on a geographical basis, that is, from forty-six electoral districts in which the country is divided and correspond with the prefectures, and the remaining 100 are elected by the nation at large. The former are known as local constituencies and the latter national constituency. The number of seats going to a prefecture is roughly in proportion to its population and it varies from two to eight seats. A voter exercises two votes, one for the candidate in the prefectural or local constituency, and the other for the candidate in the national constituency.

7. As cited in Theodore McNelly's Contemporary Government of Japan, p. 102.

8. Article 43, The Constitution of Japan, 1947.

The Members of the House of Councillors are elected for six-year term with one-half elected every three years.⁹ There is no dissolution of the House. Since the terms are staggered, after the expiry of every three years, 75 members are chosen from the prefectural or local constituencies and 50 from the national constituency. In the seventh post-war House of Councillors, election held on July 4, 1965, 125 (75+50) vacancies created by the expiration of the terms of office were filled in. Sixty million eligible voters cast their votes.¹⁰ The idea of introducing two categories of constituencies was to have a dissimilar composition as compared with the House of Representatives, and to attract eminent candidates of national stature who do not get themselves involved in the rough-and-tumble of partisan politics.

Qualifications for membership of the Diet (House of Councillors and the House of Representatives) are fixed by law. But the Constitution itself emphasises that there shall be no discrimination because of race, creed, sex, social status, family origin, education, property or income. The idea is to stress that privileges of any kind, as were found in the composition of the House of Peers under the Meiji Constitution, have been abolished altogether, and that women enjoyed the same rights as men.¹¹ The minimum age fixed for a Councillor is 30 years and he must fulfil all other qualifications which are prescribed for a voter. But the Constitution prohibits anyone to remain a member of both Houses simultaneously.¹² The House itself decides disputes relating to qualifications of members and there is no appeal in this respect to any other authority.¹³ In order to deny a seat to any member, it is necessary to pass a resolution by a majority of two-thirds of the members present in the House.¹⁴

Members enjoy complete freedom of speech and they are not liable outside the House for speeches, debates or votes cast inside the House.¹⁵ Moreover, except for cases provided by law, they are exempt from apprehension while the House is in session. Any member apprehended before the opening of the session shall be freed during the terms of the session upon demand of the House.¹⁶ The members receive annual payment as determined by law in addition to the daily allowance when the House is in session and free railway passes. They are also entitled to a special allowance to defray the expenses of mailing documents and carrying on correspondence when the House is in session. There is provision for retirement pension too. The Chairmen of the Standing Committees are provided with official automobiles.

The Session

The House must meet once a year in a regular session.¹⁷ It is usually opened in December by the Emperor who delivers a brief message to a joint session of both the Houses. Extraordinary Sessions are called by the Cabinet whenever deemed necessary. If one-fourth or more of the total members of the House demand for convening an extraordinary Session, it becomes the duty of the cabinet to do so.¹⁸ When the House of Representatives is dissolved, the House of Councillors is closed at the same time. The Cabinet may, however, convoke the House of Councillors in emergency session if the conditions of national emergency prevail in the country.¹⁹

The quorum for the transaction of business is fixed at one-third of the total membership of the House.²⁰ Deliberations of the House are open to public²¹ unless it is a secret meeting on the demand of two-thirds of the members present.²² The House is required to keep a record of its proceedings which must be published and made available to the general public, except such parts of the proceedings of the closed session as require secrecy. Upon demand of one-fifth of the members present, votes of the members on any matter must be recorded in Minutes.²³ All decisions are taken by a majority vote of the members present, except otherwise provided by the Constitution. In case of a tie, the Presiding officer exercises a casting vote.²⁴

The Presiding Officer

The House of Councillors elects its own President and Vice-President. The President presides over the sittings of the House and controls its proceedings. In the absence of the President, the Vice-President presides. The House establishes its rules for the conduct of meetings, proceedings and internal discipline and may punish members for disorderly conduct. In order to expel a member from the House, a majority of two-thirds of members present must pass a resolution to that effect.²⁵ In case of a tie, the Presiding officer is entitled to a casting vote.²⁶

Functions of the House of Councillors

Legislative Functions

The Constitution confers identical legislative functions on the House of Councillors and the House of Representatives. Article 41 says that the Diet is the highest legislative organ of State power and the sole law-making organ of the State. Article 59 further says that a Bill becomes a law on passage of both the Houses. It means that a legislative measure may be introduced in either of the two Houses and when passed by them separately, it becomes a law and must be promulgated accordingly. But after having conceded that much to the House of Councillors, the Constitution establishes the supremacy of the House of Representatives. It is provided that in case the House of Councillors makes a decision different from the House of Representatives and such a difference cannot be resolved in the Joint Committee of the two Houses, it becomes a law of the Diet when the House of Representatives passes the Bill for the second time by a majority of two-thirds of members present. The Constitution also provides that if the House of Councillors fails to take final action within 60 days after receipt of the Bill from the House of Representatives, it may be taken by the House of Representatives to constitute a rejection of the Bill by the House of Councillors.²⁷ The final word, therefore, rests with the House of Representatives.

Financial Functions

Consistent with the democratic theory and the practice of parliamentary system of government, Money Bills do not originate in the House of Councillors. The Constitution specifies that the budget must be submitted first to the House of Representatives and when it passes therefrom it goes to the House of Councillors. If the House of Councillors makes a decision different from that of the House of Representatives and when no agreement can be reached in a Joint Committee of both Houses, or when it fails to take final action within 30 days after receipt of the budget approved by the Lower House, the decision of the House of Representatives becomes approval of the Diet.²⁸ In matters of budget, therefore, the function of the House of Councillors is insignificant.

Final accounts of the expenditures and revenues of the State are required to be audited annually by a Board of Audit and submitted by the Cabinet to each House of the Diet for its acceptance. The House of Councillors, like the House of Representatives, is also responsible for approving the government's settled accounts.²⁹

Administrative Functions

The Cabinet is the creation of the Diet and is headed by the Prime Minister. The Constitution requires that all members of the Cabinet be civilians, and that a majority of their number, including the Prime Minister, be members of the Diet. Custom has, however, established that the Prime Minister invariably belongs to the House of Representatives and an overwhelming majority of the Ministers are chosen from the same House. Not more than three or four Ministers are taken from the House of the Councillors. The Prime Minister, of course, is designated by a resolution of the House of Representatives and the House of Councillors. If, however, the House of Representatives, and the House of Councillors disagree and if no agreement can be reached in the Joint Committee of both Houses, or if the House of Councillors fails to make designation within 10 days after the House of Representatives has made its designation, the decision of the House of Representatives is the decision of the Diet.³⁰ The final determination in the designation of the Prime Minister is, therefore, that of the House of Representatives and to its choice the House of Councillors must submit.

The House of Councillors does not control the government and can bring no crisis by passing an adverse vote. According to Article 66 the "cabinet is collectively responsible to the Diet," which in terms of law means both the House of the Councillors and the House of Representatives. But when read with Article 69, responsibility really means to the House of Representatives. It specifies, that when the House of Representatives passes a resolution of no confidence in the cabinet, or rejects a confidence resolution, "the cabinet shall resign en masse, unless the House of Representatives is dissolved within 10 days." Thus, when the House of Representatives passes a no confidence motion against the government or rejects a vote of confidence in the government, it must either resign or advise dissolution of the House of Representatives to seek the verdict of the electorate. The House of Councillors is not dissolved. The new election of the House of Representatives will, then, determine the party to form the government.

It does not, however, mean that the Councillors have no hand in influencing administration. The members of the House of Councillors can seek information from the government on any aspect of administration through the medium of questions. "Question hour" in the life of the parliamentary government plays a significant role and it tends to keep the government within bounds. The members may also seek redress of grievances or bring to the notice of the government a matter of public importance of which the government has not taken any cognisance by passing a resolution to that effect. The Constitution enjoins on the cabinet to report at regular intervals and at least annually to both Houses of the Diet on the state of national finances, and the Prime Minister, representing the cabinet, on general national affairs and foreign relations.³¹ Finally, the House of Councillors together with the House of Representatives has been given investigative functions. According to Article 62, each House of the Diet "may conduct investigations in relation to government, and may demand the presence and testimony of witnesses, and the production of records." The House of Councillors in this way exercises a continuous supervision over the administration, particularly relating to efficiency and honesty of government.

Judicial Functions

The House of Councillors, together with the House of Representatives, constitutes the court of impeachment for the trial of the Judges of the Supreme Court. Article 64 of the Constitution provides that "the Diet shall set up an impeachment court from among the members of both Houses for the purpose of trying those judges against whom removal

30. Article 67.

31. Article 72.

proceedings have been instituted." Matters relating to impeachment are provided by law. The Court of Impeachment, as now constituted, consists of 14 members equally drawn from the House of Councillors and the House of Representatives. The members of the court elect one from amongst themselves to be a presiding officer. The law also sets up an Indictment Committee, consisting of an equal number of members of both the Houses of the Diet, which prefers charges for removal against a judge or judges to be impeached. A member of the Indictment Committee cannot simultaneously be a member of the Court of Impeachment.

Constituent Functions

The House of Councillors and the House of Representatives both exercise equal powers of amending the Constitution. Amendment to the Constitution can be initiated by either House of the Diet and it must pass separately by a majority of two-thirds of the total membership of the House of Councillors and the House of Representatives and, then, it is submitted to the people for their approval at a referendum.

Electoral Functions

The House of Councillors together with the House of Representatives performs many electoral functions. The procedure adopted for the selection of the Prime Minister has already been described. The Constitution definitely prescribes the participation of both the Houses in the designation of the Prime Minister.³² The qualifications of the members of both the Houses and their electors are fixed by law of the Diet. The only limitation the Constitution places is that there shall be no discrimination because of race, creed, sex, social status, family origin, education, property or income.³³ The Diet is also competent to enact laws regarding the formation of electoral districts, method of voting, and other matters pertaining to the method of election of members of both Houses.³⁴ Each House is competent to judge disputes relating to qualifications of its members. However, in order to deny a seat to any member, it is necessary to pass a resolution by a majority of two-thirds or more of the members present.³⁵ The House of Councillors elects its own President and Vice-President, and other officials.³⁶

Evaluation of the House of Councillors

As said earlier, General MacArthur had desired a unicameral legislature and the first draft of the Constitution was accordingly formulated. But the Japanese leadership was strongly opposed to this proposal and the Constitution of 1947 established a bicameral legislature. Since the Constitution had set up a parliamentary system of government, it was, therefore, natural that the popular Chamber should remain the focus of authority and the Upper Chamber exercised only a restraining, moderating and dignifying influence, and it provided continuity and stability to the Diet. The members of the House of Councillors are elected for a term of six years, one-half retiring after every three years. As the House is not subject to dissolution there is continuity in its life and the members usually serve for their full term of six years. The law of the Diet prescribes that members of the House of Councillors must at least be thirty years of age and they should be chosen from two different kinds of constituencies, 100 from the national constituency and 150 from the local or prefectural constituencies. The intention was to "combine the advantages of informed local representation with those of a panel of nationally eminent candidates. But after more than two decades of the working of the Constitution, "the House of Councillors is not greatly different from the House of Representatives either in terms of age or politics."³⁷ It has become practically as partisan a body as the House of Representatives. There are, no doubt, some eminent statesmen who are chosen from the national constituency, but "the bulk of those so chosen probably represent organizations having branches or influence in several heavily populated areas of Japan, e.g., labour unions, big business and nationally organized interest groups."³⁸ There are just a few independent candidates and the rest are the nominees of the political parties and subject to their rigid control. The party composition of the House of Councillors closely resembles to that of the House of Representatives. For example, the Liberal Democratic Party is in control of both the Houses. It commands 288 seats in the 486-member House of Representatives,³⁹ and 140 out of a total membership of 250 in the House of Councillors⁴⁰

The House of the Councillors has in practice not fulfilled the purpose of exercising a restraining influence against hasty and ill-considered legislation. When the same party controls both the Houses and the party composition remains more or less the same at every election, there is no possibility of any disagreement between the two Houses and the Bills pass through ipso facto. Rigidity of party discipline does not permit opposition of any kind with the result that the House of Councillors has become a recording Chamber. There is a growing feeling among the Japanese that the House of Councillors as constituted at present makes little contribution to the role it is expected to play and, accordingly, some kind of reform is urgently needed in its composition. It has been suggested that the House should be made a Chamber representing professions and other elements of the electorate.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Composition and Tenure

The House of Representatives is the Lower Chamber of the Diet and consists of 467 members elected for a four-year term. Since the House is subject to dissolution, it does not run a full term. General elections have taken place at intervals ranging from six and half months to three years and eight months. Candidates are returned from a total of 118 so-called "medium sized" constituencies, each constituency returning from three to five members, on population basis, except the constituency of Amami Islands which is represented by one member. Despite that each constituency returns several members, each elector casting only one vote. The Japanese system is a form of "limited voting," that is, the voter is permitted to vote for fewer candidates than the number of seats to be filled from a constituency.

The Public Offices Election Law of April 1950, guarantees the right of vote to practically all Japanese citizens, male or female, who have reached the age of twenty. A candidate for membership to the House of Representatives must be twenty-five years of age and must have been resident of the locality from which he seeks election continuously for a period of three months. But locality rule in Japan does not mean actual residence in the constituency as the rigid practice in the United States is. "It simply means having a legal domicile and being registered there." A candidate for the House of Representatives must meet all other qualifications as those prescribed for voters. No one can be a member of both the Houses at the same time. Nor can he hold any other office under the government. Disputes relating to qualifications of the members are judged by the House of Representatives itself. However, in order to deny a seat to any member, it is necessary to pass a resolution by a majority of two-thirds or more of the members present.

As said earlier, members of both Houses enjoy complete freedom of speech and they are not held liable outside the House for speeches made or votes cast inside the House. Members of both Houses are exempt from apprehension, except in criminal cases, while the Diet is in session. Any member apprehended before the opening of the session is freed during the term of the session upon demand of the House. The Constitution provides that members of both Houses shall receive appropriate annual payment from the national treasury in accordance with law. The law provides for a handsome annual salary in addition to the daily allowance when the House is in session, free railway passes between Tokyo and homes of the members and some special allowances and other facilities. There is also a provision for retirement pension for members.

Sessions

The Constitution specifically mentions two types of sessions of the Diet: the regular or ordinary session, and an extraordinary session. An ordinary session of the Diet is convoked once a year,⁴¹ but cabinet may convoke an extraordinary session whenever necessary, to take up emergency matters which cannot wait until the next regular session in December. If one-fourth of the total members of either House make a demand that the Diet should be convoked in an extraordinary session, the cabinet must summon it.⁴² There is also a provision for a special session. According to Article 54, when the House of Representatives is dissolved

41. Article 52, Constitution of Japan, 1947.

42. Article 53, Constitution of Japan, 1947.

there must be a general election of members of the House of Representatives within 40 days from the date of dissolution, and the Diet must be convoked within 30 days from the date of the election. The purpose of such a special session of the Diet is to elect a Prime Minister who should form the government, and to dispose of the unfinished business left over because of dissolution. When the House of Representatives is dissolved, the House of Councillors must immediately go into adjournment. But in times of national emergency, the cabinet may convoke it in emergency session to take action on urgent measures. Measures adopted by the House of Councillors in emergency session are provisional and they become null and void unless assented to by the House of Representatives within a period of ten days after the opening of the next session⁴³ which is usually a special session.

Business cannot be transacted in the House unless one-third or more of total members of the House are present,⁴⁴ that is, 156 members out of a total membership of 467 must at least be present for the valid transaction of business. All matters are decided by a majority vote of those present, except as provided for in the Constitution.⁴⁵ In case of a tie, the Presiding Officer, the Speaker, and in his absence the Deputy Speaker, exercises a casting vote and decides the issue.⁴⁶

There is a constitutional sanction that deliberations in each House of the Diet should be public.⁴⁷ It means that the sessions of each House of the Diet are open to the public unless a majority of two-thirds of the members present in a House pass a resolution that a secret meeting of the House be held.⁴⁸ Under the Meiji Constitution the cabinet could alone demand a secret meeting of the House. But under the Constitution of 1947, it is the House itself which decides by a two-thirds majority that there should be a secret meeting. The cabinet has absolutely no say in the matter. Each House of the Diet is required to keep a record of its proceedings. Such a record is, again, required to be published and made available to public, except such parts of the proceedings of a secret session as may be deemed to require secrecy.⁴⁹

Organization of the House

The organization of the House of Representatives is quite simple. The first business of the House when it assembles immediately after the general elections is to elect a Speaker and a Deputy Speaker or Vice-Speaker. The Speaker presides over the meetings of the House and in his absence the Vice-Speaker presides. It is, therefore, the first step in the organization of the House that the Presiding Officer may be elected, for it is only after his election that the business of the House can be transacted. The House makes its own rules pertaining to meetings, proceedings and internal discipline.⁵⁰ For deliberative purposes, the House functions either in plenary session or in committees. There are 16 Standing Committees of the House and most of these committees correspond to Ministries or Departments of the government. The House may also appoint special committees for the study of particular problems or proposals. Each party is represented in the committees on the basis of party strength in the House. Each member must serve on at least one Standing Committee and on not more than three committees.

The Speaker

Under the Meiji Constitution the members of the House of Representatives did not elect their Speaker. The House would nominate three members and the Emperor selected one out of them to act as the Speaker. The Constitution of 1947 definitely provides that each House shall select its own presiding officer, and empowers him in case of a tie to decide the issue by his casting vote. So important is the office of the Speaker that no business of the House can be transacted without him. Even the designation of the Prime Minister, urgent as it is, has to wait until after the Speaker and his Deputy are chosen.

Normally, the Speaker is the nominee of the party in majority in the House of Representatives and he is elected for the life of the House, that is, for four years provided it is not dissolved earlier. If the party in office does not command an absolute majority but only a working majority with the support of some other party or parties, the Speakership can go to a party other than the government party as it happened in the Fifth Yoshida Government. The Speaker of the House of Representatives is, accordingly, a party man and he does not renounce his party affiliations after his election to that office. Nor does it apply to him, as it does to the Speaker of the British House of Commons, once a Speaker always a Speaker. A Speaker of the last House may not be elected after the fresh elections by the new House even if the same party is returned in majority and forms the government. He may not be elected to the House at the general elections, for, unlike the practice in the United Kingdom, he is not returned unopposed. To ensure his re-election to the House, the Speaker must remain a partisan to further the interests of his party and aid the government party, of which he is the nominee, in pushing through its legislative programme. The Speaker in Japan, therefore, is not the impartial umpire in the House and custodian of the rights of its members whether they belong to the Treasury Benches or the Opposition. His role is very much akin to that of his counterpart in the United States of America.

The Speaker presides over the meetings of the House of Representatives. It is his foremost function to maintain order and decorum in the House so that the proceedings are conducted smoothly and efficiently and there is expeditious disposal of the business before the House. In case of disobedience to his orders or disorderly conduct or use of unparliamentary language, the Speaker may deny to such a member the right to speak. If the unruly behaviour still continues, he may adjourn the House. But in order to expel a member from the House for his disorderly conduct, the Constitution demands that the House should pass a resolution to that effect supported by a majority of two-thirds or more of the members present. If the visitors to the House exhibit disorderly conduct, the Speaker is empowered to order expulsion of such visitors or order that the visitors' gallery be cleared in entirety.

The Speaker determines the order of business, fixes the time limit on debates and interpellations, gives floor to the members who wish to participate in debates, applies closure, and, thus, brings the debate to an end. He puts the motion to vote and announces the results. In case of a tie, he exercises his casting vote and decides the issue. Immediately after the Bill is introduced in the House, the Speaker as a rule refers it to the appropriate Standing Committee or a Special Committee of the House. The Speaker functions as the official representative of the House of Representatives with all other agencies outside the House. He proposes executive sessions and approves the appointment of government members for the purpose of assisting Cabinet Ministers in the Diet. He may appear before any committee of the House, including the Joint Conference Committee, and tender his views and opinion on the matter before the committee for investigation. The Speaker is empowered to accept the resignation of a member of the House when it is not in session.

Supremacy of the House of Representatives

The Constitution definitely establishes the supremacy of the House of Representatives and it is in accordance with the theory and practice of the parliamentary system of government. In the creation of the cabinet and in its retention in office the House of Representatives is the dominant Chamber. In the process of law-making it has the final say. The House of Representatives can override the House of Councillors in the event of irreconcilable disagreement between the two Houses or delay or inaction on the part of the House of Councillors in legislative or financial matters. The exact role of the House of Councillors is to delay the enactment for a specified period of time.

Legislative Functions

As said earlier, a legislative measure must pass through both the Houses in order to become a law. But if one House disagrees with the other and if the disagreement cannot be resolved in a Joint Committee of both the Houses, the Constitution vests the House of Representatives with an overriding power over the House of Councillors. Article 59 specifies that a legislative Bill which is passed by the House of Representatives and upon which the House of Councillors makes a decision different from the House of Representatives and the difference persists in spite of the efforts of the Joint Committee of both the Houses to resolve it, it becomes a law on its being passed a second time by the House of Representatives by a two-thirds majority of the members present. The Constitution empowers only the House of Representatives to call a meeting of the Joint Committee.⁵¹

The Constitution also provides that if the House of Councillors fails to take final action on a Bill passed by the House of Representatives within a period of sixty days after its receipt from that House, the House of Representatives may take such an inaction on the part of the House of Councillors as a rejection of the measure by it. If the House of Representatives again passes the Bill by a majority of two-thirds or more members present, it becomes a law of the Diet and is promulgated accordingly.⁵² But a legislative measure which the House of Representatives rejects cannot be recognised or revived by the House of Councillors. The final authority of law-making, therefore, rests with the House of Representatives.

Financial Functions

The House of Representatives has control over the purse along with the House of Councillors. But, here too, the Constitution unequivocally establishes the supremacy of the House of Representatives over the House of Councillors. This is, no doubt, the prerequisite of the system of responsible government. According to Article 60 the budget must first be submitted to the House of Representatives. It is further provided that the approval of the budget by the House of Representatives becomes the approval of both the Houses of the Diet, if the House of Councillors makes a decision different from that of the House of Representatives, and when no agreement can be reached through a Joint Committee of both Houses, or when it fails to take final action within 30 days after receipt of the budget approved by the House of Representatives. The same provision applies to the ratification of treaties.⁵³

Chapter VII of the Constitution covering Articles 83 to 91 contains powers which the House of Representatives together with the House of Councillors exercises with respect to national finances: the Diet determines the manner in which the finances are to be administered, modifies the existing taxes or imposes new ones, authorizes the expenditure of money and assumes obligations by the State, considers and approves the budget for each fiscal year prepared and submitted by the cabinet, authorizes and approves expenditure from a reserve fund to provide for unforeseen deficiencies in the budget, approves the appropriation of expenses for the Imperial Household, receives from the Board of Audit, through the cabinet, the audited accounts of the expenditure and revenues of the State, and receives reports at regular intervals, but at least once a year, from the cabinet on the state of the national finances.

Executive Functions

A third great function of the House of Representatives is controlling the executive. It creates the cabinet and the cabinet is collectively responsible to the House of Representatives. This is the basic feature of a cabinet system of government as established in Japan. The Prime Minister heads the cabinet. Legally, he is designated by the Diet, but in actual practice he is the choice of the House of Representatives. The Constitution provides that if the House of Representatives and the House of Councillors disagree and no agreement is reached even in the meeting of a Joint Committee of both the Houses, or, if the House of Councillors fails to make designation within ten days after the House of Representatives has made its choice, the decision of the House of Representatives is final and is deemed the decision of the Diet.⁵⁴ The Emperor "appoints" the Prime Minister as designated by the Diet.⁵⁵

53. Article 61.

With the appointment of the Prime Minister formation of the cabinet begins. The Constitution simply says that a majority of the number of Ministers must be chosen from among the members of the Diet,⁵⁶ and all of them must be civilians.⁵⁷ In practice, however, except for three or four Ministers who belong to the House of Councillors, the remaining twelve or thirteen invariably have been chosen from the House of Representatives. And with the stability of the party system, they are taken from the majority party in the House of Representatives of which the Prime Minister is the head. The cabinet advises and approves all acts of the Emperor in matters of State and is responsible therefor.⁵⁸ Whereas the individual Ministers can be removed from office by the Prime Minister,⁵⁹ the cabinet as a whole can only be dismissed by the House of Representatives. Article 69 provides that if the House of Representatives passes a no-confidence resolution, or rejects a confidence resolution, the cabinet resigns en masse, unless the House of Representatives is dissolved within ten days.

It means that the cabinet remains in office so long as it can retain the confidence of the House of Representatives. As soon as confidence is lost, it must resign as a whole thereby providing an opportunity to the Opposition to form the government. If the government does not resign, it advises dissolution of the House of Representatives. The House of Councillors is never dissolved. There must be a general election of members of the House of Representatives within forty days from the date of dissolution.⁶⁰ The principle of collective responsibility of the cabinet can best be ensured if the cabinet has the power to dissolve the Chamber to which it is responsible. Collective responsibility of the cabinet is further emphasised by Article 70. It says that when there is a vacancy in the post of the Prime Minister, the cabinet shall resign en masse. The identity of the cabinet, of which the Prime Minister is the head, is unknown to law without the Prime Minister and in his absence it does not exist. And the Prime Minister is the leader of the majority party or parties in the House of Representatives.

Responsibility and control go together. There are two important methods by which the House of Representatives maintains its control over the executive. The first is through the medium of questions and interpellations. It provides an opportunity to the members of the House to seek information on various matters of administration and seek redress in case of abuse of authority. The late Professor Laski succinctly said that parliamentary government "lives and dies by publicity it can secure not only on governmental operations, but on all the knowledge it can obtain on the working of social processes." The Constitution of Japan requires the Prime Minister to report on general national affairs and foreign relations to the Diet.⁶¹ The cabinet also reports at regular intervals, and at least annually, to the Diet and the people on the state of national finances.⁶² Report on national finances embraces all the aspects and problems of administration. All kinds of treaties must also be ratified by the Diet.⁶³

The second instrument of controlling the executive is the criticism which is constantly aimed at the government in the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives is also a debating society and this is done when Bills before the House are being discussed and debated. In fact, the entire policy of the government is under review on all such occasions. Since the defeat of a Bill means the defeat of government, the Opposition makes a bid to expose the government and if possible to depose it. The government on its part makes all-out efforts to defend its policies and actions. Another opportunity for criticism is provided when the national finances are discussed by the House, more especially the proposals for expenditure.

The House of Representatives, spearheaded by the Opposition, accordingly, provides ample opportunities for controlling the cabinet which is vested with the executive power. The Constitution also provides for setting up committees of investigation by each House of the Diet. These committees may conduct investigation in any matter relating to government and demand the presence and testimony of witnesses, and the production of records.⁶⁴ Investigation by committees is an effective method of supervising and controlling administration, though it seems incongruous in a system of government in which ministerial responsibility is its basic element and is constitutionally provided. Moreover, investigation by committees in the United States has not much to commend.

Judicial Functions

Article 64 provides that the Diet "shall set up an Impeachment Court from among the members of both Houses for the purpose of trying those judges against whom removal proceedings have been instituted." Article 78 further provides that "Judges shall not be removed except by public impeachment...." The Court of Impeachment so set up consists of fourteen members, seven from each House of the Diet, and tries those judges against whom removal proceedings have been instituted by an Indictment Committee. The Indictment Committee, too, consists of an equal number of members from each House of the Diet. No one can be a member of the Court of Impeachment and the Indictment Committee simultaneously.

Constituent Functions

Amendments to the Constitution can be initiated in either House of the Diet and when the motion passes by a two-thirds majority of all the members of each House, it is submitted to the people for their approval at a referendum where it is required to have an affirmative vote of a majority of all votes cast. The House of Representatives and the House of Councillors can, thus, initiate constitutional amendments by a concurring vote of two-thirds or more members of each House.

Electoral Functions

The House of Representatives together with the House of Councillors designates the Prime Minister. If both the Houses disagree and no agreement can be reached even through a Joint Committee, or the House of Councillors fails to make designation within ten days after the Lower Chamber has made designation, the decision of the House of Representatives is accepted the decision of the Diet. Both the Houses determine by law the qualifications of the members and their electors with the proviso that there shall be no discrimination because of race, creed, sex, social status, family origin, education, property or income. Each House is the judge of disputes relating to qualifications of its members. But in order to deny a seat to any member, it is necessary to pass a resolution by a majority of two-thirds or more of the members present. Electoral districts, method of voting and other matters pertaining to the method of election of members of both Houses are determined by law of the Diet.

LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE

Peculiarities of the Legislative Procedure

The legislative procedure in Japan is sharply distinguishable from the one prevailing in other countries with a parliamentary system of government. It is simple and matter of fact. There are just three stages which cover the career of a Bill: Introduction, Committee stage, and consideration in the plenary session of the House. The same procedure is followed in both the Houses. When both the Houses pass a Bill, it becomes an enactment of the Diet. The Emperor simply promulgates it. He has no power to veto it.

Normally the aims and objects of the Bill are not explained in the plenary session of the House on introduction. However, if the Committee on Ways and Means deems such an explanation necessary in respect of a particular Bill, the explanation is made before it is referred to a Committee. Another important feature of the legislative procedure is the Opposition's resort to obstructionist tactics, which take various forms and some of them are unprecedented in the legislative history. The never-decreasing majority commanded by the Liberal Democratic Party since 1955, has relegated the Socialists and their allies in a permanent minority. Since voting in the House of Representatives runs strictly on party lines, the Opposition puts determined obstruction to at least delay the enactment of Government Bills. They not only resort to filibustering, but even climax the obstruction by riots and use of violence on the floor of the House and the streets. There is another device of obstruction. The frustrated Opposition would block the corridors of the Diet in order to prevent the Speaker of the House of Representatives in calling the House to order. On various occasions the Speaker had been compelled to call in the police to physically remove the members preventing him from convening the House. There is still another tactic of boycotting the plenary sessions of both the Houses and the Committee meetings.

Kinds of Bills

Bills are of two kinds, Government Bills, and Members' Bills. A Government Bill and a Member's Bill may not differ in their content and both may relate to public matters. But a Government Bill is introduced in either House of the Diet by the Prime Minister himself or by one of the Ministers. A Member's Bill originates from a Member of the Diet. If a Government Bill is defeated, it brings crisis in the Government which may result into either resignation of the Cabinet or dissolution of the House of Representatives.

Introduction of the Bill

A Government Bill is always in pursuance of the policy determined by the Cabinet and it may aim at either amending the existing law or bringing on the statute a new law. The proposal for either of it originates from one of the Ministries, where it undergoes through various stages and thorough grooming in the departmental channels. When finally approved by the Minister concerned, the draft Bill goes to the Bureau of Legislation where it is subjected to expert examination. From here it goes to the Cabinet Secretariat. Finally, it is submitted to the cabinet for its approval.

If the Cabinet approves the draft Bill, it is ready for introduction in either House of the Diet. It is submitted in the name of the Prime Minister to the Presiding Officer of the House in which the Bill is desired to be introduced, except for Money Bills which must be introduced in the House of Representatives. When a legislative Bill is introduced in the House of Councillors, its copy is required to be submitted to the House of Representatives within five days of its introduction. The same procedure is followed if it is introduced in the House of Representatives.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives or the President of the House of Councillors, as the case may be, refers the Bill to the proper Committee of the House on the recommendation of the Ways and Means Committee. If a Bill is considered urgent, its examination by the Committee may be omitted by the decision of the Steering Committee. "This procedure is employed especially in the case of a Member's Bill on which the understanding of the Committee that would have deliberated on it has been obtained in advance." Normally, a Bill is not considered in the plenary session of the House. If, however, the Ways and Means Committee considers it necessary the explanation is made in the plenary session before it is referred to a Committee of the House.

Committee Stage

Committee stage is the most important stage in the career of a Bill. The Bill may be referred to either a Standing Committee or a Special Committee of the House and it has the power to pigeonhole it if the Bill is deemed "not worthy, necessary or desirable." It is, thus, tantamount to killing the Bill. The Committee holds public meetings and may require the attendance of the Prime Minister, Ministers, and government officials. They are required to answer to questions directed to them and make explanations on the Bill. The Committee may also summon publicmen to express their opinions on the Bill. It may make "investigating trips including travels abroad," if considered necessary. The Committee has always at its disposal the services of the Diet staff, including experts and researchers, for advice and guidance. It may also use the services of the National Diet Library or a thorough study and scrutiny of the Bill, and may demand, as often as necessary, opinion of the Bureau of Legislation on matters legal, constitutional and administrative. If the Bill involves consideration by more than one Committee, it is jointly considered.

Consideration by the House

After the Bill has been thoroughly examined, scrutinized and approved by the Committee, it is reported to the House for deliberation and a vote. The Chairman of the Committee presents the report together with the minority report, if any. The House then discusses and deliberates upon the report. Amendments can also be moved by the members. After all the clauses have been read and voted, the Bill as a whole is voted upon. In the event of a tie, the Presiding Officer casts a deciding vote.

A Bill Becomes a Law

After the Bill has passed through one House it is immediately sent to the other where it undergoes the same procedure. If the second House approves it, it becomes an enactment of the Diet and is transmitted to the Emperor for 'promulgation.' It becomes a law. If the House of Councillors rejects the Bill passed by the House of Representatives and no agreement could be reached in a Joint Committee of both the Houses, or the House of Councillors fails to take action within 60 days of its receipt, it becomes an enactment of the Diet when passed for the second time by the House of Representatives by a majority of two-thirds or more of the members present.

The Budget

A different procedure is followed in the enactment of the budget. According to Article 60, the budget must be submitted to the House of Representatives. It cannot originate in the House of Councillors. When the budget passes through the House of Representatives, it is transmitted to the House of Councillors. If the House of Councillors makes a decision different from the House of Representatives and when the Joint Committee of both the Houses fails to reach an agreement, or when the House of Councillors fails to take action on it within 30 days of its receipt, the decision of the House of Representatives is the decision of the Diet, that is, as if both the Houses of the Diet have approved the budget.

It is the constitutional duty of the cabinet to prepare and submit to the Diet for its consideration and decision a budget for each fiscal year. The process of formulation of budget starts sometimes in September when the Finance Ministry examines the estimates submitted by the various Ministries. This is an arduous task as it requires close examination of all such estimates which are very often exaggerated and consequently require drastic trimming. The draft budget is ready by January for the consideration of the cabinet and its discussion may extend to quite a number of meetings. When full agreement has been reached in the cabinet, the budget proposals are referred back to the Ministries for overhauling their estimates. The Finance Ministry then receives the final estimates from each Ministry. The Finance Minister in the light of such estimates prepares the budget which incorporates the statement of revenues and expenditure for the ensuing financial year commencing from April. The draft budget is again submitted to the Cabinet for its final approval.

The budget Bill is introduced in the House of Representatives in the later part of January. Its introduction is followed by the speeches of the Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister, the Finance Minister and the Director of Economic Policy Board. The House of Councillors usually receives the budget Bill the next day after its introduction in the House of Representatives. However, according to rules its submission may not be delayed beyond five days. The Prime Minister, the Foreign Minister, the Finance Minister and the Director of the Economic Policy Board also address the House of Councillors and they explain the various aspects of the policy involved and implications of the budget.

After the explanations of the Prime Minister and other Ministers, the Speaker refers the budget Bill to the Standing Committee on the Budget which consists of 51 members. The Committee thoroughly examines all proposals relating to revenue and expenditure and probes into each item. The Prime Minister, Ministers and officials of the Finance Ministry appear before the Committee to answer to questions, make explanations, elaborate and remove ambiguities and doubts. The Committee meets as a whole, except for a day or two when it divides into sub-committees. The sittings of the Committee are open to public.

After the completion of its deliberations, the Chairman of the Budget Committee submits the report to the House of Representatives. The House discusses the Budget Bill for a period of three to four weeks. It may accept the recommendations of the Budget Committee in toto or accept them with amendments. "The decision of the plenary session may or may not be the same as that of the Budget Committee." But rejection of the Budget Bill by the House of Representatives brings the downfall of the government or the cabinet may decide the dissolution of the House.

The Budget Bill as passed by the House of Representatives is transmitted to the House of Councillors for its consideration. As pointed out earlier, if the House of Councillors does not agree with the decision of the House of Representatives and if the disagreement is not resolved even in the Joint Committee of both the Houses, or the House of Councillors fails to consider the Budget Bill within 30 days of its receipt, the decision of the House of Representatives is final and in terms of the Constitution, it is the decision of the Diet. The budget becomes operative on April 1. If for certain reasons, the Budget Bill is not passed before April 1, then, it is necessary for the Diet to pass provisional budget on a monthly basis until such time as it is finally passed.

Committees of the Diet

The Committees of the Diet are the core of the legislative process in Japan. Their origin goes back to the Meiji Constitution when five Standing Committees were set up in each House of the Imperial Diet. But these Committees did not play a vital role then as they do now since most of the legislative business was transacted in the plenary sessions of the two Houses. As under the Constitution of 1947, originally the House of the Councillors and the House of Representatives each had 22 Standing Committees. Their number was subsequently reduced to 16 and it stands now. There are in each House Standing Committees on: Cabinet, Local Administration, Judicial Affairs, Foreign Affairs, Finance, Education, Welfare and Labour, Agriculture, Forestry and Fisheries, Commerce and Industry, Transport, Communications, Construction, Budget, Accounts, Steering, and Discipline. Most of these committees correspond to the Ministries of the Government.

A Standing Committee may consist of thirty, forty or fifty members, except for Discipline, and Steering and Accounts Committees, which have a membership of 20 and 25 each respectively. Soon after both the Houses of the Diet have elected their Presiding Officers, the next step is the selection of the Committees. Members to each Committee are appointed by the Presiding Officer of the House concerned on the basis of the party strength in the House. According to the law of the Diet, each member must serve on at least one Standing Committee but not on more than three Committees. Chairmanships of the Committees are allocated to the parties roughly in proportion to the number of seats each party commands in the House. Since the Liberal Democratic Party commands nearly two-thirds of total membership in each House, the Government Party, therefore, monopolises the Chairmanships of almost all the Standing Committees. Committee Chairmanship is the most coveted since it carries with it great prestige. "Not only is a chairman able to influence the legislative programme of the government but is able to enjoy the prerequisites and compliments of his office which are considerable. As presiding officer, the Chairman not only opens and closes the meetings of the Committee but works out the agenda, determines the order of business and regulates the speed of deliberations. He is in control of the various stages of the Committee's work, questioning, debate, and decision. In his capacity as the spokesman and representative of the Committee in all its external relations and negotiations, he becomes a key figure."⁶⁵

The Standing Committees are highly important organs of law-making and they have the power to kill legislative proposals or to enable them to succeed. Upon them devolves the "primary responsibility of selecting those legislative proposals submitted by the government and recommending them for approval and enactment." All proposals for legislation undergo an onerous process of examination and scrutiny and in order to hammer them through the Committees hold public meetings, in which witnesses representing different shades of opinion and interests are summoned to tender evidence and to make available all kinds of material, exhibits and documents to authenticate their point of view. Refusal to appear before a Committee is subject to a contempt charge.

The Standing Committees have been subjected to a severe criticism, particularly with regard to their numbers and the manner in which they function. The Committees are, it is said, too numerous in each House and consequently the affairs of the nation are divided into rigid watertight compartments. The government is a single whole and it requires an integrated action to solve the national problems. As the real work of examination, investigation and determination is done in the Committees, many of the details of facts and other relevant information remain unknown to the legislators who are not Committee members. Even the aims and objects of a Bill, according to the rules of legislative procedure, are not explained in the plenary session of the House. There is, accordingly, lack of interest among the members of the Diet. "This makes it difficult if not impossible to effectively dramatize the general debates on the floor of the House. In fact, it can often lead to the minimizing of the usefulness as well as the effectiveness of the general floor debate. It has also contributed to extremely poor attendance at plenary sessions except for very special occasions."⁶⁶ Moreover, the Standing Committees more or less correspond to the Ministries and there is a close link between both. Many Japanese believe that this system of close linkage between the legislative and executive branches has tended to strengthen the role of the executive. "Typical of the system has been the appointment to the appropriate Committee of Diet members with backgrounds, if not careers, in the matching ministry or executive agency. This creates a situation in which the bureaucratic loyalties of the Committee members may outweigh their legislative responsibilities and their constitutional position as members of the highest organ of state power."⁶⁷

Each House may establish Special Committees too by a special resolution of the House. They are ad hoc Committees set up to study particular problems or proposals and as soon as they complete their work, they become non-existent. The Standing Committees, on the other hand, are appointed for the duration of the session and a Bill appropriate to the subject-matter of the Committees is referred to it. The life of a Special Committee may extend beyond the session of the House in which it was created. The Chairman of a Special Committee is appointed by the members of the Committee itself and all matters before it are decided by a majority vote. The Chairman exercises a casting vote in case of a tie. Like the Standing Committees, the Special Committees too hold public hearings and can summon witnesses and demand production of any record or material. After the investigation is over the Committee reports to the House. If the report is not unanimous, both the majority and minority reports are submitted. Commenting upon the importance of the

Special Committees, Chitoshi Yanaga writes, "Actually, so far as the general public is concerned, it is the work of the Special Committees which attracts widespread attention and interest because of the emergency or sensational nature of most of the subject-matter handled."⁶⁸

The Constitution establishes two other kinds of committees, the Joint Committee of both the Houses, and the Committees of Investigation. Article 59 provides that in case the House of Councillors and the House of Representatives make different decisions on a legislative Bill, the House of Representatives may call a meeting of a Joint Committee of both Houses for resolving the disagreement. Similarly, a Joint Committee may be set up for resolving differences between the House of Councillors and the House of Representatives with regard to the budget, treaties, designation of the Prime Minister and constitutional questions. A Joint Committee consists of 20 members, equally drawn from both the Houses, and elected by the members of each House from amongst themselves. The members elected from each House select their own Chairman and each Chairman alternately presides over the meeting of a Joint Committee.

Article 62 of the Constitution provides for setting up the Committees of investigation by each House of the Diet. These Committees are empowered to conduct investigations on affairs relating to Government and may demand the presence and testimony of witnesses, and the production of records. Since the Constitution became operative a few such Committees, such as the Committee on Illegal Disposal of Government Property, have been set up. "In most cases the Committees investigating government operations assemble facts and submit reports on their findings and are content to stop there. However, in some cases they go a step further and pass judgment or make recommendations."

The Legislative Committee is yet another Committee. It is a Joint Committee of both the Houses and consists of 18 members, 10 from the House of Representatives and 8 from the House of Councillors, elected by each House from amongst its own members. This Committee has nothing to do with legislation. Its function is to ensure effective operation of the Diet and to maintain a smooth working relationship between the House of the Councillors and the House of Representatives. The Committee submits its reports to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the House of Councillors at every session of the Diet.

CHAPTER V

THE JUDICIARY

Judiciary under the Meiji Constitution

There was a complete transformation of the Judicial system in Japan during the Meiji period. The old antiquated concepts of legal system developed during feudalism were abandoned and new codes patterned on the Continental jurisprudence were enacted with the advice of German and French Jurists. Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence had no place therein. Judiciary was, accordingly, not an independent branch of the Government but an arm of the executive administered by the Ministry of Justice. Although judges were required to administer law impartially, but their dependence on the Ministry hardly guaranteed independence for them. There did not exist the rule of law and salus populi suprema lex, the welfare of the people is the supreme law, constituted the basis of the legal system. It was not within the competence of the courts to hold any law or executive order invalid. Nor could the courts safeguard the liberties and rights of the people. In case of disputes between the government and citizens the ordinary courts had no jurisdiction. Administrative adjudication was the concern of the Court of Administrative Litigation.

There were three kinds of courts: Ordinary, civil and criminal courts, Court of Administrative Litigation, and Military court. At the apex of the ordinary civil and criminal courts was the Supreme Court consisting of 45 Judges divided into 9 divisions of 5 Judges each. The Supreme Court exercised original and appellate jurisdiction. In cases of treason and serious offences against the Imperial Family, its jurisdiction was original. On the appellate side, it heard appeals both in civil and criminal cases from the lower courts.

Next to the Supreme Court were seven High Courts, one for each Province. The High Courts heard appeals from the lower courts. Then, there were 50 District Courts, at least one in each Prefecture. The District Courts tried more serious criminal and civil cases. At the bottom were Local Courts, a little more than 300 in number, which had the jurisdiction in minor cases.

The Court of Administrative Litigation was patterned after its French counterpart and was based on Prince Ito's belief that "if administrative activities were placed under the scrutiny and control of the judicature, and if courts of law were given the power to review and invalidate administrative acts, the executive would be subordinated to the Judiciary thereby impairing the integrity and effectiveness of the executive branch."

1. Chitoshi Yanaga, Japanese People and Politics, p. 355 f.n.

Features of the Judicial System under 1947 Constitution

Like various other institutions in Japan, the judicial system too was greatly changed under the impact of the Occupation Authorities. The changes effected related to the structure of the courts and judicial procedure and were in conformity with the democratic philosophy of law and jurisprudence as cherished by the Americans. "It is perhaps not surprising," writes Nobutaka Ike, "given the nature of the occupation, that many ideas and practices of Anglo-Saxon origin were incorporated into the judicial system, thereby changing its orientation which was formally predominantly Continental."² Even the oath of office "has been introduced in both form and language very much like that which obtains in the United States."³ Here is a summary of the changes which constitute the features of the Japanese Judicial system now.

(1) The Constitution separates the judiciary from the executive and makes it an independent branch of the government. Article 76 vests "the whole judicial power" in a Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as may be established by law. It further provides that no extraordinary tribunal shall be established "nor shall any organ or agency of the Executive be given final judicial power." In order to emphasise the independent status of the judiciary the Supreme Court actually controls all judicial affairs of the country. According to Article 77 the Supreme Court is vested with the rule-making power under which it determines the Rules of Procedure and of matters relating to attorneys, the internal discipline of the courts and the administration of Judicial affairs.

(2) The Constitution guarantees the independence of Judges and ensures the dignity of the judiciary. It ordains that all Judges shall be bound only by the Constitution and the laws.⁴ The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is designated by the cabinet and appointed by the Emperor.⁵ This procedure is designed to place the Chief Justice on the same level of rank and dignity as the Prime Minister. Judges of the Supreme Court are appointed by the cabinet⁶ whereas judges of the inferior courts are appointed by the cabinet from a list of persons nominated by the Supreme Court.⁷ Judges are liable to removal only by impeachment unless judicially declared mentally or physically incompetent to perform official duties. No disciplinary action against judges can be taken by any executive organ or agency.⁸

(3) The Constitution applies the principle of popular sovereignty on the Judges of the Supreme Court too. Their appointment is reviewed by the people at the first general election of the members of the House of Representatives following their appointment and every ten years thereafter. If the majority of the voters disapprove the appointment, the judge is dismissed.⁹ Judges of the inferior courts are appointed for a term of ten years subject to re-appointment. No Judge of the Supreme Court has so far been voted out of office and the judges of the inferior courts are invariably re-appointed. Yet it is a constitutional fact that their tenure at both levels is subject to review.

(4) There is a complete separation of judicial administration from criminal investigation by, placing the Procurator's (Prosecutor's) office under the control of the Ministry of Justice. The Judges and the Procurators consequently work independently of each other, both are separate and distinct functionaries. The Procurators are civil servants working under the supervision and control of the Minister of Justice whereas the judiciary is a separate and independent department of the Government.

(5) The principle of the Rule of Law has for the first time been introduced in Japan. There is now only one system of courts throughout the country and only one system of law to which all people are amenable. The whole judicial power is vested in the Supreme Court and other inferior courts and no extraordinary tribunal exists to administer justice. Nor is any organ or agency of the executive given final judicial authority. Accordingly, the Court of Administrative Litigation was abolished and administrative litigation is now placed within the jurisdiction of regular courts. Trials are conducted in open court and judgment is declared publicly. If the court unanimously determines that publicity of the trial proceedings is dangerous to public order or morals, the trial may be conducted privately. But trials relating to political offence, offences involving the press or cases wherein the rights of the people as guaranteed by the Constitution are questioned must always be held publicly.¹⁰

(6) The Code of Criminal Procedure and the Code of Civil Procedure assign to the courts a far greater role to play than was the case previously. Warrants for arrest and detention can now be issued only by the judges, the courts are to start with the presumption of innocence of the accused in criminal cases, and the legal validity of confessions has been greatly limited. Judicial decisions are now rendered in a simple colloquial language and, above all, the Constitution itself is couched in a simple and matter of fact language intelligible to the average Japanese.

(7) The Supreme Court is the Court of last resort with the power to determine the constitutionality of any law, order, regulation, or official act.¹¹ The Constitution is, therefore, supreme and the Supreme Court has been explicitly given the right of judicial review.

(8) The Constitution guarantees to the citizens Fundamental Rights and the courts are the Custodian of such rights. Article 97 declares that the Fundamental Rights are for all time inviolate and it is asserted in Article 98 that "this constitution shall be the supreme law of the nation and no law, ordinance, imperial rescript or other act of government or part thereof, contrary to provisions hereof, shall have legal force or legality."

(9) Another feature of the judicial system is the system of courts of

10. Article 82.

11. Article 81.

Domestic Relations. These courts are half arbitral and half judicial tribunals composed of judges and laymen and they decide cases involving domestic relations and juvenile delinquency.

(10) Finally, the Supreme Court, as Maki remarks, "has adhered strictly to the principle of the separation of powers but has honoured equally the doctrine of legislative supremacy."¹² The Court has insistently safeguarded its sole right to exercise the whole judicial power and resolutely resisted any interference on the independence of the courts. On the other hand, the Supreme Court has also consistently refused to declare legislative and executive acts unconstitutional. The Court has argued that to declare such acts as unconstitutional would be the violation of the principle of separation of powers as well as the doctrine of legislative supremacy. The proper "remedy for legislation not clearly constitutional is a political one, that is, the sovereign people can pass judgment on the Diet and on the Cabinet by means of the ballot."¹³

Organization and Functions of the Courts

The Judiciary consists of the Supreme Court, 8 High Courts, 49 District Courts (with 235 branches), and 570 Summary Courts. There are also 49 Courts of Domestic Relations or Family Courts (with 235 branches).

The Supreme Court

At the apex of the judicial structure is the Supreme Court located at Tokyo. It consists of a Chief Judge and fourteen other Judges, fifteen in all. The Chief Judge is appointed by the Emperor upon designation by the Cabinet, while all other Judges are appointed by the Cabinet and "attested" by the Emperor. The law provides that ten Judges, out of a total of 15 including the Chief Judge, must be legal experts of not less than 20 years' professional standing and the remaining five Judges may be learned persons of experience but necessarily in the field of law. "This is designed to permit a more democratic and varied representation of expertise on the highest tribunal of the nation." The appointment of the Judges of the Supreme Court is subject to review at a national referendum, first at the time of the general elections following their appointment and then at the first general elections after a lapse of ten years. There has been no case of dismissal as such so far. But the system of popular review "could conceivably result in drawing the court into the rough and tumble of partisan politics."

Judges of the Supreme Court are required to retire at an age fixed by law, which is 70 years. The minimum age of a Supreme Court Judge is fixed at 40 years. Judges cannot be removed from office except by public impeachment unless judicially declared mentally or physically incompetent to perform official duties. No disciplinary action against Judges can be administered by any executive organ or agency. The Constitution demands that all Judges shall be independent in the exercise of their conscience and in order to ensure their independence adequate compensations are guaranteed, which cannot be decreased during their terms of office.¹⁴

12. Maki, John M., Government and Politics in Japan, p. 107.

13. Maki, John M., Government and Politics in Japan, pp. 107-108.

14. Article 79.

The Supreme Court is the Court of the last resort with powers to determine the constitutionality of any law, order, regulation or official act. The power of judicial review is, thus, explicitly vested in the Supreme Court. In all cases involving questions of constitutionality the Grand Bench of the court of all 15 Judges, 9 constituting a quorum, hears the appeals. In other cases in which issues of law are involved appeals are heard by a petty bench consisting of five Judges, three constituting a quorum.

The Supreme Court is vested with the rule-making power under which it determines the Rules of Procedure and of practice, and of matters relating to attorneys, the internal discipline of the courts and the administration of judicial affairs. Public Procurators are subject to the rule-making power of the Supreme Court. This is, indeed, a sweeping power. The Supreme Court may delegate some of its rule-making authority to lower courts. This is how the Supreme Court exercises supervision and control on the entire judicial system in the country. "A key organization through which the court exercises its broad powers of judicial control is the Legal Research and Training Institute, established by law under the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Among other things, the Institute is responsible for the training of every person interested in a legal career." No one can, thus, become a judge, a lawyer, or a public prosecutor unless he graduates from the Institute or has undergone a course of in-service training there. The Supreme Court also operates similar institutes for training of the clerks of the court and family-court probationers. Judges of the inferior courts are appointed by the Cabinet out of the list of nominations made by the Supreme Court.

High Courts

In the second rank, below the Supreme Court, are the 8 High Courts. The jurisdiction of a High Court extends to the region to which it is assigned and, accordingly, it has a regional jurisdiction. The number of Judges differs from one High Court to the other. Tokyo has 64 Judges whereas Sapporo has only 7. The Court operates through a bench of three Judges, but in case of trial for crimes to overthrow the government the bench consists of five Judges. Judges are appointed for ten years, although there is no restriction on their being re-appointed. They are appointed by the Cabinet from a list of persons nominated by the Supreme Court. Judges must have at least ten years' experience in a judicial capacity, or as a Procurator or as a practising lawyer.

The jurisdiction of a High Court is essentially appellate and for a great many cases its decisions are final. The original jurisdiction of the court is limited to crimes to overthrow the government.

District Courts

Beneath the High Courts are 50 District Courts (with attached courts of Domestic Relations), one in each of Prefectures except for Hokkaido which has four. The Judges of the courts are similarly appointed as Judges of the High Courts and they must possess similar qualifications. District Courts are the principal trial courts and exercise a general jurisdiction over all civil actions not specially given to other courts. A single judge presides over the court, except for more serious cases when a panel of three judges conduct the trial.

The District courts have attached courts of Domestic Relations, 49 in number with 235 branches. These courts are peculiar to Japan and are designed to promote harmonious relationship within the family and among relations. A Court of Domestic Relations or a Family Court, as it is now popularly designated, is composed of one judge and two intelligent and experienced laymen. These courts provide facilities for the out-of-door settlement of disputes relating to probate and domestic disputes, such as, divorce, alimony, breach of promise, inheritance, property division, adoption, guardianship, and other similar matters. Normally, judicial procedure is not followed in every case as there are chances of settlement outside the court. To the best, Family Courts may be characterised half arbitral, half judicial.

Summary Courts

The last are 570 Summary Courts which are at the base of the judicial pyramid in Japan. These courts handle minor civil and criminal cases. In civil cases the amount involved should be less than 5,000 Yens and in criminal cases the sentence awarded to an accused should be less than a month. The presiding officer has a broad latitude in the conduct of trials. Let it be repeated that Judges of the inferior courts, including High Court and District Judges, are appointed by the Cabinet from a list of persons nominated by the Supreme Court, and their appointment is for ten years, although there is no restriction on their being reappointed. They retire at the age of 70.

CHAPTER VI

POLITICAL PARTIES

Historical Background

Political parties did not emerge in Japan as a result of the establishment of parliamentary system of government in 1947. Their origin goes back to 1874, though there were no political parties then in the real sense of the term. They were political clubs and societies. Early in January 1874, Itagaki organized a political association called the Patriotic Public Party to carry on a movement for the realization of liberty and attainment of popular rights. Immediately afterwards a "Memorial for the establishment of popular Representative Assembly" was presented to the Emperor. It caused a stir in the country and had a magnetic effect on the people. But the Emperor's Government undertook measures to suppress the movement and the Patriotic Public Party went out of existence after only two months of its existence. In 1878, the party was revived with the avowed object of pressing forward its original demand for the establishment of a representative assembly. It had somewhat an inflammatory effect. The government first used suppressive measures to crush the agitation, but soon realized the futility of the oppressive policy and ultimately bowed to the popular demand. An Imperial Rescript issued on October 18, 1881 declared that the national assembly would be established in 1890.

Six days after the issuance of the Imperial Rescript, the Liberal Party was established and it became the vanguard of the movement for popular government. Closely in its wake came the Progressive Party followed by the Imperial Party. The Progressive Party, popularly known as the Reform Party, advocated liberalism of the British type and freely preached the philosophy of Bentham and John Stuart Mill. The Government was alarmed by the activities and programme of both the Liberal and Progressive Parties and in order to counteract their influence on the people, it backed the founding of the Imperial Party. It was for all intents and purposes a Government supported party. Its membership comprised government officials, Buddhist and Shinto priests, and nationalist scholars who were the product of government schools.

All the three parties disbanded in 1885, partly as a result of Government's repressive policy directed against the Liberal and Progressive Parties and partly as a consequence of their internal dissensions. Ito, who had by then come back from Germany, was strongly opposed to political parties and he caused the liquidation of the Imperial Party. Ito became Prime Minister in 1885. He pushed ahead, with the support of Inoue, the Foreign Minister, his programme of Westernization, which strongly aroused the champions of civil rights, "as well as the nationalists and the chauvinists." Inoue's attempt in 1887 to make concessions in the negotiations for treaty revisions was denounced by Agriculture and Commerce Minister Tani and it was followed by a scathing criticism of the Government by the various segments of the Japanese society. Goto strongly appealed to the sentiments of the people and exhorted them to join the forces against the Government. Members of the disbanded Liberal Party, the nationalists and the conservatives all joined together and formed a "Greater Coalition of Parties."

The Government accepted the challenge and issued on December 19, 1887, a Peace Preservation Ordinance which authorized the expulsion of all those engaged in anti-government activities from an area within a radius of seven and a half miles from the capital. Nearabout 600 people were expelled as a result of this ordinance. The movement then spread to the outlying areas. In the meanwhile Ito was successful in bringing Okuma, his old colleague with whom he had parted political company in 1881, in government as Foreign Minister. "In the succeeding government headed by Kurdo, Okuma became the mainstay of the Cabinet and actually came to lead if not dominate it."

Immediately after the Meiji Constitution became operative in 1889, Prime Minister Kurado declared his faith in the supra-party government and he was supported by Ito, who was then President of the Privy Council. The Prime Minister succeeded in winning over Inoue, Gato and Itagoki and they were taken in the Cabinet. "All these political leaders," observed Chitoshi Yanaga, "fought against the ruling oligarchy espousing the cause of liberalism and popular rights. Yet, when lured with government posts of sufficient prestige, they gave up their fight and gladly joined the ranks of those in power. Their devotion to the ideals of responsible government or even to political parties was not only weak and expedient but easily purchasable." That was the nature of political parties in Japan till 1890.

When Sino-Japanese War came in 1894 Opposition against the government ceased altogether. But soon after the cessation of hostilities the two leading Opposition parties realised "that for years they had been duped, bought and exploited by the government and it was imperative they abandon their useless and harmful struggle with each other and join forces in the fight against their common political enemy, the Satsuma-Choshu clique that was in control of the government." They founded a party in 1898, a merger of the defunct Liberals and Progressives.

Roundabout the century another dramatic development took place in the growth of political parties. Prince Ito, who had all through bitterly opposed political parties, became their supporter. He declared that for good and efficient government political parties were essentially necessary and, accordingly, in 1900, he founded a party known as the Association of Political Parties. Till 1913, those who had been affiliated with the Progressive Party did not regroup to form another party. They were content to form coalitions. It was only between 1913 and 1925 that the Constitutional Association, which had the support of elder statesmen and business leaders and advocated the establishment of constitutional government, was organised. World War had created an impact on the Japanese people in favour of democratic institutions and it appeared by 1920 that a full-fledged parliamentary government would soon be established. Beginning from Kato Takakira, the President of the Constitutional Association, till the assassination of Inuki Tsuyoshi in 1932, party leaders, except once for General Tanaka Giichi, headed the Government.

One important feature of this period was that the political parties depended heavily on the big industrial combines, Zaibatsu, which supplied them with funds to fight elections. Some of the business magnates supported the opposing parties at the same time in order to win the support of the government, no matter which party came into power. This "alliance between the parties and the Zaibatsu naturally caused the public to be suspicious that the government was partial to the interests of the big business, and these suspicions seemed to be confirmed by the frequent charges of bribery and corruption that were aired in the Diet, principally by the party which happened to be in opposition at the moment."

There were some other reasons, like the growth of big cities and localisation of industries, formation of labour unions, spread of education, the growth of white-collar class, etc., which created a political awakening amongst the Japanese people and they demanded enlargement of the suffrage and consequently the right to vote. But paradoxical as it was, most of the Japanese leaders were reluctant to enlarge the electorate. The bureaucrats, too, considered it ominous. They thought that enlargement of the electorate would bring social instability which would prove highly injurious to the growth and development of the country and its people. But the popular demand could no longer be resisted and in 1925, all male Japanese people of 25 years of age and more were given the right to vote.

But with the extension of suffrage, the Diet passed the Peace Preservation Law which provided punishment extending to ten years for persons guilty of joining societies and organizations advocating a change in the Constitution, the Emperor institution and in the ownership of private property. This punitive legislation, however, did not deter the growth of radical parties. The Farmer-Labour Party was established in 1925 to achieve equality and the greatest good of the masses as its goal. Back in 1892, socialism had found its way in Japan when the radical faction in the Liberal Party separated and established the Oriental Liberal Party. After quite an upheaval in the career of the socialist parties with different labels, in 1922 the Japan Communist Party found its way. It was banned in 1923, but was again revived in 1927 followed by severe suppression in 1928, and by 1932 its central leadership was completely destroyed.

In spite of the fact that various socialist parties including the Anarchist and Syndicalist groups had come and gone during this period, but they had created an indelible impression on the working class. They, however, failed to carry the voters along with them primarily due to their internal strife and government's repression. In 1928 elections, the first on the basis of universal manhood suffrage, the four socialist parties ran 88 candidates but could capture only 8 seats in the House of Representatives. After that they failed to enlist even this meagre support of the electorate and by 1930 suffered a great set-back.

The conservative parties, too, suffered from deep factionalism. Accordingly they commanded neither reasonable respect nor a continuous support from the electorate. None of them had a clear and definite programme. Lack of responsibility to the Diet made the Government irresponsible and the members had no effective means to control it. The militarists seized the opportunity. They attributed the distress caused by the economic crisis, political distress prevailing in the country, and diplomatic failures in the international field to the scandalous behaviour of the political parties and the politicians. People, too, had lost faith in the ability and integrity of the political parties to solve the national and international problems which confronted the country. The party government came to an end in 1932. The militarists who had come into power exercised such a pressure that ultimately in 1940, the political parties found their complete exit. From 1940 to 1945, there existed only one body in the country, the Imperial Rule Assistance Association, "a mild version of a totalitarian party."

POST-WAR POLITICAL PARTIES

Re-appearance of Political Parties

After the exit of political parties from the national scene for about a decade and a half they re-appeared in 1945, when as a prelude to the setting up a democratic set up of government the Occupation Authorities issued a directive to the Japanese Government on October 4, 1945 for removal of restrictions on political, civil and religious liberties. The Japanese Government was directed to immediately abrogate the operation of all provisions of laws, decrees, orders, ordinances and regulations which restricted freedom of thought, of religion, of assembly, of speech and press. The Directive also ordered the Japanese Government to release all political prisoners. A week later, General MacArthur desired that the Government should adopt, as rapidly as possible, the emancipation of women by granting them the right to vote, to encourage formation of labour unions, and endeavour to democratize economic institutions.

The Directive proved a green light for the resumption of political activities and consequently re-appearance of political parties. In the first general elections held in April 1946, there were as many as 260 "parties" excluding scores of organizations which could not be counted as political parties. After the first mushroom growth, four political parties—the Liberal Party, the Progressive Party, both conservatives in spite of their attractive labels, the Social Democratic Party, and the Japan Communist Party—finally stabilized themselves. In 1955, the Liberal and Progressive Parties merged into one and the new Party was named the Liberal Democratic Party. The reunification of the Socialists, who had hitherto been engaged in stormy conflict among themselves, alerted the conservatives to take stock of their future. Thus, in 1955 there emerged "what could be described as a formal two-party system. But the unification among the Socialists was only a temporary phase. There were again factional splits and in 1959, the Socialist Democratic Party was divided into two separate parties, the Socialist Party (the old left wing) and the Democratic Socialist Party. The following table shows the party position in the House of Representatives³ for the elections held on December 26, 1960 and December 20, 1963.

In the elections held in December 1969, the Liberal Democratic Party won 288 seats in 486-member House with another 12 won by party members who were allowed to run as Independents, thus, making a total of 300. The seats secured by other Parties were: Buddhist Komeito Party 47, Democratic Socialist Party 31, Socialist Party 90, Communist Party 14, and other Independents 4.

The party position in the House of Councillors, after the elections held on July 4, 1965,⁴ is as follows:—

Characteristics of the Japanese Party System

Here are some of the important characteristics of the Japanese party system:—

(1) The Meiji Constitution established a bicameral legislature. Though the House of Representatives was directly elected and was subject to dissolution, yet it did not establish a cabinet system of government. It only envisaged it. In 1900, when Prince Ito felt the political expediency of forming a party government and declared that the constitution nowhere prohibited a party government that political parties took a firm root in the administration of the country. From 1924 to 1932, party leaders headed the government.

The Constitution of 1947 clearly establishes the parliamentary system of government. The Emperor is the symbol of the State and the Cabinet is vested with the Executive power. The Constitution requires that the Prime Minister, who heads the Cabinet, should be designated from among the members of the Diet and a majority of the Ministers constituting the Cabinet must be chosen from among the members of the Diet. The Constitution also provides for the collective responsibility of the Cabinet to the Diet, and the Diet is subject to dissolution. All these are the characteristics of a party government which should come into office as a unit and go out of office as a unit. The Cabinet makes a team, the members of which play the game of politics under the captaincy of the Prime Minister. In order to put a united front they swim and sink together. Homogeneity is, therefore, the essence of their existence and solidarity ensures their stability in office. Party system is, as such, the basis of the Cabinet government. Yet, the Constitution does nowhere mention the party system. It is an extra-constitutional growth in Japan as it is in other democratic countries having parliamentary system of government.

(2) For the smooth working of such a system of government, it is desirable that there should be a two-party system, one in office and the other in opposition. But the bane of Japanese politics is the multiplicity of political parties. In the pre-war era there were as many as 360 parties at one time and when the Constitution of 1947 became operative the number was more than 260. They could not really be characterised as political parties. They were just various groups and associations and the result of various traits of Japanese character. Habits of nations like that of individuals seldom die and the multiple party system continues as before causing considerable complexity in the political life of the country.

(3) Splits and merger of the parties is a regular feature in Japan. Fondness of variety and newness have an admirable appeal to the Japanese and both these factors constantly account for the growth of splits and the multiplicity in the number of the parties. "Most if not all these mergers have been effected by incompatible groups for expediency and have been marriages of convenience. Even members who bolted the party, as well as splinter parties, have been re-admitted without much ado into the parties. Political parties change their labels with the greatest of ease and without changing their policies. More often than not, names are changed merely to accommodate the newly won members or simply to give the psychological effect and illusion that the party is making a fresh start."⁶

(4) The process of merger was highlighted in 1955, when the Conservatives and the Socialists both closed their ranks and formed two distinct political parties. Some optimists fervently predicted that the two-party system had finally been established in Japan. But factionalism soon plagued the unity of the Socialists and after a truce of only four years they again divided and formed two separate parties. The Liberal Democratic Party remains, no doubt, united so far and it is the ruling party since 1955, but internal strife is as rampant now among the Conservatives as before. In fact, both the Conservatives and the Socialists are "congeries of factions," and if the latter have separated, the former remain united only as a matter of political expediency. If they separate their ruling position disappears. "It would, however, be risky to predict that such a condition will last indefinitely. It has been true, since 1955, but we must remember that there have been years of unexampled prosperity and freedom from national crisis in Japan."

(5) None of the parties in Japan are mass organizations. They are largely associations of professional politicians who centre their activities in Tokyo. They operate among a coterie of professional politicians and administrators and their prime focus of attention is the House of Representatives which actually designates the Prime Minister and provides a majority of ministers. Seldom do they go in their constituencies to nurse them and lead the people. There may be scattered prefectural and local party offices, but their contribution in the basic party offices is negligible. All important work is done at the party headquarters. The Diet-centred nature of the political parties makes them essentially parliamentary parties. Here Japan is akin to France.

(6) Another important feature of the party system in Japan is the steady influx of the officials, serving and retired, into the parties and the Diet. A well recognized political axiom in Japan is to enter the civil service with a view to begin a political career. A civil servant who has ambition of becoming a minister must at some point run for a seat in the Diet. "Since about 1949, the number of ex-bureaucrats in the conservative parties have increased appreciably, until in recent years they represent about one-fourth of the members of the House of Representatives belonging to the Liberal Democratic Party." In four Cabinets between 1957 and 1960 the ex-officials had held about one-half of the Cabinet posts. Most of the post-war Prime Ministers have had long careers in civil service as Shidehara, Yoshida, Ashida, Kishi and Ikeda. The result is that the "Japanese politics has undergone a kind of bureaucratization," and, as such, there has come into being concentration of party activities in the Diet oblivious of the importance and role of the extra-parliamentary segment of the party.

(7) Localism is still a strong factor in the Japanese politics. The electors generally prefer to vote for a candidate who belongs to them rather than to a party and the programme it stands for. The theory of "friends and neighbours" determines the choice and it is an important aspect of the electoral behaviour. It is believed that the candidate who lives in the immediate vicinity is most likely to best represent the local interests.

(8) It, however, goes to the credit of Japan that religion has not provided a basis of organisation of political parties. There are no religious blocs and no religiously dominated parties. There is secularization of politics and politicians do not use religion for political purposes.

PARTIES AND POLICIES

Liberal Democratic Party

The Liberal Democratic Party which is now in power, was established in 1955 as a result of the merger of conservative groups. The Liberal Party and the Democratic Party (previously the Progressive Party) unified to counteract the unity of the Socialists. The Liberal Democratic Party stands for: the preservation of the principle of popular sovereignty, respect for and protection of the worth and dignity of the individual, his rights and freedoms, clean government, revision of the Constitution with a view to elevate the position and status of the Emperor as Head of the State in place of the symbol of the State, restoration of the right to defence of the country, limited rearmament for self-defence, educational and technological development, expansion in foreign trade and planned industrial growth, industrial peace and workers' welfare and application of social security on a broader national base, a diplomacy closely associated with the United Nations which will bring Asia closer to the rest of the world, co-operation with the free world and especially with the United States, a cautious approach to the normalization of relations with the People's Republic of China and Soviet Russia.

The Party considers itself a national party and seeks support from all strata of the population. But the Party is backed most heavily by rural communities, owners of commercial and industrial establishments in the towns and cities, and high level administrative personnel in government agencies and of corporation executives. The Party is headed by the President, who is chosen by a party conference consisting of Party members of the two Houses of the Diet, and delegates chosen by the prefectural branches of the Party. Other important Party officials are the Secretary General, the Chairman of the Executive Board, and the Chairman of the Political Research Committee, the National Organization Committee and the Party Discipline Committee. The Headquarters of the Party are at Tokyo and it is here that vast majority of the Party's work is transacted. In fact, for purposes of most policy decisions and day to day business, the Party is almost exclusively controlled by its higher membership normally resident in Tokyo, although ultimate authority rests with the Party Conference or Congress. The Party claims a total registered membership⁸ of approximately 1,500,000, but American commentators hold that it is in the neighbourhood of 300,000.⁹

The Liberal Democratic Party is in power since 1955, and since Socialists are sharply divided amongst themselves there is no possibility to oust them from office. But the Party itself is torn into factions and it is estimated that there are at present 13 factions,¹⁰ each having its own following, in the House of Representatives. It is, therefore, difficult, as Robert E. Ward observes, "to describe accurately the leadership of the Liberal Democratic Party. Superficially, the party is led by its President who, since this is normally the majority party, is also apt to be the Prime Minister of Japan. But when we look more closely, we soon see that the Liberal Democratic Party really has no single leader. In fact, it is in some ways more accurate to view it as a loose coalition of factions united for purposes of campaign and legislative strategy rather than as a unified national party."¹¹

Japan Socialist Party

In October 1955, the Japan Socialist Party was established under the Chairmanship of Mosaburo Suzuki. The Party resulted from the reunification of left and right-wing Socialists who had been split for years. But they again separated in 1959, and the Democratic Socialist Party was established on January 24, 1960 by dissident right-wing members of the Socialist Party. The Japan Socialist Party is now the second largest legislative Party in the Diet commanding 144 seats in the House of Representatives¹² and 73 in the House of Councillors.¹³ The chances for the Socialist Party to come to power are remote and it must play the role of an opposition for many years to come.

The platform of the Socialist Party may be described as follows:—Re-adjustment of Japan's foreign relations with emphasis being put on the establishment of a collective non-aggression and mutual security system including Japan, United States and the Soviet Union; demobilization of the present defence forces and creation of a democratic national police; establishment of democracy and the socialization of major industrial and financial institutions to create a welfare and cultural State; attainment of a self-sustaining economy and the development of land to absorb the unemployed. The Party aims to achieve its objective through peaceful revolution. That is, by obtaining an absolute majority in the Diet in accordance with democratic forms. A socialist administration would first be established and stabilised and the capitalist society would steadily be converted into a socialist society.

The Party claims to be class-mass party, with its nucleus the working class, and a union of toiling classes made up of farmers, fishermen, small and medium commercial and industrial enterprises, intellectuals and others constituting the great majority of the people. Socialist Party, too, is highly centralised in Tokyo, where an elaborate Party Headquarters is maintained. At the top is the national convention, which meets every year and is made up of delegates of local Party units and affiliated organizations. The convention elects a Central Executive Committee, its Chairman and Secretary-General. The convention is the ultimate source of policy and adopts the party platform.

The Democratic Socialist Party

The reunification of the Socialists in 1955 did not eliminate the ideological and the personal feuds which had ever plagued the Socialist movement in Japan. They remained together for four years and the eventual split came in October 1959, when a group within the Japan Socialist Party led by Nishio Suehiro, issued a statement that "there is an urgent desire in Japan for a democratic socialist party which, while abiding by parliamentarianism, will fight both extreme leftists and rightists and promote the general welfare of all sections of the working people, without special favour or partiality to labour unions." The members of the "Socialist Reconstruction League" led by Nishio formally seceded from the Socialist Party to organise a "genuine" Socialist Party. It actually came into being on January 24, 1960 and was named the Democratic Socialist Party.

At the time of their separation the dissidents had the support of some 35 Socialist members in the House of Representatives and their number increased to 40 before the General Elections in December 1960. They fared poorly in this election securing only 17 seats. In the General Elections in December 1963, the Party captured 23 seats and in December 1969, it won 31 seats. The organization of the Democratic Socialist Party resembles that of the Socialist Party. At the head of the Party is the Chairman of the Executive Committee with the Secretary-General who is in charge of administration. The ultimate authority is vested in the Party Congress.

The policy of the Democratic Socialist Party may be summarised as follows:

- (1) opposition to capitalism and totalitarianism of both the right and the left;
- (2) respect for the dignity of the individual;
- (3) pursuit of an independent foreign policy; and
- (4) establishment of a welfare State through planned economy and socialist means.

The Communist Party

The Communist Party was formally organised in 1922, but it remained outlawed until after World War II. The Party has run candidates in all the General Elections since 1946, but its electoral and parliamentary successes have been modest. The Party reached the peak of its strength in the 1949 General Elections, when it polled 5.6 per cent of the total votes and won 35 seats in the House of Representatives. In 1960 elections it had 3 seats each in the House of Representatives and the House of Councillors. In the elections of 1963, the Communist Party won 5 seats in the House of Representatives. In 1969 elections it secured 14 seats. According to a recent survey membership of the Communist Party is about 47,000.¹⁴ All Japan Congress constitutes the supreme authority within the Japan Communist Party. The Congress is now convened after every two years. Delegates to the Congress are elected by Party members through their local organizations. The Congress formulates the Party platform, discusses governing regulations, lays down the principles of political action. Since the Congress does not meet regularly, it does not actually initiate policy. The principle of democratic centralism rigidly operates. The Party Congress elects the members and candidates of the Central Committee. In 1961, 60 members and 35 candidates were elected. There is a Central Committee Directorate of eight members. The Central Committee meets at least once every three months. The Secretariat of the Central Committee consists of ten members and is headed by the Secretary-General. The Party Congress also elects a Central Control and Supervision Committee.

CHAPTER VII

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Pre-war Local Government

The pre-war system of Local Government was established shortly after the Meiji Restoration. The 250 fiefs in which the country was then divided were consolidated and replaced by prefectures. Governors were appointed to man the administration of the prefectures and it symbolised the assumption of authority by the Emperor. Care was also taken that none of the prefectures bore the names of the provinces of feudal era. In 1888 and 1889, before the convocation of the First Imperial Diet, several basic laws relating to Local Government were promulgated "in order to prevent the Diet from sharing in the formation of the system of local government." The object being to prevent popular control of local government and to centralise in the central authority the power over local government affairs. Consequently the impact of local autonomy was weak.

The Governor of each prefecture was appointed by the Emperor on recommendation of the Home Minister, and, as an Imperial appointee, he was the official and mouthpiece of the Government at Tokyo. Although there was in each prefecture a popularly elected assembly which deliberated and voted on the budget promulgated by the Governor, the power of the assembly was only advisory "since the Governor either dominated the assembly or could by-pass it if it refused to accede to his wishes." The Ministries of the Central Government, especially the Home Ministry and the Finance Ministry which were most concerned with prefectural affairs, had the authority to issue directives and instructions to Governors, and to suspend or cancel actions of the Governors. "Centralization and bureaucracy rather than local autonomy and democracy were the prevailing principles of local government in pre-war Japan."

In the beginning Mayors of towns and cities were nominated by the Ministry of Home Affairs. In the decade following 1920, however, the Mayor and his Deputies came to be chosen by the Municipal Assemblies. The Municipal Assemblies consisted of 30 members or more who were elected for a term of four years. The assembly met once a month but for the speedy transaction of business a Municipal Council, consisting of 10 to 15 members of the assembly and elected by the assembly itself, was established. The Municipal Council met as frequently as the exigencies of business demanded.

Local Autonomy under the Constitution, 1947

The Occupation Authorities were intent to reverse the old order of things and to democratise the political structure of the country at all levels. To the local Government they were determined to provide the greatest opportunity for democracy and "home rule." Accordingly, the Constitution of 1947 contains a separate chapter on Local Government and establishes the principle of local autonomy. Article 92 provides that the organization and operations of local public entities would be fixed by law "in accordance with the principle of local autonomy." Article 93 provides that the local entities shall establish assemblies as their deliberative organs and to enact their own regulations. The chief executive officers of all public entities and members of their assemblies would be elected by direct popular vote. Article 94 empowers local public entities the right to manage their property, affairs and administration and to enact their own regulations. Consistent with the democratic principle of local government, Article 95 explicitly stipulates that the Diet would not enact a special law applicable only to one local entity without the consent of the majority of votes of the local public entity concerned.

All matters relating to local public entities are determined and controlled by the provisions of the Local Autonomy Law of 1947, which has frequently been revised since then. There are, thus, three levels of government in Japan: the national government, prefectural government, and the municipal government. The term local government embraces the prefectural and municipal levels and the government at both these levels is governed by the provisions of the Constitution and the Local Autonomy Law of 1947, as amended from time to time.

Japan is today divided into 46 major political sub-divisions known as prefectures. Of the 46 prefectures one is a metropolis, one is a district, two are urban prefectures and 42 are rural prefectures. There were more than 3,700 cities, towns and villages in 1960, which were entitled to a municipal government. But recent legislation³ has encouraged the amalgamation of municipalities, and very many of them have since merged for reasons of economy and efficiency. As a result of this process of merger in 1964, there were, in 1964, 559 cities, 1,971 towns and 874 villages.⁴ Certain large cities have been designated as "special cities" and they enjoy considerable independence from control from governments of the prefectures in which they are located.

The functions of local government units are twofold: (1) to enforce certain national laws, and (2) to enact and enforce legislation of the local governments themselves. In the performance of functions relating to the first category, the local government acts as an agent of the national government and is under the supervision of the Ministry for which it acts. In the second category are included functions on which local entities are competent to legislate and enforce by-laws so enacted. These powers are delegated to local government entities by laws passed by the Diet. The Constitution does not enumerate functions of the local government. But it does not mean that local entities are entirely at the mercy of the national government. Article 94 of the Constitution provides that local public entities have the right to manage their property, affairs and administration and to enact their own regulations within the law. Article 96 further provides that a special law, applicable only to one local entity, cannot be enacted by the Diet without the consent of the majority of voters of the local entity concerned.

The matters which local governments are competent to deal with, as per local Autonomy Law, include: maintenance of public order, protection of health and safety of the people inhabiting the locality, setting and management of parks, playgrounds, canals, irrigation and drainage waterways, water plants, sewerage system, electric plants, gas plants, public transportation, docks, piers, warehouses, schools, libraries, museums, hospitals, asylums for the aged, jails, crematories, cemeteries, disaster relief, protection of minors, indigents and the infirm, land reclamation, identification and registration of inhabitants, zoning, co-ordination of activities with other local bodies, and levying and collection of local taxes. Local governments are prohibited from dealing with matters relating to national affairs including judicial matters, penal punishment, national transportation and communication, post offices and national institutions of learning and research. They may not contravene the laws and cabinet orders and ministerial regulations authorised by law. A municipality may not contravene the by-laws of a prefecture. At the same time, the national government may not deal with matters within the jurisdiction of the local entities.

Chief Executives

Each prefecture has a Governor as its executive head whereas a municipality has a Mayor. Both are elected by the voters of their respective units for a term of four years. They can be recalled from office by their respective voters or removed from office on a vote of no confidence passed by the relevant assembly. According to the Local Autonomy Law when a Governor acts on behalf of the national government to enforce national laws, he is subject to the directions and supervision of the Minister concerned. When a Mayor acts on behalf of the national government, he is subject to the directions and supervision of the Minister as well as the Governor of the prefecture of which the municipality is a unit. In case a Governor does not enforce the law or fails to obey directions, the Minister concerned may move a court with the request to order the Governor to perform the function as required. In the event of continued failure of the Governor to perform duties assigned and directions issued, the Minister concerned may enforce the law himself, and the Prime Minister may remove the Governor from office. Similarly, if the Mayor of a municipality fails to enforce national laws or by-laws of the prefecture or the directions issued thereto, the Governor of the prefecture concerned may compel him to obedience by an order of the court or may remove him from office. Thus, the local executive has to serve two masters. He is the agent of the central government in national matters and as an elected officer, subject to recall and removal from office, to the people of the locality and their representatives in local matters.

Local Assemblies

Every prefecture has an assembly and a municipality a council. At both levels it is a popularly elected deliberative body. The size of the prefectural assembly varies from 40 to 120, depending upon the size of the prefecture. Similarly, the size of a municipal council depends upon the population of the municipality and it varies from 12 to 100 members. Members of an assembly as well as a municipal council are elected for a term of four years, subject to dissolution by the Governor or the Mayor as the case may be. They may be recalled by the voters who may also demand a dissolution of the entire body.

The local legislative bodies, the assembly and the municipal council, have the power to make by-laws on all subjects assigned to the local jurisdiction by the Local Autonomy Law and as enumerated above. It must be carefully noted that the national Diet enacts "laws" whereas legislation enacted by local bodies is known as "by-laws." The subjects within the legislative competence of the local legislative bodies include the budget of the local government, the acquisition, management, and disposal of the entity's property, levying and collecting local taxes, and matters falling under the jurisdiction of the assembly and the Council in accordance with laws and Cabinet orders.

The Governor and the Mayor have the power to veto legislation passed by the assembly and the council respectively. But if the assembly or council again passes it by a two-thirds majority, it becomes a by-law. For a motion of no confidence to pass against the local chief executive of the prefecture or the municipality, there should be a quorum of two-thirds of the total membership and that three-fourths of the legislators vote for the no-confidence motion. When the motion for no-confidence is passed the local chief executive must either resign or dissolve the assembly or council as the case may be. If it is dissolved and the newly elected legislative body again passes a no-confidence motion, the local chief then must resign.

In addition to the executive and legislative wings of local government there are in the prefectures and in many cases on the municipal level, too, Boards of Education, Public Safety Commission, Inspection Commissions and Personnel Commissions. Members of the Commissions are usually appointed by the Governor or Mayor with the approval of the concerned legislative branch, and they are subject to recall.

There is a provision of direct devices of initiative, and recall in the Local Autonomy Law. If one-fifth of the registered voters of a locality demand the enactment of a by-law, the local chief executive must present such a demand along with his own opinion on it to the legislative body. The local chief executives, certain other executive officials, members of the assembly and councils, and members of the Commissions, can be recalled from office on a petition signed by one-third of the voters of the constituency concerned.

Conclusion

This is a brief description of the legal position of the units of local government in Japan. But their "actual position deviates from this in several important respects. They are not really autonomous to anything like the degree anticipated by the law." In practice, there has been a steady increase in the Central control and supervision of local government particularly in matters relating to education, police and local finance. In 1960, the Autonomy Agency, after having remained an agency of the Prime Minister's office, became an independent Autonomy Ministry charged with the duty of maintaining proper supervision of local government. None of the units of local government are self-supporting and to meet their deficits they depend upon subsidies and grants-in-aid from the Central Government. "This pronounced degree of fiscal dependency plus the long-ingrained bureaucratic habit of looking to Tokyo and the national government for guidance detracts greatly from the actual degree of autonomy enjoyed by the prefectures, cities, towns and villages of Japan."

The Government of Pakistan

CHAPTER I

THE COUNTRY AND ITS PEOPLE

The Genesis of Pakistan. Pakistan was created in August 1947, to be the state organisation of the Muslim "nation" of the Indian sub-continent and it was the culmination of the two-nation theory the seeds of which go as early as 1888. Sir Syed Ahmed Khan, the founder of the Aligarh Movement, "had laid down the premises which lead naturally, perhaps even necessarily," remarks Penderel Moon, "to the idea of Pakistan."¹ Sir Syed Ahmed Khan had asserted that India was inhabited by two different nations and there would necessarily be a struggle for power in the event of transfer of sovereignty to Indian hands. "Is it possible," he posed a question, "that under these circumstances two nations—The Mohammedan and Hindu—could sit on the same throne and remain equal in power?" Sir Syed himself answered, "Most certainly not. It is necessary that one of them should conquer the other and thrust it down. To hope that both could remain equal is to desire the impossible and inconceivable."² Earlier on January 16, 1883, speaking in the Imperial Legislative Council on the Bill for providing the elective principle in the Municipal Committees, Sir Syed Ahmed Khan observed, "India, a continent in itself, is inhabited by vast populations of different races and different creeds: the rigour of religious institutions has kept even neighbours apart: the system of caste is till dominant and powerful. In one and the same district the population may consist of various creeds and various nationalities."³ He, accordingly, defended the principle of nomination of a certain number of municipal representatives.

Sir Syed Ahmed Khan was opposed to the Indian National Congress and dissuaded the Muslims from joining it. He unequivocally confessed that he had "undertaken a heavy task against the so-called Indian National Congress," and declared that the parliamentary system of government as demanded by the Congress was "unsuited to a country containing two or more nations tending to oppress the numerically weaker."⁴ He wrote to Badruddin Tyabji, the President of 1887 Session of the Indian National Congress, when the latter made earnest efforts to conciliate him with the Congress: "I do not understand what the words 'National Congress' mean: Is it supposed that the different castes and creeds living in India belong to one nation, or can become a nation, and their aims and aspirations be one and the same? I think it is quite impossible, and when it is impossible there can be no such thing as a National Congress, nor can it be of equal benefit to all the people." He further told Tyabji, "You regard the doings of the misnamed National Congress beneficial to India, but I am sorry to say that I regard them as not only injurious to our own community but also to India at large. I object to every Congress in any shape or form whatever which regards India as one nation."⁶

Sir Syed, thus, made the major assertion that India had more than one nation and the Muslims were bound together not by linguistic or geographical ties, but by their religious brotherhood. The concept of secularism was attacked as it was completely alien to Islam. Religion and politics were inseparable for them. There was, therefore, nothing in common between the Muslims and the Hindus, two warring nations, who had not forgotten "the days of strife and discord which preceded the peace brought to India by the British supremacy."⁷

Sir Syed Ahmed Khan was not then asking for the partition of India and there was no possibility of the British leaving India at that period of her history. In fact, Sir Syed was a great admirer of English people.⁸ He considered that the British rule in India "was the most wonderful phenomenon the world had ever seen." His object was to oppose the establishment of democratic institutions in India, for which the newly-founded Indian National Congress was hard pressing, as the numerically larger community would totally override the interests of the numerically smaller community. He feared that the introduction of democratic principles similar to the Western would inevitably involve the establishment of Hindu Raj and such a condition of perpetual bondage the Muslims were taught never to accept. In 1942, Choudhry Khaliquzzaman gave the copy of Sir Syed Ahmed Khan's speech to Prof. Coupland,⁹ when he was brought from Allahabad to Lucknow by Sir Maurice Hallet, the Governor of the United Provinces, to discuss the political situation in the country with him. Chaudhry Khaliquzzaman, referring to Sir Syed Ahmed Khan's speech, observed, "This speech was delivered almost sixty years before it came under discussion between Prof. Coupland and me, but in content, appropriateness and vigour it appeared as fresh as if delivered a day previously."¹⁰ For, "in propounding the two-nation theory and drawing attention so pointedly to the difficulties of majority rule in a country where the population is not homogeneous, he had not only put his finger on the main crux of the problem of Indian constitutional development, but also by implication had suggested a possible answer to it; for if two nations could not sit on the same throne, why should they not divide it."¹¹ converting Sir Syed Ahmed Khan anti-Congress and anti-Hindu. They had been described the empire builders in the "far off lands."¹² The British policy of alienating the Muslims and using them as a counterpoise took a definite shape in 1888, when Hume, the founder of the Indian National Congress, started his mass movement. The Secretary of State, Lord Cross, wrote to Lord Dufferin on January 4, 1887, in reply to the Viceroy's report regarding the abstention of Muslims from the annual session of the Congress, that "this division of religious feelings is to our advantage." Lord Dufferin was responsible for initiating the theory of special importance of Muslims in Indian politics and also reminded them that "they themselves constituted a nation and a very powerful nation as their number was more than fifty millions."¹³ The Partition of Bengal was used as a major device by Lord Curzon to drive a wedge between the Hindus and Muslims. In a speech delivered in the Nawab of Dacca's palace on October 1, 1905, the Viceroy outlined the scheme of the Partition of Bengal and said, "I am giving you a Muslim Province."

The strategy of Lord Curzon and his successors was to set one religion against the other and class against class in order to shatter the image of national unity and to disintegrate the feelings of national solidarity. Lord Minto on behalf of the Secretary of State for India, John Morley, soon after assumption of office, began to elaborate the scheme of reforms, which should at least satisfy the Moderate elements in the Indian National Congress. But the Viceroy's main concern and interest in the scheme of reforms was to devise means for weaning the Muslims from the politics of the country and obliterating from their minds a sense of nationalism. Before the intended reforms could find a shape, a scheme for weaning the Muslims had taken a tangible form. A deputation of Muslims was engineered to meet the Viceroy and to present their demands. The main actors in the drama were Principal Archibald of the Aligarh College and Colonel Dunlop Smith, Private Secretary to the Viceroy.

A deputation consisting of thirty-five prominent Muslims drawn from different Provinces and led by His Highness the Aga Khan met the Viceroy on October 1, 1905 and presented him an Address in which they made two important demands on behalf of the Muslim community. The first was that the position accorded to the Muslim community in any kind of representation should be commensurate with their numerical strength and also with their political importance and the value of the contribution that "they make to the defence of the empire," and consistent with the "position they occupied in India a little more than hundred years ago. Secondly, that the method of nomination and election, as operative under the Act of 1892, had failed to give the Muslim community a proper type or adequate number of representatives and if the principle of election was to be accepted by the Government in the forthcoming reforms, they should be given the right of sending their own representatives by themselves through separate electorates comprising the Muslims alone.

Lord Minto expressed his entire agreement with the demands put forward by the Aga Khan deputation and gave an assurance that in any system of "representation whether it affects the municipality or a district board or a Legislative Council in which it is proposed to introduce or increase an electoral organisation the Muslim community should be represented as a community." The Viceroy also sympathised with the extra-claims of the Muslim community and told the members of the deputation: "You justly claim that your position should be estimated not only on your numerical strength, but in respect of the political importance of your community and the services it has rendered to the Empire." He further remarked, "I am entirely in accord with you. Please do not misunderstand me; I make no attempt to indicate by what means the communities can be obtained, but I am as firmly convinced as I believe you to be, that any electoral representation in India would be doomed to mischievous failure which aimed at granting a personal enfranchisement regardless of the beliefs and traditions of the communities composing the population of this continent." Finally, the Viceroy gave a definite assurance to the Muslims that "their political rights and interests will be safeguarded in any administration" with which he was concerned.

Lord Morley did not initially approve the plan of separate electorates as recommended by the Government of India, but ultimately succumbed to the pressure of Lord Minto. Just ninety days after the Aga Khan deputation met the Viceroy, the Muslim League was founded with the avowed object of supporting, whenever possible, all measures emanating from the Government, to protect the cause and advancement of the interests of the Muslims, to controvert the growing influence of the Indian National Congress, and to attract the young educated Muslims for public life within the fold of the Muslim League.

The Morley-Minto Reforms conceded to Muslims as a community separate electorate and weightage of seats. The system of separate electorates was mischievous as it threatened to break India's political unity and it did actually divide the country in 1947. Curzon had kindled the baneful communal consciousness in partitioning Bengal and carving out Eastern Bengal and Assam as a separate Province with a Muslim majority. Morley-Minto Reforms gave it a more concrete form by spreading the fangs of communalism throughout the country and achieved the greatest victory for the British Empire in the twentieth century. Mahatma Gandhi aptly remarked that the "Minto-Morley Reforms have been our undoing. Had it not been for separate electorates then established, we (Hindus and Muslims) should have settled our differences by now."

The system of communal representation was opposed to history and all codes of political morality. It had nowhere existed before and perhaps nowhere else it had been thought to divide the people of a country in this manner even by the worst followers of Imperialism. But the British did it by dividing Indians by creeds and classes and thereby creating political camps against each other which taught the people to think as fanatic partisans and not as citizens. The results were disastrous. "A political barrier," said Jawaharlal Nehru, "was created round them (Muslims) isolating them from the rest of India and reversing the unifying and amalgamating process which had been going on for centuries. . . . This barrier was a small one at first for the electorates were very limited, but with every extension of the franchise it grew and affected the whole structure of public and social life, like some canker which corrupted the entire system. It poisoned the municipal and local self-government and ultimately it led to fantastic divisions. There came into existence separate Muslim Trade Unions and Students' Organisations and Merchants' Chambers....these electorates first introduced among the Muslims spread to other minorities and groups till India became mosaic of these separatist compartments....Out of them have grown all manner of separate tendencies and, finally, the demand for splitting of India."¹⁴

The first clear expression of splitting the country is to be found in an address to the Muslim League in 1930 by Sir Mohammad Iqbal. He had mainly in mind what is now West Pakistan. In November-December 1930 during the First Round Table Conference Choudhri Rahmat Ali had met many Muslim leaders in London and explained to them his scheme of partition and gave it the name of Pakistan.¹⁵ But the Council of the Muslim League did not "take any notice of the President's (Sir Mohammad Iqbal) address nor put forward any concrete proposal touching the subject."¹⁶ Later on a four-page leaflet, Now or Never, written by Choudhri Rahmat Ali, Mohammad Aslam Khan, Shaikh Mohammad Sadiq and Inayatullah Khan, was privately circulated from Cambridge in January, 1933, claiming to be on "behalf of thirty-three million brethren, who lived in Pakistan—by which we mean five northern units of India, viz., Punjab, N.W.F.P., Kashmir, Sind, and Baluchistan." They opposed the scheme of federation which had been decided upon in the Round Table Conference and maintained that "The Muslims of Pakistan, a distinct nation, with a homeland of the size of France and a population equal to the French, demand the recognition of a separate national status."

The Muslim delegates to the Joint Select Committee regarded Pakistan "only a student's scheme." One of them even said, "It is chimerical and impracticable." In 1933, Sir Mohammad Shah Nawaz of the Punjab Muslim League published a book entitled Confederacy of India, and anonymously ascribed it to "A Punjabi." His scheme divided India into five zones: (1) The Indus Region, (2) Hindu India, (3) Rajasthan, (4) the Deccan States, and (5) Bengal. Unlike the scheme of Pakistan as proposed by Choudhri Rahmat Ali, "A Punjabi" did not favour the idea of complete separation of the units. He advocated for a loose union between the different units, "Separate countries should be re-assembled in a confederacy of India." Some time after, Sir Sikander Hayat Khan, the Premier of Punjab, put forward Outlines of a Scheme of Indian Federation. He, too, proposed division of India into seven zones connected together by a limited authority of the Centre. Sir Sikander could foresee the dangers inherent in raising the bogey of Pakistan.

The Government of India Act, 1935, "took no account of the Pakistan 'chimera'. With the full concurrence of Jinnah and the Muslim League, Muslim interests were sought to be protected by other means."¹⁷ It envisaged the establishment of a federation under which the Provinces were to enjoy a large measure of Provincial Autonomy. Sind was separated from the Presidency of Bombay and made a separate Province thereby making four Muslim majority Provinces—Bengal, Punjab, North-West Frontier Province, and Sind—out of a total of eleven. The system of separate electorates for Muslims with weightage was continued. It was envisaged that the Princely States would be included in the federation and that their representatives would have a neutralising influence at the Centre. The Provinces and the Chief-Commissionership were to be the compulsory units of the Federation whereas it was voluntary for the Princely States. The Federal Part of the Government of India Act, 1935 could only become operative when the Rulers of States representing not less than half the aggregate population of the States and entitled to not less than half the seats to be allotted to the States in the Upper Federal Chamber had acceded to the federation and an address had been presented to the King by both the Houses of Parliament calling upon the establishment of the federation.

It was, thus, the Provincial part of the Government of India Act which came into operation on April 1, 1937. The federal part had necessarily to be deferred. Till 1939, negotiations with the Rulers of the States regarding the terms of their accession were still in progress when the Second World War came in September. The Viceroy suspended the federal part till the end of the War. It could not, however, be revived after the War due to many political developments in the country. On the Provincial side, the Indian National Congress contested the elections and won an absolute majority in the Provinces of Madras, Central Provinces, United Provinces, Bihar and Orissa. In the four Provinces of Bombay, North-West Frontier Province, Bengal and Assam it emerged as the largest single party. The Muslim League could not achieve resounding success in the Muslim-majority Provinces. Such success as it could achieve was in the Provinces in which Muslims were in a minority. Probably its greatest strength was in the United Provinces where the Muslims were only 16 per cent of the total population, and "had succeeded in retaining a political importance disproportionate to their numbers."¹⁸ And it was from here that the cry of Pakistan really spread. It is interesting to note, says Javid Iqbal, "that Muslim national consciousness developed in the Hindu majority provinces before it came to the Muslim majority provinces; in the latter Islam was on the defensive. It was the Muslims of the Hindu majority provinces who made the whole of Muslim India conscious that Islam was in danger."¹⁹

The Congress agreed to form Ministries in June 1937, in the seven Provinces—North-West Frontier Province, the United Provinces, the Central Province, Bihar, Orissa, Madras and Bombay—on definite assurance from the Viceroy, Lord Linlithgow, that the Governors would not interfere in the day-to-day administration of the Provinces. In 1938, the Congress formed coalition ministries in Assam and Sind. Non-Congress ministries functioned in Bengal and Punjab. The Muslim League members of the Provincial Assemblies, in some of the Hindu-majority Provinces, and particularly in the United Provinces, had expected that they would be invited by the Congress to form coalition ministries. But it was not done. The Congress told the Muslim League Party in the Assembly that they must "cease to function as a separate group." Penderel Moon says, "This proved to be a fatal error—the prime cause of the creation of Pakistan—but in the circumstances it was a very natural one."²⁰ The Muslim League leaders rejected the Congress offer and Mr. Jinnah proclaimed that "Muslims can expect neither justice nor fair play under Congress Government" and all hope of communal peace had been wrecked "on the rocks of Congress Fascism." Since then it became a creed with the Muslim League to preach that in any unified and independent government of India, the Muslims would ever remain in a permanent minority and that eventually they must reverse.

The Congress ministries remained in power for twenty-eight months, between 1937 and 1939. India was implicated in the War without her consent and the Indian National Congress declined to offer any co-operation "in war which was conducted without the consent of the Indian people and which was meant to consolidate Imperialism in India and elsewhere." When the Congress ministries resigned in November 1939, the Muslim League celebrated their exit from office as a day of Deliverance and Thanksgiving. In 1939, the League issued "three documents" containing details of atrocities that had been committed by the Hindus on the Muslims and brought serious charges against the Congress ministries. Referring to these charges Penderel Moon remarks that "mountains were made out of mole-hills and trivial communal incidents of everyday occurrence" were "painted in lurid colours so as to inflame popular feeling."²¹ Prof. Coupland's remarks in this respect are pertinent. He said, "An impartial investigator would come to the conclusion that many of those charges were exaggerated or of little serious moment.... and that the case against the Congress Governments as deliberately pursuing an anti-Muslim policy was certainly not proved.... However that may be, the indictment of Congress rule was all too easily credited by the Muslim rank and file."²²

The Pirpur Report,²³ "with all the one-sided examples of hardships on Muslims inflicted by Hindus that had been sedulously supplied to him (Raja of Pirpur), and with quotations from even little known persons who posing as Hindu leaders had inadvertently spoken ill of Muslims,"²⁴ became Jinnah's trumpeted and he was determined to have his Pakistan.

"So far as I am aware," writes Choudhry Khaliquzzaman, "no other member of the committee helped him in the gigantic task of collecting material for a report on the conditions of the Muslims in the Congress Provinces and the Raja had to travel from place to place in the discharge of his onerous duty." Pathway to Pakistan, p. 228.

24. Sri Prakasa, Pakistan: Birth and Early Days, p. 6. Sri Prakasa was the first High Commissioner accredited to Pakistan.

He told Sri Prakasa, "as soon as Pakistan is established, all possible problems would be immediately solved."²⁵ This happened in April 1939. When the Federal Part of the Government of India Act, 1935 was suspended on September 11, 1939, the Muslim League passed a resolution welcoming such suspension and demanded that the entire constitutional problem of India should be considered de novo, and that the League be assured that no declaration regarding the question of constitutional advance for India would be made without the consent and approval of the Muslim League. Nor any constitution would be framed and finally adopted by His Majesty's Government and the British Parliament without such consent and approval. On November 23, a day after the Muslim League celebrated the Deliverance Day on the resignation of Congress Ministries, the Viceroy, Lord Linlithgow, wrote to M.A. Jinnah, "His Majesty's Government are not under any misapprehension as to the importance of the contribution of the Muslim community to the stability and success of any constitutional development in India. You need therefore have no fear that the weight which your community's position in India necessarily gives their views will be under-rated." Jinnah again wrote to the Viceroy on February 23, 1940, demanding the assurance that "no commitment will be made with regard to the future Constitution of India or any interim settlement with any other party without our approval and consent."

Then, came the Lahore session of the Muslim League in March 1940. In his presidential address M.A. Jinnah emphasised the difference between Hinduism and Islam. He said, Hinduism and Islam "are not religions in the strict sense of the word, but are, in fact, different and distinct social orders, and it is a dream that Hindus and Muslims can ever evolve a common nationality. . . . The Hindus and Muslims belong to two religious philosophies, social customs, literatures. . . . To yoke together two such nations under a single State, one as a numerical minority and the other as a majority, must lead to growing discontent and final destruction of any fabric that may be so built up for the government of such a State." In a resolution passed on March 23, 1940, the League demanded a sovereign independent Pakistan. The resolution, inter alia, read, "Resolved that it is the considered view of this Session of the All-India Muslim League that no Constitutional Plan would be workable in this country or acceptable to the Muslims unless it is designed on the following basic principles, viz., that geographically contiguous units are demarcated into regions which should be so constituted, with such territorial adjustments as may be necessary, that the areas in which the Muslims are numerically in a majority as in the North-Western and North-Eastern zones of India should be grouped to constitute "Independent States" in which the constituent units shall be autonomous and sovereign." The Pakistan Resolution, thus, demanded in plain terms the partition of India and the grouping of regions in which Muslims were in majority, as in the north-western and north-eastern zones, into Independent States, that is, a federation of Punjab, North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan with complete sovereign and autonomous powers, and of other States in the East with similar powers.

Penderel Moon is responsible for making the statement that "Privately Jinnah told one or two people in Lahore that this Resolution was a 'tactical move' and the fact that six years later he was ready to accept something less than absolute partition suggests that in 1940 he was not really irrevocably committed to it. In part, therefore, it may have been at this time a tactical move, designed to wring from Congress concessions which would make partnership more tolerable.²⁶ Anyway, till 1947 the shape of things to come were never expounded. But Sir Sikander Hayat Khan "was gravely embarrassed by this resolution." He disliked the idea of Pakistan—"or Jinnistan as he irreverently called it." He had more than once publicly stated that if Pakistan meant "a Muslim Raj here and a Hindu Raj elsewhere," he would have nothing to do with it. Fazl-ul-Haq, the Premier of Bengal, was also opposed to Pakistan, though he had publicly not rejected the demand. Whatever be the extent of their inward or outward opposition it enamoured the Muslims. "To the Muslim masses this held out an ill-defined and alluring prospect of looting Hindus. With greater clarity of vision, ambitious politicians and civil servants, as also some professional men, perceived that under a Muslim Raj, with the crippling if not the elimination of Hindu competition, they could rise to positions of power and affluence unattainable in a single mixed Hindu-Muslim State. Thus the cry for Pakistan appealed to and excited powerful appetites and individual hopes, and these, once aroused, would not be readily assuaged."²⁷

In 1940, Winston Churchill had become the Prime Minister of the National Government in England and L.S. Amery headed the India Office. On August 8, 1940, the Viceroy made a statement regarding the political future of India. He recognised the right of Indians to frame their own constitution subject to certain obligations and responsibilities which devolved on the British Government. The Constitution-making body, he declared, would be set up after the War. The statement of the Viceroy was pregnant of definite assurances to the Muslim League that the British Government would not transfer power to any system of government whose authority would be directly denied by "large and powerful elements in India's national life." As an interim measure for the duration of the War, the Viceroy would "invite a certain number of representative Indians to join the Executive Council and to establish a War Advisory Council." The Congress rejected the offer. The entry of Japan into War in November 1941, made the British Government to realise the gravity of the situation. Accordingly, on March 11, 1942, Churchill announced that Sir Stafford Cripps, a member of the War Cabinet, would go to India to explain certain proposals of constitutional reforms accepted by the British Government and "to satisfy himself on the spot, by personal consultation" that those proposals would "achieve their purpose."

The proposals which Cripps brought with him were published on March 30, 1942. They embraced an interim and long-term settlement. The goal of India was declared to be the Dominion Status. In order to implement them immediately after the War steps were to be taken to set up in India an elected body charged with the task of framing a new constitution for India. The Indian States were to be associated with the Constitution-making body. The Constitution so framed was to be implemented by the British Government, but any Province of India had the right to reject the new constitution and retain its existing constitutional position, provision having been made for its subsequent secession, if it so desired. With the non-acceding Provinces, if they so desired, the British Government would be prepared to agree upon a new constitution giving them the same full status as the Indian Union. The Constitution-making body would then conclude a treaty with the British Government covering all necessary matters arising out of the complete transfer of responsibility from British to Indian hands and guaranteeing the protection of racial and religious minorities. The provision that any Province would be at liberty to reject the constitution and frame a new constitution for itself by an agreement with the British Government was tantamount to indirectly accepting the demand for Pakistan. Since the Cripps' proposals aimed to please both the Congress and the Muslim League, they could please none and were rejected.

26. Penderel Moon, Divide and Quit, p. 21.

The rejection of the Cripps' proposals was followed by a rapid deterioration of the political situation in the country. The Working Committee of the Congress, in its resolution of July 14, 1942, demanded that the British Government should immediately abdicate authority in India and if it was rejected the Congress would be compelled to launch a wide-spread non-violent struggle. This was "Quit-India" ultimatum. On August 9, 1942, the Government arrested Mahatma Gandhi along with all the members of the Congress Working Committee and some other top-ranking leaders of the Congress. The All India and the Provincial Congress Committees were declared unlawful and thereafter the wholesale policy of repression and suppression ensued. The repressive policy of the Government led to a spontaneous movement of widespread sabotage, violence and crime. M.A. Jinnah was alarmed on the happenings in India. He could not anticipate such an open revolt of the people animated with the fervour for freedom. Lest the fervour of the Muslim youth find the same expression for freedom, Jinnah tried to impress on the Muslims that the "Quit-India" movement was not directed against the British alone, but it had its objective to subjugate the Mussalmans of India to the perpetual domination of the Hindus. The Working Committee of the Muslim League declared that "this movement is directed not only to coerce the British Government in handing over power to a Hindu oligarchy and thus disabling them from carrying out the moral obligations and pledges given to the Mussalmans and other sections of the people of India, but also to force the Mussalmans to submit and surrender to the Congress terms and dictation." In October 1943, Lord Linlithgow was succeeded by Lord Wavell. On February 17, 1944, while addressing the Central Legislature the Viceroy said, "You cannot alter geography. From the point of view of defence, of many internal and external economic problems India is a unit." This note of India's unity was sharply opposed to the League's slogan of "Divide and Quit."

The persistence of the Muslim League on the division of the country produced the "separate and be done with it" mood with many in the Congress and C. Rajagopalachari was the first to give public expression to this feeling. In April 1942, just after the departure of the Cripps' Mission, at a meeting of the Madras Legislative Congress Party, he got a resolution passed conceding the demand for Pakistan. This was widely resented and was deemed to have damaged the stand of the Congress and consequently Rajaji had to resign from the Congress. On June 14, 1945, L.S. Amery, the Secretary of State for India, made a statement in the House of Commons and said that "the offer of March 1942 stands in its entirety and without change or qualification." It was proposed to reconstruct the Governor-General's Council pending the settlement of main constitutional problem. With the exception of defence all the portfolios at the Centre were proposed to be transferred to the Indian members, and further assurances would be given that the Governor-General's veto over the majority decisions of the Council would be sparingly used. It was proposed that the composition of the reconstructed Executive Council would be based on the principle of communal parity which meant equality of seats in the Council for the caste Hindus and Muslims, leaving other communities including non-caste Hindus to get separate representation. Lord Wavell, the Governor-General, convened a conference at Simla of leaders of all important political parties, but there was no agreement on the composition of the Council. The Muslim League insisted that it alone had the right to recommend all the names of Muslim members to the Council. The Congress, as a national organisation, insisted upon the inclusion of two Congress Muslims. Lord Wavell thereupon announced the failure of the Simla Conference.

Lord Wavell made another announcement in September 1945, wherein he made clear the policy of the Labour Government which had then come into power. In a broadcast speech he announced the intention of "His Majesty's Government to convene as soon as possible a Constitution-making body." As a preliminary to the convening of a Constitution-making body new elections of the Central and Provincial Legislatures were to be held. After the elections, the announcement continued, steps would be taken to reconstitute the Executive Council with the support of the main political parties. In the new elections the Indian National Congress captured almost all non-Muslim seats in all the Provinces, majority of the Muslim seats in the North-West Frontier Province, and some Muslim seats in the United Provinces, Central Provinces and Bihar. The Muslim League captured nearly all the Muslim seats except in the North-West Frontier Province. Congress ministries were formed in all the Provinces except Bengal and Sind. In the Punjab a coalition Ministry was formed of the Unionists, the Sikhs, and the Congress.

With the completion of elections and formation of ministries in the Provinces the next stage was the implementation of the second part of September, 1945, announcement. In the winter of 1945-46, a Parliamentary Delegation drawn from different parties in Britain visited India with the object of going round the country and forming their own opinion as to the general political situation in the country. On their return home the delegation gave an informal account of their impressions to the British people in general and to the members of Parliament in particular. On February 19, 1946 the British Government made an important announcement in Parliament that a Mission consisting of three Cabinet Ministers—Lord Pethic Lawrence, the Secretary of State for India, Sir Stafford Cripps, the President of the Board of Trade and Mr. A.V. Alexander, the First Lord of the Admiralty—would visit India with a view to deciding in consultation with the Viceroy and the representative elements in India, about setting up the machinery for framing India's Constitution. On March 15, 1946, Clement Attlee, the Prime Minister, in his speech in the House of Commons, while assuring the minorities that they should be enabled "to live free from fear," maintained, "we cannot allow a minority to place a veto on the progress of the majority."

The Cabinet Mission arrived in Karachi on March 23, 1946 and left for England on June 29. In May a Conference was held at Simla with the representatives of the Congress and the Muslim League. But there could be no compromise between the two and the Cabinet Mission announced its decision in an outline scheme on May 16, which had the approval of His Majesty's Government. The scheme put forward by the Indian National Congress for a united India was rejected. The proposal of the Muslim League to establish Pakistan was also rejected. The scheme proposed by the Cabinet Mission was an attempt to meet half way the points of view of the Congress and the League. It proposed to establish a weak federation for the whole of India, with power vested in the Provinces to form groups with executives and legislatures, thus creating what would have been in effect a three tiered federation. That is, the Provinces were to be divided into three separate groups—two blocs of Muslims majority Provinces, one in the North-West and the other in the North-East, and one bloc of Hindu majority provinces. Each Province was left free to come out of the Group, after elections under the new constitution, by a decision of the majority of votes in its legislature.

The scheme was to be worked by a constitution-making body, representative of British India and States. Each Province was assigned seats on a population basis, roughly in the ratio of one to a million and members representing each of the three major communities, that is, General, all persons who were not Muslims and Sikhs; Muslims; and Sikhs. The elections were to be by proportional representation by means of a single transferable vote. The representatives of each community were to be elected by the elected members of that community in the lower House of the Provincial Legislature. The method of choice of the representatives of the Indian States was to be determined by negotiations with the Princes. At the preliminary stages, the States were to be represented by the Negotiating Committee. On this basis the constitution-making body was to be composed of 296 members from British India (General 210, Muslims 78, Sikhs 4 and 4 from Chief Commissioners' Provinces) and not more than 93 from the Indian States.

After holding a preliminary meeting the constitution-making body was to be divided into three sections, each section corresponding to the three groups of the Provinces—Punjab, N.W.F.P. and Sind formed Group B, Bengal and Assam formed Group C, and Madras, Bombay, C.P., U.P., Bihar and Orissa constituted A Group. Delhi, Ajmer-Merwara and Coorg were to join Group A and Baluchistan Group B. The Provincial constitutions and Group Constitutions, if any, were to be settled by each section separately. After this, the sections were to reunite for purposes of determining the constitution of the Union. The interests of the smaller minorities were to be safeguarded by the establishment of an Advisory Committee to suggest a list of Fundamental Rights to be incorporated in the Central, Provincial and Group Constitutions.

The interim Government was to consist of the Governor-General and a Council in which all the portfolios, including that of a War Member, were to be held by the Indian leaders having the full confidence of the people of India. The constitution-making body would conclude a treaty with Britain "to provide for certain matters arising out of the transfer of power." On the attainment of independence by British India paramountcy over Princely States would neither be retained by the British Crown nor transferred to the successor government.

Neither the Indian National Congress nor the Muslim League could agree entirely to the Cabinet Mission proposals. Elections to the Constituent Assembly were held in July 1946, and the Congress was able to capture 205 seats whereas the League bagged 73. Thereafter, dramatic turn of events took place. The Muslim League, which had earlier accepted the Cabinet Mission scheme, withdrew its acceptance of the long-term plan and prepared a programme of "direct action" for the achievement of Pakistan to be launched as and when necessary. "This day," Jinnah announced, "we bid good-bye to constitutional methods." On August 6 the Viceroy invited Jawaharlal Nehru to form the interim government. Before the new Government had taken office or the names of its members had been announced, "the first fruits of the Cabinet Mission's failure were being gathered." On August 16, which the Muslim League celebrated as "Direct Action Day," there was a ruthless rioting and massacre in Calcutta and for four days it continued taking a toll of 5,000 innocent lives and 15,000 were injured. The Muslim League Government of Bengal and Chief Minister, Mr. Suhrawardy, against all advice declared "Direct Action Day" a public holiday "and though warned of the likelihood of trouble, had apparently not taken adequate precautions. After the rioting had started, there was an unaccountable delay in imposing a curfew and calling in troops. The British Governor remained imperturbable but inactive. Charged under the Constitution of 1935 with a special responsibility for preventing any grave menace to the peace and tranquillity of the province, his duty seemed to require that he should intervene promptly to remedy the negligence of the Bengal Government and suppress these terrible disorders. He did not do so. During the next year this apparent example of supineness was to be copied by others in humbler stations."²⁸

The Viceroy thought that the dangers of the situation created by the "Direct Action Day" would be lessened if the League could be persuaded to join the Interim Government and once again to accept the long-term proposals by entering the Constituent Assembly. He was partially successful and the League joined the Interim Government on October 26, though it did not enter the Constituent Assembly and accept the long-term proposals too. But the Interim Government was a combination of strange bedfellows. It was, in fact, a dual Government. There was, as Liaquat Ali Khan put it, "a Congress bloc and a Muslim bloc, each functioning under separate leadership." The result was, in the words of Sardar Patel, who was also a member of the Government, "the present Central Government during the transference of power is in a state of paralysis."

28. Penderel Moon, Divide and Quit, p. 58.

On February 20, 1947, Prime Minister Clement Attlee announced in the House of Commons that it was His Majesty's Government's "definite intention to take the necessary steps to effect the transference of power to responsible Indian hands by a date not later than June 1948." It was enjoined on all parties to sink their differences and formulate a constitution in accordance with the Cabinet Mission's proposals. But in case of failure to do so, His Majesty's Government would have to consider "to whom the powers of the Central Government in British India should be handed over, on the due date, whether as a whole to some form of Central Government for British India, or in some areas to the existing Provincial Governments, or in such other way as may seem most reasonable and in the best interests of the Indian people."

This announcement, aptly observes Penderel Moon, "meant Partition, and Partition within the next seventeen months. Whatever London might think everyone in Delhi knew that the Cabinet Mission's proposals were as dead as mutton. No constitution be framed on their basis; and owing to the Hindu-Muslim feud there would be no Central Government capable of exercising authority over the whole of British India to whom the powers of the existing Government of India could be transferred. The power which the British held would have to be divided in order to be demitted, as indeed Mr. Attlee's statement itself vaguely foreshadowed."²⁹ Attlee's announcement was followed by widespread organised violence, murders and destruction of property in N.W.F.P., Punjab, Bengal, Assam and various other parts of the country. The Muslim League had become desperate, because, as Sir Syed Ahmed Khan had said, two nations—Muslims and Hindus—could not sit on the same throne.

Simultaneously to the announcement of February 20, 1947, Lord Louis Mountbatten was appointed Viceroy in succession to Lord Wavell so as to prepare the ground for the transfer of power. Mountbatten took over the Viceroyalty on March 24, 1947, and spent nearly two months in studying the political situation in India. During this period he had witnessed communal riotings of unprecedented severity and fires of frenzy lapped over the whole country, urban and rural areas alike. He came to the conclusion that there should be an immediate settlement, and transfer of power effected earlier than June 1948. He devised a plan for the partition of the country and communicated in strict secrecy its main outlines to the party leaders and obtained their concurrence in principle. The British Government's approval was then obtained and on June 3, it was publicly announced "and publicly accepted by Nehru, Jinnah and Baldev Singh."

Partition and Pakistan. The Mountbatten Plan was simple. India was to be divided into two Dominions, India and Pakistan. But it was not the Pakistan of Jinnah's dreams. It was to be of the truncated contiguous area variety involving the partition of both the Punjab and Bengal. In order to give to the partition a democratic complexion, different and complex arrangements were made for recording the popular will in the Muslim-majority Provinces. The issue to be put before them was whether the constitution should be framed by the existing Constituent Assembly or by a separate Constituent Assembly. The result was a foregone conclusion. The N.W.F.P., Muslim-majority parts of the Punjab and Bengal, Sind and Baluchistan all decided for a separate Constituent Assembly. Sylhet District in Assam, which was predominantly Muslim, decided at a referendum to be merged with the Muslim Bengal. Pakistan, thus, came into being. The rest was all a formality. A high level Partition Council was set up under the Chairmanship of Lord Mountbatten. Two Boundary Commissions were set up under Sir Cyril Radcliffe as their Chairman to demarcate boundaries of the two Punjabs and Bengals.

29. Penderel Moon, Divide and Quit, pp. 62-63.

The Indian Independence Act, 1947. On July 2, 1947, the Draft of the Indian Independence Bill implementing the political settlement according to the Mountbatten Plan was circulated to the leaders of the Congress and Muslim League for their consideration. The Bill was introduced in the British Parliament on July 5, and after passing through both its Houses, it received the Royal assent on July 18.

The Indian Independence Act provided for the creation of the two Independent Dominions, India and Pakistan, from August 15, 1947. Each of the two Dominions was to have a Governor-General appointed by the King. The legislature of each Dominion was given full legislative powers and no Act of British Parliament extended to either of them. The authority of British Government over British India and the suzerainty of the Crown over the Indian States, all obligations of the Crown to the States and all powers, rights, authority, or jurisdiction exercisable by His Majesty in the States by virtue of treaty, grant, usage, sufferance and otherwise lapsed. The States became independent in their political relations with the Governments of the Dominions. By August 15, 1947, all the Princes had acceded either to India or Pakistan, except Junagadh, Jammu and Kashmir and Hyderabad. Jammu and Kashmir eventually acceded to India and police action led to the accession of Hyderabad. The ruler of Junagadh fled to Pakistan after the people of the State had given their verdict in favour of admission in the Indian Union.

The new State of Pakistan. The State of Pakistan on its birth consisted of two wings, East Pakistan and West Pakistan, both severed from the old India. One thousand miles of Indian territory separated these two wings. East Pakistan comprised East Bengal and Sylhet district of Assam. In West Pakistan were included North-West Frontier Province, West Punjab, Sind and Baluchistan. Bhawalpur, Khairpur and eight relatively minor States in Baluchistan and the Frontier also acceded to Pakistan. According to the census of 1961, Pakistan had a population of about 94 million. Of these, over 50 million belong to East Pakistan. The growth of population in Pakistan is as spectacular in Pakistan as it is in India.

East and West Pakistan are not only separated from each other by a long stretch of Indian territory, but there are other factors too which keep them apart. In East Pakistan the language is Bengali, a script derived from Sanskrit, whereas the languages of West Pakistan are Urdu, Punjabi, Sindhi, Baluchi and Pushto. They are mostly written in the Persian script and borrow heavily from Persian and Arabic. The Muslims of East Pakistan have resolutely resisted all attempts to any modification in their language and today Urdu and Bengali are the two official languages in Pakistan. There are also wide differences between the East and West Pakistan Muslims in their habits, way of life, dress and even food. The cultural traditions of the two wings of Pakistan are in consequence substantially different. 22 per cent of the population in West Pakistan lives in cities whereas it is only 5.5 per cent in East Pakistan. East Pakistan occupies the delta of the Ganges and the Brahmaputra and every year this region is the victim of floods and the devastation caused therefrom. Industries are few and resources scanty. The principal cash crop is jute. Most of the industries are located in the West Pakistan and East Pakistan has a grouse that its interests have not been adequately safeguarded. The standard of living is, accordingly, much lower in East Pakistan.

Religion. Pakistan is an Islamic State and according to Mr. Y.K. Watoo, West Pakistan Minister, "a citizen of Pakistan who has no love for Pakistan cannot be true and loyal" to the country. Mr. Watoo contended that such a test of loyalty was required because Pakistan was established on the basis of, what he called, "these fundamental principles."³⁰ In 1949, shortly after the birth of Pakistan, the Constituent Assembly passed the Objectives Resolution according to which the future constitution of Pakistan was to be based on "the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance, and social justice as enunciated by Islam." It was resolved that under the future constitution the Muslims of Pakistan should be enabled individually and collectively to order their lives in accordance with the teachings and requirements of Islam. Islam, therefore, permeates every aspect of individual and social life in Pakistan. Without Islam Pakistan has no meaning. Mr. Liaquat Ali Khan, the first Prime Minister of Pakistan, said, "Pakistan was founded because the Muslims of this sub-continent wanted to build up their lives in accordance with the teachings and traditions of Islam, because they wanted to demonstrate to the world that Islam provides a panacea to the many diseases which have crept into the life of humanity today."³¹

The Minorities. In 1947, about one quarter of the total population in areas covered by Pakistan consisted of non-Muslims. After the formation of Pakistan millions of Muslims migrated to Pakistan. Likewise millions of Hindus migrated to India for fear of their lives. The proportion of non-Muslims has since then been decreasing, because of the disability from which the Hindus suffer in the Islamic State, and greater Muslim fertility. According to the census of 1961, the non-Muslim population stood at 11.9 per cent of the total as compared with 14.1 per cent in 1951.

CHAPTER II

THE POLITICAL BACKGROUND

Governor-General of Pakistan. The first Constitution of Pakistan was adopted in 1956. For full nine years after Pakistan had come into existence on August 15, 1947, the government was organised and it functioned according to the provision of the Government of India Act, 1935, with some modifications as deemed necessary and expedient. Mohammed Ali Jinnah, the architect of Pakistan, was appointed the first Governor-General of the new Dominion. His authority resembled to that of the Viceroy and Governor-General of India who really ruled the country under the British regime. The Prime Minister was for all intents and purposes his first lieutenant, a role that Liaquat Ali Khan had played under the leadership of the Qaid-i-Azam Jinnah, in fact, personified the new State of Pakistan. "No constitutional ruler and few autocrats," observes Keith Callard, "have possessed such a plenitude of power. He had full authority over the civil administration and the armed forces. By his own order he could amend the existing constitution and promulgate laws that would be beyond the effective power of review of any court." All these powers which the Qaid-i-Azam, the Supreme Leader, exercised and the authority which he enjoyed, were not his nominal powers and on paper alone. Nor were they limited "by the conventions of constitutional responsibility. On the contrary, Cabinet Ministers understood clearly that they held office as the agents of the Governor-General, and the Assembly, with its powerless Opposition, was in no mood to challenge any action of its own President." Jinnah was both the Governor-General and President of the Constituent Assembly of Pakistan. The Muslims were proud of their newly created Muslim State and their benefactor, the Qaid-i-Azam. They looked towards him to guide the destinies of the new nation and reposed complete faith in him to make the country strong and vigorous and sure of itself. "There was no one else, he was Pakistan; and wherever he went he was received by vast crowds with the adulation amounting almost to worship."

But Jinnah was not destined to pilot the ship of the State for long. He died in September 1948. Khawaja Nazimuddin, until then the Chief Minister of East Bengal, succeeded the late M.A. Jinnah. But he could never equal the stature, prestige, authority and power exercised by the Qaid-i-Azim. Liaquat Ali Khan endeavoured to improve the authority and prestige of the office of the Prime Minister and to enforce the conventions relating to the Parliamentary system of Government so as to reverse the previous practice of the Governor-General controlling the Cabinet. The powers of the Governor-General as under law still remained there, but certain transitional sections of the Indian Independence Act, 1947, were allowed to expire. Tamizuddin Khan, the Deputy Speaker of the Constituent Assembly, was elected its Speaker. "This dispersal of the power of the Qaid-i-Azam among the Governor-General, the Prime Minister and the President of the Assembly was to have important consequences in 1953 and 1954."

Making of the Constitution. The Constituent Assembly of Pakistan met for its first meeting in Karachi on August 10, 1947. At the time of its inauguration the total membership of the Assembly was sixty-nine. This membership was increased at various intervals in order to give representation to the refugees who had migrated to Pakistan after the partition, and the Princely States of Bhawalpur, Khairpur, the Baluchistan States Union and the states of the North-West Frontier, thus, making a total of seventy-nine seats. The main task of the Constituent Assembly was to frame a Constitution for Pakistan, but in addition to it and until that Constitution were to become operative, it also acted as the Federal Legislature under the Government of India Act, 1935. This dual function of the Constituent Assembly and "During the period which immediately followed Qaid-i-Azam's death, there developed a fierce competition for influence, wealth, power and prestige between various interests and personalities which made political life. The arena in which the competition first manifested itself was the procedure for framing the Constitution which was to give formal expression to Pakistan's polity."³ The course of the Constituent Assembly was, therefore, not smooth. It functioned tardily and its inhibitions were innumerable. It was only in March 1949, that the Objectives Resolution was passed. It, inter alia, provided that the future constitution was to be based upon the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice as enunciated by Islam. It was resolved that under the future constitution the Muslims of Pakistan should be enabled individually and collectively to order their lives in accordance with the teachings and requirements of Islam. The Assembly appointed a Basic Principles Committee to prepare a report on the main principles on which the future constitution could be framed. The Committee submitted its Report to the Assembly in 1952.

Provincial rivalries, language controversy and various other difficulties plagued the administration and the deliberations of the Constituent Assembly both as a Constitution-making body and as a legislature. "Few of my Pakistani friends," writes Rushbrook Williams, "seemed to realize that no Constitution can be of much use unless it suits the needs of the people of the country; and this, it appeared to me, was among the least regarded of the criteria which were being applied."⁴ Jinnah had delivered a series of stern warnings against provincialism and linguism and both these curses, which were so zealously rather fanatically pursued by both the wings of Pakistan, haunted Liaquat Ali Khan throughout his tenure of Prime Ministership until his assassination in 1951. His forceful and too ambitious colleagues were hard to reconcile to his leadership as head of the Government and very often refused to listen to his advice. "Some of his Ministers began to form their own groups of supporters in the Assembly; and even to communicate their own views to the Press, when these differed from the majority opinion in the Cabinet, upon such controversial matters as whether Pakistan should follow India's example in devaluing the rupee in 1950-51.⁵

Such was the state of affairs when Khawaja Nazimuddin stepped down from the office of the Governor-General to succeed Liaquat Ali Khan. Ghulam Mohammed, the Finance Minister in the previous Cabinet, was elevated to the post of the Governor-General. The new Prime Minister retained most of the members of the previous Cabinet, and a former Civil Servant, Chaudhri Mohammad Ali, was promoted to become the Finance Minister. "Nazimuddin was a man of piety and integrity who gave little evidence in appearance or words or decisions that he was capable of imposing his will upon men or circumstances."⁶ He was really incapable to grapple with the problems inherited from the previous government and with the set of ministers who had weakened the prestige of the Central Government during Liaquat Ali Khan's term of office. Some new problems had also arisen as a consequence of the food crisis due to the failure of crops, crisis in the balance of payments and budgetary difficulties due to the sharp decline in the prices of cotton and jute and the politico-religious upheaval which even threatened the stability of the government in West Pakistan.⁷ The need of the moment was stern and prompt action. The Governor-General came to the rescue of the country and on April 17, 1953 dismissed Nazimuddin Ministry. In a statement the Governor-General accused the Cabinet of Khawaja Nazimuddin for having "proved entirely inadequate to grapple with the difficulties facing the country." In the emergency "which has arisen," the statement further said, "I have felt it incumbent upon me to ask the Cabinet to relinquish office so that a new Cabinet better fitted to discharge its obligations towards Pakistan may be formed."

The Governor-General invited Mohammad Ali, the Pakistan Ambassador to the United States, to become the Prime Minister and form the new government. Mohammad Ali Bogra, a Bengali, accepted the offer and formed his Government retaining six members of the outgoing Ministry. This action of the Governor-General was widely hailed both by the press and the public, but it brought a serious rift in the political life of the country. The new Prime Minister was the personal choice of the Governor-General. He was not a leader of a party or even of a substantial bloc within the Muslim League. Mohammad Ali Bogra was a dark horse unknown to the public and Parliament except that he was a member of the Assembly prior to his holding the ambassadorial office in the United States. The prestige of the Muslim League by ousting powerful political leaders from the Government received a rude shock. "The Constituent Assembly, though dubious about the constitutional propriety" of the Governor-General's action, "did not openly challenge the new government. Technically it was still a government of the Muslim League, which filled almost every Muslim seat in the central and provincial legislatures.”⁸ But in practical politics it was not so. The Muslim League was split in many directions and there was no unanimity on the basic principles of the Constitution. Quite a plenty of them wanted a Constitution based upon Islamic principles and one of them even demanded that the prayers in mosques should be made compulsory for all Muslims and that those who failed to discharge this basic obligation should be punished. There were others who favoured secularism. Language was the major bone of contention. East Bengal stoutly advocated for provincial rights. Then, there were the supporters and opponents of the Governor-General and his Prime Minister.

The defeat of the Muslim League at the elections for the East Bengal Legislative Assembly in April 1954, led to rapid acceleration of the process of Constitution-making, but the proposals accepted by the Constituent Assembly were in many respects controversial. A Draft Constitution prepared in pursuance of the instructions of the Drafting Committee was ready for signatures on October 25, and scheduled to be reported to the Assembly on October 27. But on October 24, the Governor-General issued a proclamation dissolving the Constituent Assembly. The proclamation announced, “The Governor-General having considered the political crisis with which the country is faced has, with deep regret, come to the conclusion that the constitutional machinery has broken down. He, therefore, has decided to declare a State of Emergency throughout Pakistan. The Constituent Assembly as at present constituted has lost the confidence of the people and can no longer function.” It further announced that the elections would be held as soon as possible and that the Governor-General had called upon the Prime Minister to reform the cabinet “with a view to giving the country a vigorous and stable administration.” Thus, after seven years the labours of the Constituent Assembly, which placated many interests and made substantial concessions to the demands of the religious groups, were brought to naught by the action of the Governor-General. Since “it (Assembly) had for a long time,” aptly observes Rushbrook Williams, “represented nothing but the interests of those who happened to compose it, Mr. Ghulam Mohammad was probably correct in his estimate.”⁹

A new Government was formed with Mohammad Ali Bogra as the Prime Minister, which inter alia, included Commander-in-Chief of the Pakistan Army, General Mohammad Ayub Khan, as Minister of Defence and Major-General Iskandar Mirza, top civil servant, as the Minister of the Interior. It had also contained representatives of the groups that had opposed the Muslim League. The President of the Constituent Assembly, Moulvi Tamizuddin Khan, challenged the power of the Governor-General to dissolve the Constituent Assembly and petitioned the Sind Chief Court to issue a writ of *mandamus*¹⁰ and also a writ of quo warranto against the Ministers of the Central Government, who, he claimed, were not qualified as Ministers under Section 10 of the Government of India Act, 1935, as substituted by the Government of India (Fifth Amendment) Act, 1954.

The Sind Chief Court decided the case in favour of Moulvi Tamizuddin Khan. The Federal Court of Pakistan reversed the decision of the Sind Chief Court. The power of the Governor-General to dissolve the Assembly was upheld, but it was limited to the extent that it must be given a chance to fulfil its functions. It consequently became necessary to establish a new Assembly. The Governor-General then summoned the second Constituent Assembly which was to be indirectly elected by members of the Provincial legislatures. It was to consist of eighty members equally divided into two wings of Pakistan. The members elected to the new Assembly were divided into more than half a dozen separate groups, of which the Muslim League was the largest, but it did not command absolute majority.¹¹

The first session of the new Assembly met at Murree (Rawalpindi) in July 1955. It could not, however, transact any business due to various difficulties. It also became apparent that the emergency Cabinet, headed by Mohammad Ali Bogra and which had held office since October 24, 1954, would have to be reconstructed. Accordingly, Chaudhri Mohammad Ali, the former Finance Minister, replaced Mohammad Ali Bogra as Prime Minister. Ghulam Mohammad, who had been ailing for some time past, was succeeded by Major-General Iskander Mirza as Governor-General. The Assembly met for its second session in August and plunged itself in right earnest in the Constitution-making. The draft Constitution was presented to the Constituent Assembly in January 1956 and adopted in February 1956. On March 23, 1956, the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan became operative and the country ceased to be a Dominion. The second important act of the Constituent Assembly was the merger of the various territorial units, Punjab, North-West Frontier Province, Baluchistan, Sind and the Princely States into a single Province, with an executive and a legislature exercising authority over the whole area.

Important features of the 1956 Constitution. The Constitution of 1956 was entitled "The Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan" and the Preamble began with the words, "In the name of Allah, the Beneficent, the Merciful." Sovereignty, the Preamble declared, "belongs to Allah Almighty alone, and the authority to be exercised by the people of Pakistan within the limits prescribed by Him as a sacred trust." In the Islamic Republic of Pakistan the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice as enunciated by Islam, would be fully observed and the Muslims of Pakistan would be enabled individually and collectively to order their lives in accordance with the teachings and requirements of Islam, as set out in the Holy Quran and Sunnah. The minorities were assured to freely profess and practice their religion and develop their culture. Chapter II of the Constitution contained a list of Fundamental Rights which, inter alia, included abolition of untouchability, preservation of culture and language, the right to profess, practice and propagate any religion, and every religious domination and every sect thereof had the right to establish, maintain and manage its religious institutions. Article 22 vested the Supreme Court with powers to guarantee Fundamental Rights. Rights were, thus, justiciable. The Directive Principles of State Policy were enshrined in Part III of the Constitution and they were not justiciable. Article 24 directed the State to endeavour to strengthen the bonds of unity among Muslim countries, to promote international peace and security, to foster goodwill and friendly relations among all nations, to encourage the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means.

The Constitution established a Federation of territories then included in or in accession with Pakistan and such other territories as might thereafter be included in or accede to Pakistan. It adopted the Parliamentary system of Government both at the Centre and in the units of the federation, East and West Pakistan. The Parliament of Pakistan consisted of the President and one House designated as the National Assembly. Unlike the practice of a federal polity, Pakistan was to have one House of the legislature at the centre. The members of the National Assembly were to be elected on the basis of adult franchise with a five years tenure. The representation in the National Assembly from the East and West Pakistan was to be determined under the principle of parity. The Assembly consisted of three hundred members, though for ten years ten additional seats were provided for women. The President had the power to dissolve the Assembly and summon its session provided that at least one session in each year should be held at Dacca.

The President of the Republic was to be elected by both the members of both the National and Provincial Assemblies. He must be a Muslim and at least 40 years of age. He was to hold office for five years and would not have served for more than two terms. He could be removed by impeachment by National Assembly by a majority of three-quarters of its total membership. In the event of a vacancy or disability of the President, the Speaker of the National Assembly was to act in his place. There was to be a Cabinet of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions. The President in his discretion was to appoint from amongst the members of the National Assembly a Prime Minister who, in his opinion, was most likely to command the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly. The Cabinet together with the Ministers of State, was collectively responsible to the National Assembly. The Prime Minister held office during the pleasure of the President, but the President was not to exercise his power of discretion unless he was satisfied that the Prime Minister did not command the confidence of the majority of the members of the National Assembly. In the exercise of his functions the President was to act in accordance with the advice of the Cabinet or the appropriate Minister or Minister of State, as the case might be, except in cases where he was empowered by the Constitution to act in his discretion and except as respect of the appointment of the Prime Minister.

As for the Provinces of East and West Pakistan the Constitution provided for the appointment of Governors by the President and they held office during his pleasure. The Provinces had Cabinet form of Government similar in all essentials to that provided for the Federation. As at the Centre so in the Provinces there was to be a unicameral legislature. Each Provincial Assembly consisted of three hundred members with the temporary reservation of ten additional seats for women. The general provisions governing the Provincial Assemblies were similar to those for the National Assembly. No person could be a member at the same time of the National Assembly and a Provincial Assembly. The executive authority of a Province applied to Excluded Areas and Special Areas but a degree of control over such areas was reserved to the Central Government.

The Constitution provided for three legislative lists: the Federal List, the Provincial List and the Concurrent List. In the event of conflict between the two, the law of Parliament prevailed. Parliament, however, could legislate on a Provincial subject with the consent of the Province concerned. Parliament had the power to enact laws for implementation of any treaty. The residuary powers rested in the Provinces.

At the apex of the Judiciary was the Supreme Court of Pakistan. It had original jurisdiction in disputes between the Federation and the Provinces and in certain disputes between the Provinces. The President could request an advisory opinion from the Supreme Court. Each wing of Pakistan had its own High Court which was invested with the power to issue writs of all kinds. If the President was satisfied that a grave emergency existed in which the security or economic life of Pakistan, or any part thereof, was threatened by war or external aggression, or by internal disturbance beyond the power of a Provincial Government to control, he could issue a Proclamation of emergency. Under such a Proclamation, the President could assume the powers of Provincial Government and Parliament legislated for a Province. The President could suspend the Fundamental Rights during a national emergency. Under a state of national emergency the Federal Government was empowered to issue certain directions to a Province.

Islam was given practical legal significance in the Constitution. No person could be elected President unless he was a Muslim. Under Article 197 the President was under a constitutional obligation to set up an organisation for Islamic research and instruction in advanced studies to assist in the reconstruction of Muslim society on a truly Islamic basis. Under Article 198 the President was required to appoint (within one year of the promulgation of the Constitution) a Commission of experts to make recommendations as to the measures for bringing existing laws into conformity with the injunctions of Islam. The Commission was to submit its report to the President within five years of its appointment. This report was to be placed before the National Assembly and the Assembly after considering the report was to enact laws in respect thereof. According to Javid Iqbal, "the position which Islam occupied in the 1956 Constitution reflected the attitude of hypocrisy and vagueness of the Muslim framers of a legal fiction. Islam was presented in the Constitution in the form of a legal fiction."¹² The Chief Justice of Pakistan, Muhammad Munir, in his farewell address, on the eve of his retirement, to the West

Pakistan High Court Bar Association, Lahore, said, "Our Constitution, though it purported to be a Constitution for the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, had hardly anything Islamic except the repetition of the words Islam, Quran and Sunnah."¹³

The 1958 Revolution. The Constitution of 1956 did not prove a panacea of the ills, political, social and economic, from which Pakistan had been suffering for full nine years. In fact, with the advent of the Government, both at the Centre and in the Provinces, under the new Constitution problems confronting the country became more aggravated. Unification of West Pakistan concentrated power and influence in Lahore. "Since the stakes were higher, and the prizes larger, competition for power became fiercer than ever." Political parties multiplied and votes were openly purchased and allegiance transferred within a wink. The West Pakistan Legislature, as Rushbrook William says, became "a byword for political intrigue."¹⁴ The conditions in East Pakistan were not a wit better. Fierce internal rivalries reached such heights that the Speaker of the Provincial Assembly was badly beaten and the Deputy Speaker murderously assaulted and he died. Labour unrest was widespread and rioting a daily routine. There was open hostility against West Pakistan and the possibility of separation from Pakistan was publicly discussed and even canvassed. Karachi had become notorious for graft and corruption. "Smuggling grew to the proportions of an industry, carried on by highly organised rings with influential protection." Coalition Governments came and went in rapid succession both at the Centre and in the Provinces. "Sometimes a single person would manage to acquire power through his personal drive, skill or intrigue, at other times a group of individuals would manage to attain power and pull the strings from behind the curtain, or a small political party of alien ideology would become the decisive factor in the running of the government machinery."¹⁵

The state of the country's economy remained more or less stagnated and the major problems confronting Pakistan remained unresolved. The settlement of refugees and evacuee property, lack of basic necessities of life, such as food, clothing, housing, education and medical relief remained unsolved. "On the contrary, the system of permits, licenses and price control encouraged the growth of black-marketing, and smuggling, corruption and maladministration. All this inevitably resulted in the spreading of a sense of frustration and despondency in the country. Even the Islamic State idea appeared to peter out and was neglected and frustrated, leading to a mood of disillusionment."¹⁶

On the morning of October 8, 1958, the people of Pakistan woke up to find that a revolution had swept the country, the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan had been abrogated, and Martial Law imposed. With the abrogation of the Constitution, the Central and Provincial Legislatures stood abolished. Political parties were dissolved. The President assumed supreme power himself and appointed General Mohammed Ayub Khan as Chief Martial Law Administrator. "The relief of the whole nation was so profound, and their acclamation of the Revolution so enthusiastic, that political leaders everywhere could only throw their hand, retire into obscurity, and hope for the best. Some were, in fact, prosecuted for speculation; but in most cases they were given the choice, either of standing their trial, or of retiring from public life for a period of years. Many chose the latter option, and have remained unmolested."¹⁷

But the President, and the Chief Martial Law Administrator did not see eye to eye "regarding the emergency which had brought them together. The President looked on martial law as a means of reducing to impotence the political leaders whom he disliked and despised, and of securing to himself the supreme executive power. General Ayub Khan, on the other hand, saw in martial law a true opportunity—in his own phrase—leading the country back to sanity, and setting on foot a complete moral, economic and administrative rehabilitation of the nation." Whatever be the fact, before the end of October 1958, President Iskander Mirza, an old friend of General Ayub Khan, "agreed to resign and to leave the country." General Mohammed Ayub Khan became both the Head of the State as well as the Government. Politics knows no friends.

CHAPTER III

THE CONSTITUTION OF 1962

Political Background 1958-1962. The Revolution of 1958 brought to an end the parliamentary system of government in Pakistan which had proved disastrous to the country for all these years. The Presidential Cabinet was appointed which included three Generals—Lieutenant-Generals Azam Khan, W.A. Burki, K.M. Sheikh and eight (later ten) civilians. Later, the Governors of East and West Pakistan became its ex-officio members. The Governors of the two Provinces were directly responsible to the President for the administration of their respective Provinces. "Backing for the civil administration was provided by a general as martial law administrator, commanding a hierarchy of martial law authorities that was gradually withdrawn into the background as the new order stabilised itself."¹ President, Ministers of his Cabinet, Governors and martial law administrators, aided by a few select high officials, met from time to time to make high-level policy decisions. The change that had come over the public services was remarkable. A regular drive against inefficiency and corruption was launched. The screening process resulted in action being taken against 133 Class I Officers, 221 Class II Officers, and 1,303 Class III employees. Dismissals, compulsory retirements and reductions in grade totalled 3,000. This shake up in the services had the result that the Government offices opened "at proper times: the officers attended to their duties honestly and conscientiously; the clerks were civil to the ordinary citizen and helped him in his difficulties. It was no longer necessary to give a bribe in order to make an appointment far ahead to see the right official: he was on the spot ready to be seen. There was a notable cutting of red tape: the transaction of official business was thoroughly speeded up."²

Drastic measures were taken to bring down prices by regulation, to punish the hoarders and the smugglers. To strengthen the hands of civil authorities military officers were put alongside them to ensure that the martial law regulations were obeyed. Special martial law tribunals were created for the trial of serious offences. The result was that in a few weeks' time "things had become normal enough to allow the ordinary civil courts to take care of the new regulations. The Government found the trading community co-operative: the trading community found the Government reasonable in allowing them working margins consistent with the public interest in the restraint of prices. The military withdrew more and more from day to day control: the civil administration resumed its functions; and the only remaining traces of martial law lay in the regulation which the ordinary courts were required to enforce."³

The making of 1962 Constitution. On the first anniversary of his Presidency, General Ayub promulgated the Basic Democracies Order, providing for the establishment of elected Union Councils. There were about 4,000 Basic Democracies in West Pakistan and about 4,200 in East Pakistan. In a referendum held on February 4, 1960, the newly elected Basic Democrats confirmed President Mohammad Ayub Khan in office for five years and authorised him to prepare a new Constitution for Pakistan. The President appointed a Constitution Commission headed by Mr. Justice Mohammed Shahabuddin, a former Chief Justice, to advise the Government how best a democracy adaptable to changing circumstances could be secured in Pakistan. Its terms of reference were "to examine the progressive failure of parliamentary government in Pakistan leading to the abrogation of the Constitution of 1956 and to determine the causes and the nature of the failure; To consider how best the said or like causes may be identified and their recurrence prevented; And, having further taken account of the genius of the people, the general standard of education and of political judgment in the country, the present state of a sense of nationhood, the prime need for sustained development and the effect of constitutional and administrative changes brought into being in recent months, to submit constitutional proposals in the form of a report advising how best the following ends may be secured: a democracy adaptable to changing circumstances and based on the Islamic principles of justice, equality and tolerance; the consolidation of national unity; and a firm and stable system of government."

The Constitution Commission consisted of eminent men in several walks of life. The Commission issued and distributed among the people a questionnaire which brought more than 6,000 replies. The Commission also personally interviewed more than five hundred people in both wings of the country. A group of prominent Ulema of Pakistan sent a reply which elicited a wide publicity and was representative of the conservative opinion in the country. The Ulema submitted that the future constitution of Pakistan should be based on the Quran and Sunnah. It was maintained that since the 1956 Constitution was never put to a test and the general elections were not held under the old Constitution, the question of failure of parliamentary system of government in Pakistan did not arise at all. On the other hand the people of Pakistan were fully familiar with the parliamentary system of government and it should continue in the future Constitution of Pakistan. Introduction of Presidential form of government would lead to many insoluble difficulties and should be rejected. The political leaders of Pakistan should be told to fear God and to perform their duties sincerely and honestly and that the Constitution of 1956 should be adopted after necessary amendments.

The Constitution Commission submitted its report in May 1961, and was later made public in full. Many committees of the Presidential Cabinet were appointed to examine its various aspects and it lasted till October 1961, when the Cabinet as a whole began the ultimate examination. The Cabinet ascertained the views of the senior administrative officers. The President had desired that the new Constitution should be drafted in simple language so that it should be intelligible to the ordinary citizen. He argued that the people of Pakistan could not be expected to work the Constitution unless they understood it thoroughly. In deference to the wishes of the President this onerous task was entrusted to Mr. Manzur Qadir, who was assisted by an Australian expert, Mr. Quayle. The President signed the Constitution on March 1, 1962, and it was promulgated the same day. The Constitution enshrined President Ayub's constitutional ideas.

The first elections under the Constitution of 1962 for the National Assembly were held on April 28, and for the Provincial Assemblies on May 6, 1962. The National Assembly met for its first session on June 8, and, thus, ended the martial law. The conditional ban on the political parties was lifted with the passing of the Political Parties Act in July. The martial law ministers were replaced by the elected members of the National Assembly on June 8, except for three Departments, Finance, Law and Home.

Salient Features of the Constitution of 1962. The Constitution of 1962 is second since Pakistan was established in 1947. Like its predecessor the Constitution of 1956, it declared that the sovereignty over the entire universe belongs to Allah Almighty alone, and that the authority to be exercised by the people of Pakistan within the limits prescribed by Him is a sacred trust. The Preamble states that whereas Founder of Pakistan, Quaid-i-Azam Mohammad Ali Jinnah, declared that Pakistan would be a democratic State based on Islamic principles of social justice, it is the will of the people that the State should exercise its powers and authority through the chosen representatives of the people. The principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice as enunciated by Islam should be fully observed. The Muslims of Pakistan should be enabled individually and collectively to order their lives in accordance with the teachings and requirements of Islam, as set out in the Holy Quran and the Sunnah.

The Constitution safeguards the legitimate interests of the minorities in Pakistan including the right to profess and practice their religion and develop their culture. It guarantees the fundamental human rights to all citizens, embracing the right of equality before law, freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith and association and social economic and political justice, subject to the security of the State and consistent with public interest and morality. The independence of the judiciary has also been guaranteed.

The Constitution establishes the State of the Republic of Pakistan. The Preamble specifically states that the Constitution was enacted by Field Marshal Mohammad Ayub Khan, President of Pakistan, in pursuance of the mandate given to him at a Presidential referendum on February 16, 1960. The President is elected for a term of five years by members of the electoral college. He can be removed from office by impeachment on the charge that he has "wilfully violated the Constitution or has been guilty of gross misconduct." He may also be removed from office on grounds of physical or mental incapacity. If the President has held office for more than eight years, he is not eligible for re-election unless his candidature is approved by a secret ballot at a joint sitting of the National Assembly and the two Provincial Assemblies.

The Central Legislature, the National Assembly, is unicameral, consisting of 156 elected members⁴ in equal numbers from the two Provinces of East and West Pakistan, that is, 78 members from each Province. The term of the Assembly is five years unless previously dissolved. The first Assembly elected in 1962, was to serve for three years. Each Provincial Assembly has 155 members, including five reserved seats for women,⁵ elected on the same basis as the National Assembly. The Governor of a Province can dissolve the Provincial Assembly, with the concurrence of the President, in case of conflict between a Governor and the Provincial Assembly.

The Constitution does not establish a Parliamentary system of government and President Ayub had always deprecated any system which gave the legislature unrestricted power to maintain, and to remove the executive. He firmly believed that Pakistan's reversion to Parliamentary system on the British model would again throw the country into disastrous regime of party politics which had plagued Pakistan since its coming into being. He had no dislike for democracy. In fact, he was convinced that democracy was essential to Pakistan because, without it, there could be no political stability. But he was also emphatic in his belief that the democratic apparatus to be set up in Pakistan must combine an assurance of political stability and what the Pakistanis could understand and work. He, therefore, decided to establish strong executive with a Head of the State elected by some sort of plebiscite; a sort of American President who stands in direct contact with the people. He should have his Cabinet, but they must be his ministers who serve at his pleasure and assist him in the performance of his functions. The President's Cabinet in Pakistan is not responsible to the National Assembly. The President is both the head of the State and the head of the government. The ministers come and go as and when it pleases the President. The real position of his Cabinet resembles to the Governor-General's Executive Council during the British rule. The Pakistan Presidency, therefore, is not precisely like the American Presidency. It "owes something to the American example, to de Gaulle's France, and, very clearly, to the viceregal heritage of British India."⁶

In the Provinces there exists Provincial Autonomy. But it differs from the system of Provincial Autonomy prevailing from 1937 until 1958, when the Governor, under normal conditions, was a constitutional head of the Province and he acted on the advice of his ministers responsible to the Provincial Assembly. Under the 1962 Constitution the Governor is appointed by the President for an indefinite period of time and is responsible to him. He is subject to the President's discretion. The Council of Ministers in the Provinces is in effect an Executive Council, appointed and dismissed by the Governor in consultation with the President. It is not responsible to the Provincial Assembly.

President Ayub Khan brought in the concept of Basic Democracies as embodied in the Basic Democracies Order of October 27, 1959. The members of the Basic Democracies, Basic Democrats, constitute the Electoral College. There are more than 80,000 members of the Electoral College,⁷ half in East Pakistan and half in West Pakistan. Its foundation is the primary constituency containing 500 to 1,000 men and women and all those who have attained the age of 21 years are entitled to vote. Eight to ten, according to convenience, primary constituencies are grouped together to elect a Union Council in the countryside, a Town Committee in the smaller urban area and a Union Committee in the larger cities. Each Council or Committee is termed as a Basic Democracy. Altogether 8,266 Basic Democracies were set up in East and West Pakistan, of which 7,114 are Union Councils in the countryside, 218 Town Committees in the smaller urban centres and 816 Union Committees in the cities. There are also 75 Cantonment Areas and 43 special areas.

Pakistan has been described as a Federation, although the Constitution makes no pretence of being a federation. The powers assigned to the Central Government are enumerated in the Third Schedule of the Constitution. All other matters are assigned to the Provinces and they are autonomous in all such matters as far as it is consistent with the unity and interests of Pakistan as a whole. The National Assembly is empowered to make laws in the residuary field in the national interest. The Constitution, thus, permits the Centre to take action wherever it seems necessary without invoking emergency powers. There is no division of powers between the Centre and the units as it is always in a federation. "The central-provincial relationship has returned roughly to the devolutionary pattern of the Government of India Act of 1919."⁸ But in one respect Pakistan resembles a federation. An amendment which would alter the limits of a Province requires approval by a two-thirds majority of the Provincial Assembly before it can be introduced in the National Assembly. A Bill amending the Constitution need be passed by a two-thirds majority of the total membership of the National Assembly. After the amending Bill has been passed by the National Assembly it is presented to the President for his assent which he must signify within thirty days after its submission to him. He may either withhold his assent thereto, or return the Bill to the National Assembly with a message suggesting modifications. If the President withholds his assent and if it is again passed by the National Assembly, with or without amendments, by a three-fourths majority of its total membership, the President can either dissolve the National Assembly or refer the matter to a referendum of the Electoral College. If an absolute majority of the total membership of the Electoral College vote for the Bill, it is deemed to have been assented to by the President and immediately becomes an amendment of the Constitution.

To avoid regional conflicts, which had plagued Pakistan from its very inception, the Constitution provides for the establishment of the seat of the National Assembly at Dacca in East Pakistan whereas the capital of Pakistan is located at Islamabad, near Rawalpindi, in West Pakistan. Dacca has also been declared the second capital of Pakistan. Bengali and

Urdu have been made the national languages of the country and parity between the Provinces in all spheres of the Central Government, as nearly as practicable, is emphasised.⁹

The Constitution sets forth certain basic principles which must be rigidly adhered to while making laws. These principles are described as the Principles of Law-making. It is the responsibility of the Legislatures, both Central and Provincial, to ensure that no law is enacted which disregards, violates, or is otherwise not consistent with or in accordance to these principles. If a doubt arises whether a particular legislation is consistent with and in conformity to the principles of law-making, the National Assembly, the Provincial Assembly, the President or the Provincial Governor may refer it to the Advisory Council of Islamic Ideology for advice and guidance. The validity of a law, however, cannot be questioned on the ground that the law disregards, violates or is otherwise not in accordance with the principles of law-making.

The principles of law-making enjoin that no law shall be enacted which is repugnant to Islam. All laws enacted should ensure equality before law, equal protection and equal treatment to all citizens of Pakistan. But departure from this principle may be made where in the interest of equality itself, it is necessary to compensate for existing inequalities, whether natural, social, economic or of any other kind. Departure may also be made in the interest of the proper discharge of public functions by giving to persons performing public functions powers, protections or facilities that are not given to other persons or impose on such persons obligations or disciplinary controls to which other persons are not subject to. It may also be departed in the interests of the security of Pakistan or otherwise in the interest of the State. It is, however, to be ensured that while making such departures no citizen gets an undue preference over another citizen and no citizen is placed under a disability, liability or obligation that does not apply to other citizens of the same category.

No law is to be enacted imposing restriction on the freedom of thought and expression of a citizen, unless it is necessary in the interest of the security of Pakistan, for ensuring friendly relations with foreign States, in the interest of public order or for purposes of ensuring the proper administration of justice, or for purposes of decency or morality or for the purpose of preventing the commission of offences. No law should impose any restriction on the freedom of assembly or the right to form associations or unions except for reasons of security of Pakistan, public order, commissioning of offences, in the interest of decency or morality, and for the purpose of protecting persons in relation to their health or property. The freedom of movement and the right to property are not to be restricted unless public interest demands otherwise. The right to vocation, trade, business or employment is not to be restricted by law unless security of Pakistan and decency or morality necessitated imposition of restrictions. Restrictions could also be imposed for the purpose of regulating any profession or trade by a licensing system or when a trade, business, industry or service is intended to be carried on by or on behalf of the State or for the purpose of ensuring the development of Pakistan and its resources and industries.

No law should prevent the members of a religious community from professing, practising or propagating or from providing instruction in their religion, or from conducting the institutions for the purpose, or in connection with their religion. No law should require any person to receive religious instruction or attend a religious ceremony or religious worship, relating to a religion other than his own. No law should impose on any person a tax the proceeds of which are to be applied for purposes of a religion other than his own. No law should discriminate between religious institutions in the granting of exemptions or concessions in relation to any tax. No law should authorise the expenditure of public moneys for the benefits of a particular religious community or denomination except moneys raised for that purpose.

A law authorising the arrest or detention of a person should ensure that the person arrested or detained is informed of the grounds of his arrest or detention either at the time of his arrest or detention or immediately thereafter. The law should also provide for the immediate production of the accused person before a competent court of law, his release on bail, facilities for proper and adequate defence and such other facilities which should provide for a fair and judicious trial. This principle, however, does not apply to a law authorising the arrest or detention of enemy aliens or providing for preventive detention. But a law providing for preventive detention should be made only in the interest of the security of Pakistan or of public safety. The person so detained must be informed of the grounds of his detention either at the time of his detention or immediately thereafter. The term of detention should not be more than three months without the authority of a Board consisting of a Judge of the Supreme Court and other senior officers in the service of Pakistan nominated by the President in the case of a Central law and a judge of the High Court of the Province concerned and another senior officer nominated by the Governor of the Province in the case of a Provincial law.

No law should authorise the punishment of a person for an act or omission that was not punishable by law at the time the act was done or the omission was made. Likewise, no law should authorise the punishment of a person for an offence by a penalty greater than, or of a kind different from, the penalty prescribed by law at the time the offence was committed. No law should provide for the compulsory acquisition or compulsory taking possession of property except for a public purpose and on reasonable payment of compensation. The amount of compensation should either be fixed by law or it should provide the principles on which and the manner in which compensation would be determined. These principles may, however, be departed from for the purpose of permitting the destruction, the acquisition or the taking possession of property in order to prevent or reduce danger to life, health or property, for the purpose of ensuring the proper management, for a limited period, of any property for the benefit of its owner, or in relation to property which is or is deemed to be an evacuee property under any law. The term public purpose includes the purpose of acquiring, in the public interest, any industrial, commercial or other undertaking which is of benefit to the public, any interest in such an undertaking or any land for use in connection with such an undertaking.

Law must not permit forced labour, except for persons convicted to imprisonment under law and the compulsory service of persons for public purposes or otherwise in the public interest, whether by way of conscription or in any other manner. No law should on the ground of race, religion, caste or place of birth, deprive any citizen of the right to attend any educational institution that is receiving aid from public revenue. This principle may be departed from for the purpose of ensuring for a class of citizens that is educationally backward shares in available educational facilities. No person should be denied access to a public place, other than a place intended solely for religious purposes, on the ground of race, religion, caste, or place of birth. No law should prevent any section of the community from having a distinct language, script or culture of its own. No person should permit or in any way facilitate the introduction into Pakistan of slavery in any form. No law should permit or in any way facilitate the introduction into Pakistan the practice of untouchability in any form.

In addition to the above Principles of Law-making, which are specific prohibitions to the law-making authorities in Pakistan, the Constitution also provides for Principles of Policy. The Constitution directs upon all organs of State authorities and the persons connected thereto to follow these Principles in the performance of their functions. These Principles of Policy are analogous to the Directive Principles of State Policy as provided in the Indian Constitution. Both the Principles of Policy in Pakistan and the Directive Principles of State Policy in India are non-justiciable and, accordingly, beyond the jurisdiction of the courts. The validity of an action of any organ of State authority or law cannot be called in question on the ground that it is not in accordance with the Principles of Policy as directed by the Constitution. The Constitution of Pakistan provides that the responsibility of deciding whether any action of an organ or authority of the State, or any person performing functions on behalf of organ or authority of the State, is in accordance with the Principles of Policy does not rest with the organ or authority concerned. Moreover, the observance of any particular principle of policy is dependent upon resources available for that purpose.

It shall be the policy of the State that the Muslims of Pakistan are enabled individually and collectively to order their lives in accordance with the fundamental principles and basic concepts of Islam and they are provided with all facilities whereby they may be able to understand the meaning of life in accordance with those principles and concepts. The teachings of the Holy Quran and Islamiyat to the Muslims should be compulsory. Unity and observance of Islamic moral standards should be promoted amongst the Muslims and the proper organisation of zakat, wakfs, and mosques should be ensured.

The State should endeavour to discourage parochial, racial, tribal, sectarian and provincial prejudices. The legitimate rights and interests of the minorities should be duly safeguarded and the members of the minority communities should be provided adequate opportunities to enter the public services of Pakistan. Special care and interest should be taken to promote the educational and economic interests of the people belonging to the backward classes or who live in backward areas. All organs of Government should take steps to bring on terms of equality with other persons the members of under-privileged castes, races, tribes, and groups, and to this end, the under-privileged castes, tribes and groups within a Province should be identified by the Government of the Province and entered in a schedule of under-privileged classes. People of all areas of Pakistan and of all classes should be enabled, through education, training, industrial development and other methods, to participate fully in all forms of national activities, including employment in public services of Pakistan. Illiteracy should be eliminated and free and compulsory education should be provided to all as early as possible. Just and humane conditions of work should be provided, children and women should not be employed in vocations unsuited to their age and sex and benefit of maternity should be provided to women in employment.

The well-being of the people irrespective of their caste, creed or race, should be secured by raising the standard of living of the common man, by preventing the undue concentration of wealth and means of production and distribution in the hands of a few, to the detriment and interest of the common man and by ensuring an equitable adjustment of rights between employers and employees and between landlords and tenants. All men and women should have adequate opportunity to work and earn their living and also to enjoy reasonable rest and leisure. All persons employed in public services or otherwise employed should be provided with social security and means of compulsory social insurance or otherwise. The basic necessities of life such as food, clothing, housing, education and medical treatment should be provided for citizens, who, irrespective of caste, creed or race, are permanently or temporarily unable to earn their livelihood on account of infirmity, disability, sickness, or unemployment.

Administrative offices and other services should, so far as practicable, be provided in places where they will best meet the convenience and requirements of the public. No citizen should be denied entry into the public services in Pakistan on the grounds of race, religion, caste, sex or place of residence or birth. This principle of Policy, may, however, be departed from where in the public interest it is desirable that a person who is to perform functions in relation to a particular area should be a resident of that area and the person who is to perform functions of a particular kind should be of a particular sex. It may also be departed from if it is necessary to do so for the purpose of ensuring that, in relation to Central Government, persons from all parts of Pakistan, and, in relation to a Provincial Government, persons from all parts of the Province concerned, have an opportunity of entering the public services in Pakistan. Disparity in the remuneration of persons in the various classes in the public services of Pakistan should be, within reasonable and practicable limits, reduced. Parity between the Provinces in all spheres of the Central Government, should, as nearly as practicable, be achieved. Persons from all parts of Pakistan should be enabled to serve in the Defence Services of Pakistan.

Riba, usury, should be eliminated. Prostitution, gambling, and the use of injurious drugs should be discouraged. The consumption of alcohol liquor, except for medicinal purposes and in the case of non-Muslims for religious purposes, should be discouraged. The bonds of unity amongst Muslim countries should be maintained and strengthened, international peace and security should be promoted, goodwill and friendly relations amongst all nations should be fostered. The settlement of international disputes by peaceful means should be encouraged.

The Constitution also provides for the establishment of an Advisory Council of Islamic Ideology. The Council shall not consist of less than five, and more than 12 members. The precise membership shall be determined by the President. The President shall, while selecting persons for membership of the Advisory Council of Islamic Ideology, shall give due regard to the person's understanding and appreciation of Islam and of the economic, political, legal and administrative problems of Pakistan. The term of office of a member is fixed for three years. A member may resign and may also be removed from office if a resolution recommending his removal is passed by a majority of the total number of members of the Council. The functions of the Council are to make recommendations to the Central and Provincial Governments as to the means of enabling and encouraging the Muslims of Pakistan to order their lives in all respects in accordance with the principles and concepts of Islam, and to advise the National Assembly, a Provincial Assembly, the President or a Governor on any question referred to the Council whether a proposed law disregards or violates, or is otherwise not in accordance with the Principles of Law-making. The Advisory Council of Islamic Ideology is required to inform within seven days to the authority concerned of the period within which it shall be possible for it to furnish that advice. In case, the National Assembly, a Provincial Assembly, the President or a Governor, as the case may be, considers that in public interest the enactment of proposed legislation is not expedient to postpone till the advice was furnished, the law may be made before such an advice is furnished. The rules relating to the transaction of business by the Council are made by the Council with the approval of the President.

The Constitution has also provided for the establishment of Islamic Research Institute. The function of the Institute is to undertake Islamic research and instruction in Islam for the purpose of assisting in the reconstruction of Islamic society on a truly Islamic basis.

THE STRUCTURE OF GOVERNMENT AT THE CENTRE

THE PRESIDENT

Election and Qualifications. The Constitution of 1962 provides for a President. The President must be at least 35 years of age and a Muslim. No non-Muslim can be elected as President of Pakistan. A candidate for the office of the President must be qualified to be elected as a member of the National Assembly. If the number of candidates exceeds three, the Chief Election Commissioner is required to inform the Speaker of the National Assembly of the fact and the Speaker shall thereupon forthwith convene a joint sitting of the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies to select three of the candidates for election. The members of the National and Provincial Assemblies present at a joint sitting shall select by secret ballot three of the candidates for election. A candidate or candidates not selected at a joint sitting, thus, become ineligible for election. A candidate for the Presidency may address the members present at the joint sitting and may be questioned by any of those members. Where the person holding office as President is a candidate for election, his candidature cannot be disregarded. The person who is and has for a continuous period of more than eight years been holding office as President is ineligible to be re-elected as President. If, however, such a person is a candidate for election to the office of the President, it is the duty of the Chief Election Commissioner to inform the Speaker of the National Assembly of his candidature and the Speaker shall thereupon forthwith convene a joint sitting of the National Assembly and the Provincial Assemblies to consider his candidature. If the majority of the members present at the joint sitting, by secret ballot, approve of his candidature, the President shall be eligible for re-election. But he will be in addition to three candidates selected by the joint sitting of the National Assembly and Provincial Assemblies if the candidates were numerous.

The right to vote in Presidential election is restricted constitutionally to the members of an Electoral College, at least 40,000 in each Province. The number of electoral units in each Province must be the same. An Electoral Roll must be maintained and established for each electoral unit. Any citizen of Pakistan, who has attained the age of 21 years, is a resident of an electoral unit and is of sound mind, is entitled to be enrolled on the electoral roll of that electoral unit. The persons enrolled on the electoral roll for an electoral unit are required to elect from time to time from amongst themselves a person who is not less than 25 years of age and the person thus elected becomes an elector of the Electoral College for that unit. The electors for all the territorial units in both the Provinces together constitute the Electoral College. The members of the Electoral College elect the President.

The Constitution provides that Presidential election must be held within four months before the end of the normal term of office which is five years. The results shall be declared not less than 14 days before that date, but the President-elect shall not enter his office before that office is vacant. When the President dissolves the National Assembly, new Presidential elections must be held within a period of three months after the dissolution of the National Assembly. But actual polling shall not take place until two months have elapsed from the date of dissolution. When a President ceases to hold office before the expiration of his normal term of office, new election of the President shall be held within the period of ninety days after he ceases to hold office. The President can resign from his office by writing to the Speaker of the National Assembly. There is no Vice-President. In the event of the absence of the President from the country, or a vacancy in the office, the Speaker of the National Assembly acts as President until he returns from abroad or a new incumbent is elected. The Constitution imposes certain limitations, for example, he may not dissolve the National Assembly, on the powers of the Speaker of the National Assembly when he acts as President.

Removal from Office. The President can be removed from office either by impeachment for wilfully violating the Constitution or on a charge of gross misconduct and on grounds of incapacity. The President is impeached before the National Assembly. If one-third of the total number of members of the National Assembly give a written notice signed by each of them to the Speaker of the National Assembly expressing their intention to move a resolution impeaching the President on a charge that he had wilfully violated the Constitution or he had been guilty of misconduct, the Speaker shall forthwith cause a copy of the notice to be sent to the President. The notice must set out particulars of the charge. The resolution impeaching the President cannot be moved earlier than 14 days and later than 30 days after the notice of the resolution had been given to the Speaker of the National Assembly. If the Assembly is not in session, the Speaker is required to summon it for consideration of the resolution within the specified period. The President has the right to appear in person and be represented before the National Assembly when the Assembly is considering the resolution of his impeachment. If the Assembly passes the resolution impeaching the President by votes of not less than three-quarters of the total number of members of the National Assembly, the President forthwith ceases to hold office and is disqualified from holding public office for a period of ten years. If less than one-half of the total number of members of the National Assembly vote in favour of the resolution, the members who gave notice of the resolution impeaching the President to the Speaker of the National Assembly cease to be members of the Assembly forthwith after the result of the voting on the resolution is declared.

The Constitution also provides for the removal of the President from office on grounds of incapacity. It is provided that not less than one-third of the total number of the members of the National Assembly may give a notice in writing signed by each of them to the Speaker of the National Assembly for the removal of the President from office on the ground of his physical or mental incapacity. The notice must set out the particulars of the alleged incapacity. The Speaker shall thereupon forthwith cause a copy of the notice to be sent to the President, together with a request by the Speaker that the President shall submit himself to an examination by a Medical Board. The resolution of removal cannot be moved in the Assembly earlier than 14 days and later than 30 days after notice of the resolution had been given to the Speaker. The President has the right to appear and be represented before the National Assembly during the consideration of the resolution by the Assembly. If the President does not submit himself for examination to the Medical Board before the resolution is moved in the National Assembly, the resolution may be voted upon, and if it is passed by the Assembly by votes not less than three-fourths of the total membership of the Assembly, the President forthwith ceases to hold office. If before the resolution is moved in the Assembly, the President has submitted himself for examination to the Medical Board, the resolution shall not be voted upon until the Medical Board has been given an opportunity of putting its opinion before the National Assembly. If after consideration by the National Assembly of the resolution and opinion of the Medical Board, the resolution is passed by the Assembly, by votes not less than three-fourths of the total membership of the Assembly, the President forthwith ceases to hold office. If, where the President has submitted himself to an examination by the Medical Board, less than one-half of the total number of members of the National Assembly vote in support of the resolution demanding his removal on grounds of alleged incapacity, the members who gave notice of the resolution to the Speaker of the Assembly cease to be the members of the Assembly forthwith after the result of the voting on the resolution is declared.

Immunities of the President. Article 116 of the Constitution provides that no criminal proceedings whatsoever shall be instituted or conducted against the President during his tenure of office. No civil proceedings in which relief is sought against the President shall be instituted during the tenure of his office and in respect of anything done or not done or purporting to have been done or not done, by him in his personal capacity whether before or after he entered upon his office, unless at least 60 days before the proceedings are instituted, notice in writing has been delivered to him or sent to him in the manner as prescribed by law, stating the nature of the proceedings, the cause of action, name, description and place of residence of the party by whom the proceedings are to be instituted and the relief which he claims. No process whatsoever shall issue from any court or tribunal against the President whether in a personal capacity or otherwise while he is in office.

Article 117 further provides that the President shall not, except in respect of anything done or not done by him in contravention of the law, be answerable to any court or tribunal for the exercise of the powers, or the performance of the duties of his office, or for any act done or purporting to be done by him in the exercise of those powers or in the performance of those duties. But this Article should not be construed as restricting the right of any person to bring appropriate proceedings against the Central Government or a Provincial Government.

The remuneration and privileges of the President remain the same as the remuneration and privileges to which immediately before the commencing day of his office, the President of Pakistan was entitled.

Powers of the President. The President is both the head of the State as well as the head of Government. He is a single executive, a executive and the executive. The Constitution vests the executive authority of the Republic of Pakistan in the President which is exercised by him either directly or through officers subordinate to him, in accordance with the Constitution and the law. The President may specify the manner in which orders and other instruments made and executed in pursuance of any authority or power vested in the President shall be expressed and authenticated. The President may regulate the allocation and transaction of business of the Central Government and establish divisions of the Government for the efficient conduct of business. To assist him in the performance of his duties and functions, the President may appoint, from amongst persons qualified to be elected as members of the National Assembly, persons to constitute his Council of Ministers. The Council of Ministers so appointed is designated as the President's Council of Ministers. As a result of the pressure of the public the President issued an Order on June 14, 1962 enabling the members of the National Assembly to be appointed members of the President's Council of Ministers without loss of their seats in the Assembly. A Minister appointed by the President shall, before he enters upon his office, make before the President an oath in a prescribed form. He retains office at the pleasure of the President. Two points of importance emerge from these provisions. Firstly, according to the Constitution as promulgated ministerial office is incompatible with membership of the National Assembly. But as members of the Assembly, immediately after the promulgation of the Constitution, refused to vacate their seats from the Assembly in order to become Ministers, the President issued orders in June 1962, to remove the incompatibility. Secondly, the Ministers are not responsible to the National Assembly, either individually or collectively. They serve at the President's pleasure and, thus, a breath who has made them can also unmake them. The President may also appoint Parliamentary Secretaries, not exceeding in number the number of divisions of the Central Government, from among the members of the National Assembly. The Parliamentary Secretaries perform such functions in relation to the divisions of the Central Government as the President may direct.

The Supreme Command of the Defence Services of Pakistan is vested in the President to be exercised by him subject to law. Without limiting the generality of this power, the President is vested with the power, subject to law, to raise and maintain the Defence Services of Pakistan and the Reserves of those services. He is empowered to grant commissions in those Services and appoint Chief Commanders of those Services and also determine their salaries and allowances. The Constitution provides that for a period of twenty years the Defence Minister must be a retired officer of the rank of Lieutenant-General or its equivalent, unless the President himself has held such a rank. In his first Council of Ministers the President himself held the Defence portfolio.

The Provincial Governors are appointed by the President for an indefinite term and they are subject to his direction. A Governor cannot remove a Provincial Minister from office without the concurrence of the President. Article 121 provides that if in the opinion of the President, a Governor or a Minister has been guilty of gross misconduct in relation to his duties he may disqualify him from holding public office in addition to his removal from the office of a Governor or Minister as the case may be. The President is required to inform him in writing that a Governor or Minister has the option of either agreeing to disqualification from holding public office for such period as the President may fix, but not exceeding five years, or of having the matter referred to a Tribunal for enquiry. If within seven days of the receipt of such an information a Governor or Minister agrees to the disqualification and informs the President accordingly, he stands disqualified from holding public office for the period fixed by the President. If he does not agree to disqualification, the President shall forthwith refer the matter for enquiry to a Tribunal consisting of a Judge of the Supreme Court appointed by the President in consultation with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. If the Tribunal holds that the Governor or Minister is guilty of gross misconduct he is dismissed from his office and also disqualified from holding public office for a period of five years.

The Constitution provides for the office of the Comptroller and Auditor-General of Pakistan who is appointed by the President. He may resign from his office by writing to the President. If the office of the Comptroller and Auditor-General is vacant at any time or he is absent or is unable to perform the functions of his office due to illness or some other cause, the President may direct any other person to act for him and perform the functions of that office. The President also appoints the Attorney-General of Pakistan and he performs such duties as the President may direct. He holds office at the President's pleasure.

The President has the power to dissolve the National Assembly at any time, but he must, at the same time, seek re-election. The President remains in office for four months from the date of dissolution. The President may address the National Assembly and send messages. Ministers of the President and the Attorney-General have the right to speak in and take part in the proceedings of the National Assembly or any of its Committees, but they are not entitled to vote therein. No Bill or amendment to a Bill providing for or relating to preventive detention can be introduced or moved in the National Assembly without the previous consent of the President. When a Bill has been passed by the National Assembly it must be presented to the President for his assent. It is required by the Constitution that within 30 days after the Bill has been presented to the President, he may give assent to the Bill or declare that he withholds his assent to the Bill or return the Bill to the National Assembly with a message that the Bill, or a particular provision of the Bill, be reconsidered and that any amendment or amendments specified in the message be considered. If the President does none of these three, the Bill is deemed to have been assented to after the expiry of 30 days. If at any time, a conflict with respect to any matter arises between the President and the National Assembly and the President considers that it should be referred to the referendum of the Electoral College, he may cause the matter to be referred to a referendum in the form of a question that is capable of being answered by a simple "Yes" or "No." It is to be noted that the question is referred to the members of the Electoral College for their approval or otherwise and not to the referendum of the people.

The President has been vested with certain legislative powers when the National Assembly is not in session. If at any time the National Assembly is not in session or stands dissolved and the President is satisfied that circumstances exist which render immediate legislation necessary, he may make and promulgate such ordinances which appear to him necessary and expedient. The ordinances so promulgated shall have the same power of law, but they must be placed before the National Assembly as early as practicable. If by resolution it is approved, it shall be deemed to have become an Act of the National Assembly otherwise it ceases to have effect after the expiry of the specified period. If the National Assembly neither approves nor disapproves and the President does not repeal it before the specified period, it shall be deemed to have been repealed upon the expiration of that period. The prescribed period is the period ending 42 days after the first meeting of the National Assembly following the promulgation of the ordinance or the period ending 180 days after the promulgation of the ordinance, whichever is shorter. The power of the President to promulgate ordinances extends to matters within the legislative competence of the National Assembly.

This apart, there are the emergency powers of the President. Article 30 of the Constitution provides, "If the President is satisfied that a grave emergency exists: (a) in which Pakistan, or any part of Pakistan, is threatened by war or external aggression or (b) in which the security or economic life of Pakistan is threatened by internal disturbances beyond the power of a Provincial Government to control," he may issue a proclamation of emergency. Such a Proclamation must be laid before the Assembly as soon as it is practicable. It does not, however, require the approval of the National Assembly. The proclamation remains in force as long as the President is satisfied that the continuance of emergency is justified by the circumstances. When he is satisfied that the reasons which necessitated the issuing of the proclamation have ceased to exist, he may revoke it. During the continuance of emergency the President may promulgate ordinances even if the National Assembly is in session and the Assembly has no power to disapprove of them. Unless approved by the National Assembly or repealed earlier by the President ordinances promulgated by the President during the emergency end with the emergency itself. When the ordinance is approved by the National Assembly, as it is required to be laid before it as early as practicable, the ordinance becomes an Act of the National Assembly.

The President has the power to grant pardons, reprieves and respites, and to remit, suspend or commute any sentence passed by any court, tribunal or other authority.

President's Council of Ministers. The President's Council of Ministers is not akin to the Council of Ministers in a Parliamentary system of Government. It is not even the semblance of it. In a Parliamentary system of Government the Council of Ministers is appointed from the majority party in Parliament and the leader of that party becomes the Prime Minister, and the Prime Minister heads the Government. The head of the State possesses only constitutional powers and the real functionaries are the Ministers who are members of the Council of Ministers. They remain in office so long as they can retain the confidence of Parliament and they are responsible to that body and through it to the people for all their public acts individually and collectively. Responsibility to Parliament is the sine qua non of a Parliamentary Government.

The President of Pakistan appoints his own Ministers, but they need not be the members of the National Assembly, although they have the right to speak there if they are not members. This is a departure from the practice of the Presidential Cabinet in the United States of America. In America the President's Ministers do not sit in Congress, they have no right to address it, and introduce Bills as they are not its members. Another feature of the Pakistan Presidential Cabinet is that each Minister has a Parliamentary Secretary for his department, who is a member of the National Assembly, and he sits and votes in the House. This is not available in America. The President's Council of Ministers in Pakistan, therefore, vitally differs from the President's Cabinet under a Presidential system of Government as distinguished from the Parliamentary system. Of course, the President of Pakistan appoints Ministers, who serve at his pleasure, to assist him in the performance of his functions and it is for him to accept the advice tendered by his Ministers.

Apart from the power of removal of a Minister which the Constitution confers upon the President, he is also empowered to disqualify a Minister, for a period not exceeding five years, from holding any public office if in the opinion of the President a Minister has been guilty of gross misconduct in relation to his duties. If a Minister does not agree to the option of disqualification from holding public office, he can be dismissed from office as well as disqualified from holding public office for a period not exceeding five years if the Tribunal appointed by the President and enquiring into his misconduct holds him guilty. The President of the United States of America has no like powers. The grip of the President of Pakistan over his Council of Ministers is really tight. It does not constitute his family as it is in America.

Position of the President. The President of Pakistan is the head of the State as well as head of Government. This President's Council of Ministers is in effect a return to a Governor-General's Executive Council as in the British rule. In fact, the drafters of the Constitution of Pakistan in 1962, attempted to work out a pattern of institutions which "owes something to the American example, to de Gaulle's France, and, very clearly, to the viceregal heritage of British India." He not only makes and unmakes his Council of Ministers, who assist him in the performance of his duties, but can also make them to do what he wishes to be done. He has the mysterious weapon of removal and disqualification of a Minister, if in his opinion a Minister is guilty of gross misconduct in relation to his duties. To differ from the President or to offer a suggestion unpalatable to the President can be construed as a gross misconduct in relation to the duties of a Minister. Mr. Z.A. Bhutto, former Pakistan Foreign Minister, warned some top leaders of his country "to refrain from throwing mud on him otherwise he would be compelled to tell the truth about them."¹ What Bhutto implied is self-explanatory.

The Constitution of Pakistan has not been made by a Constituent Assembly. President Ayub has it made. The President can even send the amendments of the Constitution back to the National Assembly for reconsideration. The President has the authority to dissolve the National Assembly at any time. If at any time a conflict with respect to any matter arises between the President and the National Assembly, he may, if he considers desirable, send the matter to a referendum of the Electoral College. The cause of conflict is referred in the form of a question which should be answered by the members of the Electoral College either by a 'Yes' or 'No.' It is not a referendum of the people, but of the Basic Democrats, who constitute 15 per cent of the population of the country. The microscopic minority of the entire population is allowed to bear the responsibility of deciding how their country should be ruled and by whom. Many people in Pakistan, "notably the Lahore Bar, which has the reputation of thinking today what Pakistan thinks tomorrow, feel that Basic Democracy is neither basic nor democratic."² Efforts were made to scrap it, but President Ayub was determined to retain it as he had strived to devise it.

The legislative powers vested in the President are really extensive and all-embracing. He may assent to the Bill passed by the National Assembly, withhold his assent or return the Bill to the National Assembly for its reconsideration as a whole or any of its provisions. He has also the power to promulgate ordinances, which have the power of law duly passed by the National Assembly, if the Assembly is not in session or stands dissolved. Then, there are the emergency legislative powers of the President. Whether there exists emergency or not, it is the satisfaction and decision of the President alone. The President is simply required to inform the National Assembly of such a proclamation by placing it on its table. And how long the emergency is to continue is again the decision of the President. The National Assembly does not intervene at any stage. During the emergency the President may promulgate ordinances even while the Assembly is in session, and the Assembly has no power to disapprove of them. Since the Fundamental Rights, as incorporated in the Principles of Law-making, are not guaranteed by the Constitution, a citizen has no means to seek redress even if his basic liberties are restricted. By not constitutionally guaranteeing fundamental rights, the obvious aim is to control all forms of political activity. No Bill or amendment to a Bill providing for preventive detention can be introduced and moved in the National Assembly without the previous consent of the President.

Two important matters of public concern have been removed from the jurisdiction of the National Assembly and placed directly under the President—Defence and Finance. The Constitution provides that for a period of twenty years the Defence Minister must be a retired officer of the rank of Lieutenant-General, or its equivalent, unless the President has himself held such rank. President Ayub held the Defence portfolio in his first Council of Ministers. The President is also the Supreme Commander of the Defence Forces of Pakistan and he has the power to raise and maintain the Defence Services and the Reserves of those Services. He can also grant commissions in those Services, appoint Chief Commanders and determine their salaries and allowances.

The Constitution provides for the impeachment of the President on the charge that he had wilfully violated the Constitution or had been guilty of gross misconduct. He can also be removed from office on grounds of physical or mental incapacity. But the Constitution imposes such stringent conditions on both these counts that no member of the National Assembly may dare venture it. In both cases the motion for removal must be brought by at least one-third of the total membership of the National Assembly and must be carried by a vote of three-fourths of the membership. If the removal motion is supported by fewer than half the members, then the original movers of the motion for removal of the President are automatically unseated from their membership of the National Assembly.

The President could, thus, have no rivals under the Constitution and there was none before the turmoil created by the People's Party launched by the former Foreign Minister, Z.A. Bhutto. The slogan of Bhutto's Party was "Islam, Socialism and democracy." In conjunction with other political parties the Pakistan Democratic Movement was launched to restore Parliamentary democracy in the country. Mian Mumtaz Daultana, a former Chief Minister and a prominent member of the Pakistan Democratic Movement, publicly defended the system of Parliamentary democracy as established in India.³ In answer to questions by correspondents, Mian Mumtaz Daultana declared that difficulties faced in the practice of Parliamentary system in some of the Indian states "could be surmounted and it would serve no purpose in advancing them as an argument to run down the need for the same system for Pakistan." But President Ayub stood like a colossus, dwarfing all other political leaders. When the opposition to his regime became an open revolt the President agreed to some Parliamentary concessions. The intervention of the students in Pakistan politics made President Ayub's position critical and he, once again, handed over the administration to Martial Law Administration under his emergency powers.

THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY

Unicameral Legislature. The Constitution establishes a unicameral legislature at the Centre, known as the National Assembly. A unicameral legislature is the negation of the democratic demand and the basic principle of federalism. Bicameralism is based upon an enduring principle that resolutions of government which have widespread results need a multitude of councillors. It is also indispensable for States having federal form of government. To give Pakistan a pretence of a federation, the membership of the National Assembly has been based upon parity of members between the two Provinces, East and West Pakistan. The reasons for creating a unicameral legislature are explicit in President Ayub's approach to the solution of Pakistan's political tangle. He was convinced that democracy was essential to Pakistan as without it there could be no political stability. But he was also emphatic in his belief that this democracy must be of the kind that Pakistanis could understand and work. He was particularly suspicious of any system of Government which gave to the legislature unrestricted power to remove, or to fetter the Executive, "because he feared that 'this might open the way to a reversion to the former disastrous regime of party politics, intrigue and corruption, which so nearly involved the country in ruin.'" The Constitution that the President enacted was, therefore, tailored for Pakistan's needs. He told the people, "Don't let us kid ourselves and cling to clichés and assume that we are ready to work such a refined system, knowing the failure of earlier attempts. It will be foolhardy to try it again until our circumstances change radically."

The Constitution of 1962, accordingly, not only established a unicameral legislature, but it also took a retrograde step by introducing the system of indirect elections. To give the National Assembly the complexion of responsiveness, lest the Pakistanis might resent the total obliteration of the democratic institutions, Ministers, who need not be the members of the Assembly, have the right to speak there, answer to questions and defend the actions and policies of the Government. The Government is not responsible to the Assembly and it has no power to overturn the Government by a vote on motion, but the Rules of Procedure relating to conduct of business in the Assembly provide for adjournment motions and resolutions to express the feelings of members on the actions and policies of the government. This the President agreed to reluctantly after the Constitution had been promulgated.

1. Rushbrook Williams, F.L., The State of Pakistan, p. 234.

Composition and Organisation of the Assembly. The Central Legislature, which is no longer called a Parliament, consists of the President and one House, the National Assembly. The total membership of the Assembly is 156, including 6 women members, elected in equal numbers both from East and West Pakistan, that is, 75 general seats and 3 women seats from each wing. Three seats from each wing are reserved for women, though there is nothing to restrict their election for general seats. According to the Amendment which was to become operative in 1970, the membership of the Assembly was to be raised to 218. Ten seats were to be reserved for former Presidents, Speakers, Governors, Ministers or people who were distinguished in art, science or literature. There were to be two seats reserved for women. But with the abdication of President Ayub, General Yahya Khan, the Martial Law Administrator, abrogated the 1962 Constitution.

The normal term of the National Assembly is five years, but the First Assembly elected in 1962 was to serve for only three years. The President can dissolve the Assembly at any time, but he must at the same time seek re-election. The Assembly automatically stands dissolved after the expiry of its normal term of five years, but elections must be held within four months before the end of a normal term. If the Assembly is dissolved by the President, then, elections must be held within three months, after dissolution. The President's own term of office expires four months from the date of dissolution. Casual vacancies occurring within the last six months of an Assembly's term are not filled, otherwise by-elections are conducted by the Election Commission.

A candidate seeking election to the National Assembly must fulfil prescribed qualifications. He must be a citizen of Pakistan, at least 25 years of age, and not disqualified by Constitution and law. No individual candidate may stand for more than one Assembly seat at one time, "in other words, the old practice of multiple candidacies for "insurance" purposes is forbidden." If a member of the National Assembly is elected to a Provincial Assembly, or is appointed as a Governor or to any other office which disqualifies him to be a member of the Assembly, or does not attend its sittings, without leave, for 30 consecutive days, the seat is declared vacant.

The National Assembly is required to meet at least once every six months. The Constitution provides that Dacca shall be the principal seat of the National Assembly. The President summons, prorogues and dissolves the Assembly. As a matter of abundant caution, the Constitution empowers the Speaker of the National Assembly to summon its session at the request of at least one-third of the members. In such an eventuality, the Speaker alone is empowered to prorogue it. If the offices of the President of Pakistan, Speaker and Deputy Speaker of the Assembly are vacant, then, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court may summon the Assembly. As said earlier, the President may dissolve the National Assembly at any time. But his power of dissolution is subject to three limitations. Firstly, dissolution of the Assembly also means end of President's term of office. Both the members of the Assembly and the President go before the voters; the Assembly within three months from the date of dissolution and the President within four months. Secondly, the Assembly cannot be dissolved within the last six months of its term. Finally, no dissolution can take place when a motion for the removal of the President of Pakistan is being considered by the National Assembly.

The National Assembly elects its own Speaker and he presides over its sittings. The Speaker is elected for the term of office of the Assembly, unless removed earlier by a majority vote, but he remains in office till his successor is elected by the new Assembly. Since there is no office of the Vice-President and in the event of removal of the President of Pakistan, either as a result of gross misconduct or physical or mental incapacity, or in the event of his death or his absence from the country, the Speaker acts as the President, the Constitution ensures that there will always be a Speaker to serve as acting President if need be. Moreover, it eliminates the controversy, which had polluted the politics of Pakistan, that who shall preside at the first meeting of the newly elected National Assembly. Though the Constitution itself is silent, but a precedent has now been established that the Speaker and the President must not belong to the same Province; they should come from different Provinces.

To assist the Speaker in the performance of his duties the Constitution creates two Deputy Speakers, Senior and Junior. The Senior Deputy Speaker presides over the sittings of the National Assembly in the absence of the Speaker or acts as Speaker if that office falls vacant. In case of vacancy in any of these offices the new incumbent must be chosen promptly. The Assembly frames its own Rules of Procedure. The members of the Assembly are guaranteed freedom of speech and vote, and the proceedings of the House may not be challenged in any court of law. The Rules of Procedure introduce an innovation by providing that the Speaker should "make such arrangements as are necessary" to instruct the members of the Assembly in their obligations as legislators. But the Speaker has no means at his disposal to force the members to attend such "classes" of instruction if he contemplates to hold. The Speaker is empowered to control the proceedings of the House and maintains and enforces proper decorum. In the case of unruly members, he has the power to refer a matter of "gross misconduct" to the Supreme Court. If the Supreme Court holds a member guilty, he ceases to be a member of the National Assembly.

There are nineteen committees of the House and the principle of parity between East and West Pakistan is adopted in their Constitution. Sixteen of these Committees are departmental and the remaining three deal with Unspecified Matters, Rules of Procedure and Privileges, and the Public Accounts. The Public Accounts Committee consists of ten members whereas the Unspecified Matters Committee and Rules of Procedure and Privileges Committee have six members each.

Functions of the National Assembly. The main function of the National Assembly is to make laws. But its powers are restricted by the provisions of the Constitution as embodied in the Principles of Law-Making. The National Assembly has been made responsible for observing the Principles of Law-making. The Courts have been empowered to take notice of, and rectify, any breaches of laws so passed. It must, however, be observed that the courts cannot challenge the validity of law itself. The legislative procedure is simple. A Bill, when introduced in the Assembly, is debated upon three occasions. On the first occasion, there is a general discussion on the principles involved in the measure. If the Assembly approves the measure and it is not referred to a Select Committee of the House, it goes to the second stage of discussion. Here the Bill is discussed clause by clause, and amendments to it may be moved. In the final stage, the Bill in its amended form is discussed once more and then votes are taken.

When a Bill has been passed by the National Assembly, it is presented to the President for his assent. Within a period of thirty days the President is required to give his assent or declare that he withholds his assent thereto, or return the Bill to the Assembly with a message that the Bill or its particular provision may be reconsidered, or any amendment specified in the message may be considered. If the President does none of these three, the Bill becomes law. If the President withholds his assent, the Assembly is competent to pass the Bill over the President's veto by a two-thirds majority. In such an eventuality the President must signify his assent within a period of ten days, dissolve the Assembly or refer the Bill to a referendum of the Electoral College. If absolute majority of the members of the Electoral College vote in favour of the Bill, it becomes law immediately. "Neither a general election nor a referendum," in case of conflict between the President and the National Assembly, "would seem to be a desirable method of dealing with particular legislative issues, and undoubtedly the President will use the utmost of his influence to prevent the mobilization of a two-thirds majority against him."³

With regard to the financial powers of the Assembly much need not be said. It cannot control the Government and its hold on the purse is lean. The Constitution provides that the President shall, in respect of every financial year, cause to be laid before the National Assembly the Annual Budget Statement of the estimated receipts into and the estimated expenditure from the Central Consolidated Fund for the year. The Constitution requires that the Annual Budget Statement must distinguish between the expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund, recurring expenditure, and the new expenditure. The expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund includes the salaries and allowances of the President, Ministry, Judges, and so on. The recurring expenditure is the normal expenditure of the Government incurred every year. The new expenditure includes new items and increases of more than 10 per cent on the previous year's recurring expenditure. The National Assembly may discuss the expenditure under all the three categories, but it votes only on demands for grants (appropriations) for new expenditure. Moreover, the Annual Budget Statement may include estimated expenditure in future years on particular long-term projects and this, too, requires the assent of the Assembly. But once it has approved such estimates of expenditure, the funds are committed and need not be approved again.

The discussion on the Budget is not crucial in the life of the Government. Disapproval of the Budget Statement does not involve the defeat of the Government. In fact, the National Assembly's control over the purse is negligible. It need not touch the expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund. The recurring expenditure is safe in its hands and as for the long-term projects once the expenditure has been approved, it cannot be changed. The Assembly can only raise a storm while grants for the new expenditure are being discussed. But here too the powers of the members of the Assembly are limited, because neither demands for grants nor the "imposition, abolition, remission, alteration or regulation of any tax" may be moved without the recommendation of the President. Nor can any member of the Assembly introduce a Bill or move an amendment, if it involves expenditure from the revenues or other moneys of the Central Government without the recommendation of the President.

The discussion of the Budget too is a tame affair. There is no sharp criticism and anxious moments for tilting of the balance. Immediately after the presentation of the Budget discussion ensues, which takes two forms. First there is general discussion on the Budget. This is followed by individual demands for grants "though parliamentary time never permits every item to be debated." Discussion also takes place when approval is being granted to tax measures. This may be on general or particular issues. Following consideration of the Annual Budget Statement, the President causes to be prepared a schedule known as the Schedule of Authorised Expenditure and authenticates the same under his signatures. No moneys can be withdrawn from the Central Consolidated Fund except under the authority of the Schedule of Authorised Expenditure as authenticated by the President. The Schedule of Authorised Expenditure is laid before the National Assembly for its information.

Finally, are the deliberative functions of the National Assembly. The first opportunity is provided when a Bill is under discussion, and, as said earlier, there are three occasions for such a discussion. The members of the Assembly can ask questions and supplementaries and elicit the requisite information from the Minister concerned. Though, a Minister cannot be compelled to give answers to the question asked, but it is generally done as the Government gets an opportunity to defend its policies and rebut the criticism. Adjournment motions against the policy of the Government or to highlight its failures can also be moved. The members of the Assembly may also move resolutions to express the feelings of the people on the policies or actions of the Government, or to draw its attention to matters of importance which need immediate solution.

National Assembly examined. A unicameral legislature with indirect elections and that too in a country with a federal polity professing democratic ideals is really a distrust of democracy and complete disregard of the basic federal principles. The National Assembly is, therefore, not a barometer of public opinion and its members do not hold any mandate from the people. When voters have no direct participation in the election of their representatives, they take only lukewarm interest in politics and eventually become negligent in public affairs. Nor does indirect method of election decrease the evils of party system, the main prop of President Ayub. This system of election also increases chances of bribery and corruption and the members of the Electoral College can be easily tempted and as the conditions of political morality prevail, they do easily succumb to such temptations. Further, law, according to Aristotle, should be reason without passion. It means, in the first place, that those who are entrusted with the duty of making laws should avoid the dangers of rash, hasty and ill-considered legislation. A due amount of caution and reflection are the prerequisites of legislation, as passion is dangerous in law-making. Secondly, as laws are to affect all alike, it is necessary that the legislature should be a representative body of all people representing numerous interests in order to secure the consent of all sections of opinion. Both these objectives are secured by a legislature organised into two Chambers and the direct election of the representatives to the representative Chamber. The second Chamber provides a convenient means of giving representation to different classes and interests. The National Assembly does not fulfil any of these.

The National Assembly is essentially a legislative body. Legislative functions consist of two kinds of work, law-making and deliberative. The law-making function of the National Assembly is hedged by innumerable limitations and its deliberative functions are not of any serious consequence. In fact, the President controls the National Assembly. President's legislative powers, both in normal times and during emergency, eclipse the law-making powers of the National Assembly. The Constitution empowers the President to withhold his assent to a Bill passed by the National Assembly, or he may return it to the Assembly for reconsideration or make a request through a message for the consideration of certain amendments. The President has also the power to dissolve the Assembly at any time or he may refer the matter, which is the cause of conflict between the President and the National Assembly, to the referendum of the Electoral College. The Electoral College elects the President and the members of the National Assembly and their verdict can be obvious under a system of "tied democracy."

Certain legislative powers have also been given to the President to be exercised by him at a time when the National Assembly is not in session. When the Assembly is not in session or it stands dissolved, the President has the power to promulgate ordinances which have the same force as laws enacted by the National Assembly. An ordinance is required to be laid before the National Assembly when reconvened and if it is approved by the Assembly, it becomes an Act of the Central legislature. If it is disapproved by the Assembly, then, it expires six weeks from the day of the Assembly's meeting or six months after its promulgation, whichever is earlier.

Then, the President is armed with legislative powers during the period of Emergency. So far as the proclamation of Emergency is concerned, it is the exclusive prerogative of the President and the National Assembly does not intervene at any stage, except that the proclamation must be laid before the Assembly and that too for the sake of its information only. During the Emergency the President may promulgate ordinances even when the National Assembly is in session. These ordinances, unless approved by the Assembly or repealed earlier by the President, lapse with the emergency itself. And these ordinances may embrace the entire life of the nation, political, economic and social, overriding even the rights as incorporated in the Principles of Law-making since they are not constitutionally guaranteed and are non-justiciable. Moreover, the members of the Assembly cannot introduce a Bill or move an amendment to a Bill providing for or relating to preventive detention without the previous consent of the President.

Responsibility and control go together and the legislative control over the Government has always centred upon the control of the purse. The National Assembly does not control the Government. In fact, the Government controls the National Assembly. The President's Council of Ministers are not responsible to the National Assembly. In terms of the Constitution ministerial office is incompatible with membership of the Assembly. The Ministers, no doubt, have the right to speak in the National Assembly, introduce Bills, defend the policy of the Government and answer to the questions and supplementaries directed by the members. The members can move adjournment motions and resolutions for the redress of grievances and even censure the Government, but they cannot bring to book the Government. Defeat of the Government even on crucial matters of policy does not mean the exit of Government from office. The office of the President goes by calendar unless he is removed either by impeachment or due to physical or mental incapacity. The Ministers are responsible to the President alone and they remain in office during his pleasure. They constitute, according to the Constitution, President's Council of Ministers.

The most important function of a legislature, as said above, is the control and regulation of national finances. The Constitution of Pakistan has severely limited the role of the Assembly in money matters. Whatever be the vote of the Assembly, "the government is assured of having in each fiscal year at least as much money as in the previous year and can plan for the future with confidence once a long-term project has been approved." The adverse vote of the Assembly by rejecting the grants on new expenditure does not mean the exit of the Government.

CHAPTER VI

THE SUPREME COURT

Appointment and qualifications of Judges. At the apex of the Pakistan judiciary is the Supreme Court of Pakistan. It consists of a Chief Justice and as many Justices as may be determined by law, or until so determined as may be fixed by the President. The Chief Justice is appointed by the President whereas other Justices are appointed by the President in consultation with the Chief Justice of Pakistan. A Justice of the Supreme Court must be a citizen of Pakistan and he has for a period of not less than five years been either a Judge of a High Court in Pakistan, or has for a period of not less than 15 years been an Advocate or Pleader of a High Court in Pakistan. Before entering his office, the Chief Justice has to take oath of office in the prescribed form before the President. Justices take the oath of office before the Chief Justice. A Justice of the Supreme Court, including the Chief Justice, holds the office till the age of 65 unless he resigns earlier or is removed from office in accordance with the Constitution. If the office of the Chief Justice becomes vacant or he is absent or unable to perform the functions of his office due to illness or some other cause, the President may appoint some other Justice of the Supreme Court to act for the time being. In the case of a Justice, the President may appoint a Judge of a High Court, who is qualified for appointment as a Justice of the Supreme Court, to act temporarily till the permanent vacancy is filled or the incumbent returns to his duty.

The Constitution also makes provision for the appointment of ad hoc Justices. If at any time the Supreme Court cannot hold its sittings, due to lack of quorum, or for any other reason and it seems expedient to increase the number of Justices temporarily, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, with the approval of the President and consent of the Chief Justice of the High Court concerned, may require a Judge of the High Court to act as an ad hoc Justice for such period as may be necessary. An ad hoc Justice so appointed exercises the same powers and jurisdiction as that are vested in a permanent Justice of the Supreme Court.

Seat of the Supreme Court. The permanent seat of the Supreme Court is Islamabad, Rawalpindi, but the Court must sit in Dacca, East Pakistan, at least twice in every year and for such periods as the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court may consider necessary. The Supreme Court may, from time to time, sit in such other places as the Chief Justice, with the approval of the President, may fix. Until provision is made for establishing the Supreme Court at Islamabad, the seat of the Court shall be at such place as the President may fix.

POWERS AND JURISDICTION

Original Jurisdiction. The Supreme Court has exclusive original jurisdiction in any dispute between one of the Governments and one or both of the other Governments. The term 'Governments' means the Central Government and the Provincial Governments. While exercising this jurisdiction, the Supreme Court pronounces declaratory judgments only.

Appellate Jurisdiction. The Supreme Court is vested with the jurisdiction to hear and determine appeals from judgments, decrees, orders or sentences of a High Court. An appeal to the Supreme Court from a judgment, decree, order or sentence of a High Court lies as a right: —

(1) where the High Court certifies that the case involves a substantial case of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution;

(2) where the High Court has sentenced a person to death or to transportation for life;

(3) where the High Court has imposed punishment on a person in pursuance of the power conferred upon the Supreme Court by Article 123. Article 123 provides that the Supreme Court shall have power to punish any person who abuses, interferes with or obstructs the process of the Court in any way or disobeys any order of the Supreme Court, or scandalises the Court or otherwise does anything which tends to bring the Court or a Justice of that Court into hatred, ridicule or contempt, or does anything which tends to prejudice the determination of a matter pending before the Court, or does any other thing which, by law, constitutes contempt of the Court.

The Constitution also provides that an appeal from a judgment, decree, order, or sentence of a High Court in a case not otherwise appealable in the Supreme Court, shall lie only if the Supreme Court grants leave to appeal. This provision is tantamount to the special leave for appeal as provided for in the Indian Constitution.

Advisory Jurisdiction. The Supreme Court of Pakistan is also vested with advisory jurisdiction. The Constitution provides that if at any time the President of Pakistan considers it desirable to obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court on any question of law, which he considers of public importance, he may refer it to the Supreme Court for its consideration and opinion. The Supreme Court reports its opinion on the question so referred to the President after due consideration.

Additional Jurisdiction. The Constitution also makes provision for vesting the Supreme Court with additional jurisdiction. Article 60 provides that in addition to the jurisdiction already conferred on the Supreme Court by the Constitution, the Supreme Court shall exercise such other jurisdiction as may be conferred on it by law.

Processes of the Supreme Court. Article 61 of the Constitution provides that the Supreme Court has the power to issue such directions, orders or decrees as it may find necessary for dispensation of justice in any cause or matter pending before the Court, including an order for the purpose of securing the attendance of any person, or discovery, or production of any document. All such directions, orders or decrees are enforceable throughout Pakistan and in case of their execution in a Province they will be executed as if they had been issued by the High Court of the Province concerned. In case of conflict, the decision of the Supreme Court shall be final.

Power of Review. The Supreme Court has been given the power to review its own judgments. Article 62 provides that the Supreme Court shall have power, subject to the provisions of any Act of the Central Legislature and of any Rules made by the Supreme Court, to review any judgment pronounced or any order made by it.

Decisions of the Supreme Court are binding. The decisions rendered by the Supreme Court, to the extent that they decide questions of law or are based on or enunciate principles of law, are binding on all other courts in Pakistan. It is further provided that all executive and judicial authorities throughout Pakistan must act in aid of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court may, with the approval of the President, make rules regarding the practice and procedure of the Supreme Court.

Estimate of the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court of Pakistan does not enjoy the same position and status as its counterparts do in the United States of America and India. In fact, the Constitution has made no effort to make it at par with the Supreme Courts of these countries. President Ayub had never intended that the Supreme Court should become the final arbiter on the interpretation of the Constitution. His opinion about the power of judicial review, which in a federal polity a Supreme Court must possess, was rather peculiar. He asserted that the provision for judicial review was absolutely of no use to the common man as he had not the means to carry the question to courts. It was just a pass-time for the wealthy who would make the last bid to challenge the validity of laws in order to perpetuate their privileges and vested interests. It would, thus, retard all progress and development of Pakistan, he asserted. He further argued that it was wisdom to trust the legislators, who were representatives of the people, rather than to make judges, who represented none, the custodian of public interests and the Court a super-legislature. But it should be conceded that the National Assembly under the Constitution is not a sovereign body. Nor does it represent the people. In a "tied democracy" as established in Pakistan, the National Assembly is indirectly elected and the President of Pakistan has powers to override its decisions at every step.

Since the Supreme Court has no power of judicial review, no law can be challenged on the ground that the Legislature, Central or Provincial, had no power to do so or on the ground that the Legislature had made it in contravention of any of the Principles of Law-making which embody the fundamental rights. "In consequence, the role of the courts is now to interpret the law and to enforce rights under the law, but not to set limits to legislative action or to prevent the executive from implementing policies adopted by the legislature."

CHAPTER VII

PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT

Provinces of Pakistan. Pakistan now consists of two Provinces, East Pakistan and West Pakistan. Immediately after the establishment of Pakistan in 1947, it consisted of eighteen units of government, heterogeneous in character and administration. There were the four Governor's Provinces, East Bengal, West Punjab, North-West Frontier Province and Sind. All these Provinces had their own legislative assemblies and enjoyed "Provincial autonomy." Baluchistan was administered by a Chief Commissioner who was directly responsible to the Central Government. There were also four Princely States which were soon merged into the Baluchistan States Union. The North-West Frontier, too, had four Princely States. Then, there were two larger and more developed States of Bhawalpur and Khairpur. Finally, were the extensive tribal areas administered by the Provincial Governments on behalf of the Central Government. In 1948, Karachi district was separated from Sind to become the federal capital.

It would, thus, be apparent that East Bengal was the only single Province and it was, therefore, West Pakistan which necessitated some kind of immediate change to bring some kind of homogeneity. There were conflicting opinions. The elements in power in the smaller units of West Pakistan were reluctant to lose their identity whereas others feared that local interests and traditions "might be overwhelmed by the predominance of Punjab in any merger or federation." Sind and North-West Frontier were more vocal in this respect. The issue had become so controversial that the First Constituent Assembly failed to come to a solution. After its dissolution the Government proposed to amalgamate West Pakistan by administrative order. The issue of dissolution was taken to the Court and it blocked the question of West Pakistan's finalisation. The measure was, then, taken to the Second Constituent Assembly. West Pakistan became a single Province on October 14, 1955. The status of Karachi remained controversial till it was decided in 1959 to shift the capital to Rawalpindi. Karachi was finally integrated in West Pakistan on July 1, 1961.

Parity between East and West Pakistan was the basis of the constitutional settlement in 1956, and it continues to underline the present structure. But there is a deep-rooted resentment amongst the various Opposition political parties against the existing structure and they demand disintegration of West Pakistan. The first loud voice of protest came from former Foreign Minister Z.A. Bhutto. Bhutto suggested that people inhabiting the various parts now comprising West Pakistan should be allowed to reopen the issue. The former West Punjab, however, wanted one unit to continue. There was also Sheikh Mujib-ur-Rehman's six-point plan for East Pakistan, which demanded greater autonomy for East Pakistan.

Structure of Government in the Provinces. Like India, Pakistan has one single Constitution for the whole country. Although Pakistan is organised on federal basis yet the Constitution makes no pretence at being federal. The division of powers between the Central and regional Governments is not exactly that a federation requires. There is only one Central list and that too a very short as contained in the Third Schedule of the Constitution. It includes defence, external affairs, external trade, national finance and economic planning, communications, nuclear energy, and gas and oil. All other unenumerated matters are left to the Provinces, but the Central Legislature is competent to legislate in the residuary field where the national interests of Pakistan in relation to the security of the country, including the economic and financial stability of Pakistan, planning or co-ordination, or the achievement of uniformity in any matter in different parts of Pakistan so requires. The Constitution also empowers a Provincial Assembly to authorise the Central Legislature by a resolution to make laws, for the Province on any matter within the jurisdiction of the Province itself. But any law made in pursuance of this power may be amended or repealed by an Act of the Provincial Legislature concerned.

The residuary powers, thus, are vested in the Provinces. The Constitution also provides that the responsibility of deciding whether it has the power to make a law on a subject not enumerated in the Third Schedule rests with the Provincial Legislature itself. But when the Constitution permits the Central Legislature to take action whenever it deems necessary in the "national interest" the residuary powers vested in the Provinces become insignificant. It will be more appropriate to say that the Central Government can invade the Provincial jurisdiction without the need to invoke "emergency" powers. Finally, when a Provincial law is inconsistent with the Central Law, the latter prevails and the Provincial Law is invalid to the extent of the inconsistency.

Provincial Executive. The executive authority of a Province is vested in a Governor, appointed by the President for an indefinite term and is subject to his direction. No person can be appointed a Governor of a Province unless he is qualified to be elected as a member of the National Assembly. If a Governor goes abroad, or is unable to perform his duties due to illness or some other cause, the President will appoint an Acting Governor and in that capacity he is to perform the duties of his office according to the directions of the President.

The Governor exercises the executive authority vested in him, either directly or through officers subordinate to him, in accordance with the Constitution, the law and the direction of the President. He may specify the manner in which orders and other instruments made and executed in pursuance of any authority or power vested in the Governor shall be expressed and authenticated. He may regulate the allocation and transaction of the business of the Government of the Province and establish departments of the Government. For the performance of his functions, the Governor, with the concurrence of the President, may appoint Ministers to constitute the Governor's Council of Ministers. These Ministers must be qualified to be elected as members of the Provincial Assembly, but they need not be its members. The ministerial office is, therefore, incompatible, as at the Centre, with membership of the Provincial Assembly. These Ministers have the right to sit in the Assembly and participate in its proceedings, but they have not the right to vote. Nor are they responsible to it. The Governor's Council of Ministers is in effect an Executive Council, appointed and dismissed by the Governor in consultation with the President. In addition to the Ministers, the Governor may appoint, from amongst the members of the Provincial Assembly, persons, not exceeding the number of the Departments of the Government as established by the Governor, to be Parliamentary Secretaries. Their functions and Departments are determined by the Governor.

All these provisions are identical to the President's Council of Ministers and the Parliamentary Secretaries he appoints. Just as it is at the Centre, similarly, in a Province the Governor appoints an Advocate-General. The Advocate-General must be a person qualified to be appointed as a Judge of the High Court. He performs such duties as the Governor may direct and assign.

The Provincial Legislature. As at the Centre so in the Provinces there is a unicameral legislature designated as the Provincial Assembly. Its membership is 155 in each Province inclusive of five seats reserved for women. Women can, however, contest for general seats also.¹ The normal term of office of the Assembly is five years. The members of the Assembly must possess the same qualifications as members of the National Assembly and the Provincial Assembly has the same provision, with regard to Speaker and Deputy Speakers, procedure, privileges, etc.

The Governor may summon the Assembly from time to time and may also prorogue it unless it has been summoned by the Speaker. The Speaker is empowered to summon the session of the Provincial Assembly if one-third of the members demand it. When the Speaker summons the Assembly, he can only prorogue it. The Governor alone has the power of dissolution. In case of conflict between the Governor and the Provincial Assembly the Governor has the power to dissolve it with the concurrence of the President. In case of a conflict between the Governor and the Provincial Assembly, the Constitution provides that either the Governor or the Speaker or both of them may request the President in writing to refer the matter to the National Assembly for its decision. If the Governor makes such a request its copy shall, at the time it is made, be sent to the Speaker and if it is made by the Speaker, then the copy is to be sent to the Governor. The President of Pakistan is required to send immediately after the receipt of such a request its copy to the Speaker of the National Assembly. The Assembly considers the issue involved in the conflict and is required to give its decision through a resolution within 30 days after the request received by the Speaker. It is the duty of the President to summon the session of the Assembly, if it is not in session, to enable it to give its decision within the specified time. If the President fails to do so, the Speaker shall summon the session of the Assembly. As said above, the Governor may, with the concurrence of the President, dissolve the Provincial Assembly if the National Assembly decides the conflict in favour of the Governor.

1. According to the amendment of the constitution which was to become operative in 1970, the membership of the Provincial Assemblies was raised. There were to be three more seats reserved for women in each Provincial Assembly.

The Governor may address the Provincial Assembly and also send messages to it. The Ministers of the Governor's Council and the Advocate-General have the right to sit in the Assembly and participate in its proceedings or any of its Committees, but they are not entitled to vote. No Bill or amendment of a Bill providing for or relating to Preventive Detention shall be introduced or moved in the Provincial Assembly without the previous consent of the Governor.

When the Provincial Assembly passes a Bill it goes to the Governor for his assent. The Governor must give his assent within thirty days, or withhold his assent or return it to the Assembly for reconsideration. If the Governor does not do either of the three, the Bill ipso facto becomes a law. If he withholds his assent the Assembly is competent to reconsider it. If it is passed again with two-thirds majority of the total membership, it is presented to the Governor for his assent. If the Governor returns the Bill for reconsideration and the Assembly again passes it, with or without the amendments as desired and specified by the Governor, by a majority of votes, it is presented to the Governor for his assent. When the Bill is again presented to the Governor, he must give his assent thereto within ten days or request the President to refer the Bill to the National Assembly for its decision. If within the period of ten days he fails to do either of the two things, the Bill is deemed to have been assented to by the Governor. If the National Assembly passes a resolution supporting the Bill, the Governor shall be deemed to have assented to the Bill from the date the National Assembly had passed the resolution.

The Governor also possesses legislative powers when the Provincial Assembly is not in session or it stands dissolved. If the Governor is satisfied that circumstances exist which render immediate legislation necessary, he may promulgate an ordinance which has the force of law. The ordinance so promulgated is required to be placed before the Assembly as soon as it is practicable. If the Assembly approves the ordinance by resolution before the expiration of the prescribed period, it becomes a law of the Provincial Assembly. The prescribed period is 42 days after the first meeting of the Assembly or the period of 180 days after the promulgation of the ordinance. If the Assembly disapproved the ordinance or does not approve it and it has not been repealed by the Governor before the expiration of the prescribed period, it shall be deemed to have been repealed upon the expiration of the prescribed period.

The financial powers of the Assembly are similar to those of the National Assembly, except that these relate to the Provincial jurisdiction alone. Article 89 of the Constitution provides that the provisions of Articles 40 to 47 shall apply to and in relation to a Province, except that the term 'President' is to be replaced by the term 'Governor' and for the term 'National Assembly' shall be read 'Provincial Assembly.'

High Courts. At the apex of the Provincial judiciary is the High Court and provision has been made for each Province to have its own High Court. A High Court consists of a Chief Justice and as many other Judges as may be determined by law or fixed by the President. A Judge of the High Court is appointed by the President after consultation with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the Governor of the Province and the Chief Justice of the High Court concerned. A Judge of the High Court must be a citizen of Pakistan and he has for a period of not less than 10 years been an advocate or pleader of a High Court or he has for a period of not less than three years served as or exercised the functions of a District Judge in Pakistan, or he has for a period of not less than 10 years held a judicial office in Pakistan. A Judge holds office until he attains the age of 60. He may resign earlier. A Judge is also subject to removal from office in accordance with the Constitution.

The permanent seat of the High Court of East Pakistan is Dacca. But the Chief Justice, with the approval of the Governor, may fix any other place for the High Court to sit. The permanent seat of the High Court of West Pakistan is Lahore. It has also its permanent seats at Karachi and Peshawar. A Judge of the High Court of West Pakistan shall not be transferred from the permanent seat of that court to another permanent seat of that court without the prior approval of the President. A Judge of that High Court who has served for less than five years at a permanent seat of that court, shall not, without his consent, be transferred to another permanent seat except where the transfer is necessary in order to ensure that the functions of the Court are properly carried out.

Article 98 of the Constitution deals with the jurisdiction of the High Courts. It provides that the High Court shall have such jurisdiction as is conferred on it by the Constitution or by law. The jurisdiction in the 1956 Constitution to issue writs of hebeas corpus, quo warranto, mandamus, and prohibition has been replaced by the power to issue orders. The orders seem to have the same effect as the writs of various kinds, "but since the traditional names are not used, the common law scope is avoided." If a High Court is satisfied that no other adequate remedy is provided by law, it may make an order directing a person performing in the Province functions relating to the affairs of the Centre, the Province or a local authority, to refrain from doing that which is not permitted by law to do, or may declare that any act done or proceedings taken has been done without lawful authority and consequently is of no legal effect. The High Court may order that a person taken in custody should be produced before it in order to establish that he is not being held in custody without lawful authority or in an unlawful manner. The High Court may also require a person holding a public office to show under what authority of law he claims to hold that office. But no such order shall be made in respect of a person in the Defence Services of Pakistan regarding his terms and conditions of service or in respect of any action taken in relation to him as a member of the Defence Services. The same applies to any other person in the service of Pakistan in respect of his terms and conditions of service. The intent and result of these provisions is to limit the role of the Courts in administrative matters and to prevent writ petitions for interrupting the essential activities of the government.

The decisions of the High Courts, so far as they may decide the questions of law or are based upon or enunciate principles of law, are binding on other subordinate courts. A High Court, with the approval of the Governor of the Province concerned, may make rules regulating the practice and procedure of the High Court or of any other Court subordinate to it. A High Court supervises and controls all other courts that are subordinate to it.

CHAPTER VIII

AYUB GOES, CONSTITUTION ABROGATED

Martial Law Again. On March 25, 1969, Pakistan's soldier-President, Field Marshal Ayub Khan, stepped down from power in the face of a massive wave of bloodshed and lawlessness which had swept the country. In a broadcast to the nation, President Ayub said that the situation in the country had come to such a state that the problems of Pakistan were being solved in the streets and road-crossings instead of the negotiating table and announced that he was handing power to the Army Commander, General Yahya Khan. With the sharp deterioration in law and order and mounting economic chaos this was perhaps inevitable. Whether President Ayub stood down voluntarily or under duress may not be known with certainty at least for some time.

With the imposition of Martial Law Pakistan went back where it was in 1958. General Yahya Khan's Martial Law Administration swung into action sternly. Twenty-five Martial Law regulations were brought into force covering almost every aspect of public behaviour and the penalties for their violation were stringent indeed. General Yahya Khan, who assumed the powers of the Chief Martial Law Administrator, appointed three Deputy Chief Martial Law Administrators, one each from the three wings of the Defence Services—Lieutenant-General Abdul Hamid Khan, Vice-Admiral S.M. Ahsan and Air Marshal M. Noor Khan.

Partial Restoration of the 1962 Constitution. The proclamation issued by General Yahya Khan on March 25, 1969 announced the abrogation of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan and persons holding offices of President, members of the President's Council of Ministers, the Governors of Provinces and members of their Council of Ministers ceased to hold office with immediate effect. The National Assembly and the two Provincial Assemblies were dissolved. All Courts and Tribunals in existence immediately before the abrogation of the Constitution were allowed to continue and exercise all their powers and jurisdictions which they would have exercised had the Constitution not been abrogated. But no Court could call in question any Martial Law regulation or order or any finding, judgment, or order of a military court and no writ or other order could be issued against the Chief Martial Law Administrator or any persons exercising powers or jurisdiction under the authority of the Chief Martial Law Administrator.

But on March 31, 1969, just six days after the assumption of office as Chief Martial Law Administrator, General Yahya Khan assumed Presidency. In a proclamation the General said that he "has assumed office" of Presidentship since the day Field Marshal Ayub Khan relinquished his office. Thus, General Yahya Khan became the third President of Pakistan. In 1958, General Ayub Khan took over from Sir Iskander Mirza.

On April 4, 1969, Pakistan's "self-proclaimed" President and Chief Martial Law Administrator, General Yahya Khan, issued a provisional Constitution order restoring parts of the 1962 Constitution to give legal sanction to his assumption of office as President and empower himself to make such laws and constitutional provisions as he might deem fit for the management of the affairs of the State. The order said, "Notwithstanding the abrogation of the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan brought into force on June 8, 1962, by the Proclamation and subject to any regulation or order made from time to time by the Chief Martial Law Administrator, the State of Pakistan shall, except as otherwise provided in this order, be governed as nearly as may be in accordance with the 1962 Constitution." The order specifically provided that paragraphs 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 13, 14, 15 and 17 of the Fundamental Rights set out in Chapter I of Part II of the Constitution stood abrogated. There was no direct reference to the restoration of the office of the Governor, but it was implied in the order when it said that an ordinance promulgated by the President or the Governor of a Province would not be subject to the jurisdiction of any court of law.

General Yahya Khan had become wiser from Pakistan's experience of the Ayub regime and, accordingly, he tried to give semblance of constitutional government in the country. The government announcement of March 31, 1969 declaring General Yahya Khan's assumption of Presidency said that he would remain President only until "a new Constitution is framed by the elected representatives of the people." Although the announcement gave no indication how long it would take to frame a Constitution, but the new President made it abundantly clear that he had no ambition other than creating conditions conducive to the establishment of constitutional government. He also pledged himself to the restoration of democracy and the transfer of power to the representatives of the people elected freely and impartially on the basis of adult franchise. It was, thus, clear that unlike Ayub Khan, Yahya Khan had no intention of imposing a Constitution of his own. Pakistan's new Constitution is to be drawn up in a democratic way.

Towards a new Constitution. On November 28, 1969, President Yahya Khan took a step forward and announced in a surprise broadcast to the nation that elections to the National Assembly would be held on October 5, 1970 on the basis of one-man-one-vote and set the time limit for the newly elected National Assembly to frame a new Constitution for Pakistan within a specified period of 120 days. If the National Assembly failed to complete its task within the time-limit of 120 days, it would be dissolved and new elections held to accomplish the task. Elections to the Provincial Assemblies, it was announced, will be held on the basis of the new Constitution. The legal framework for elections was to be completed by March 31, 1970.

The restoration of the former provinces of Sind, Baluchistan and the North-West Frontier was the highlight of President Yahya Khan's announcement. The dissolution of one-unit would give East Pakistan, which has a bigger population than that of West Pakistan, a larger share in national affairs and also end the parity of representation as between the western and eastern wings provided for in the Constitution of 1962.

In pursuance of his declared policy, President Yahya Khan announced on March 28, 1970, the legal framework for the general election to be held next October. A 330-member National Assembly will draft Pakistan's new Constitution following general elections on October 5, 1970. The Assembly will include 13 women. The elections will be held on the basis of adult franchise and each Province will be represented in the National Assembly on the basis of population. The representation in the National Assembly for each Province has been fixed and also the strength of each Provincial Assembly. East Pakistan will have the largest block of members in the National Assembly—169 in a House of 313.

July 1, 1970 has been fixed for the dissolution of the one-unit West Pakistan Province. According to the Press release in Rawalpindi on April 1, 1970, Islamabad and the Tribal Areas will be centrally administered. Karachi will be in Sind, but Lasbela formerly in Sind will go to Baluchistan. Bhawalpur Division, comprising a former Princely State, will form part of Punjab. The names of the Governors have also been announced: Lieutenant-General Rahman Gul, Sind; Lieutenant-General Khawja Mohi-ud-din, North-West Frontier Province; Lieutenant-General Riyaz Hussain, Baluchistan. The Governor of West Pakistan, Lieutenant-General Atiqur Rahman, would continue as Governor of all four Provinces until the newly-appointed Governors of Sind, North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan took office. Thereafter General Atiqur Rahman would continue as Governor of West Punjab. It is significant to note that none of the four Governors is a civilian.

President Yahya Khan announced that Pakistan's new Constitution be based on the Islamic ideology—the country would become an Islamic Republic—and provide for an independent judiciary. The proposed Provincial elections would be on the basis of the 1961 census and that the Provincial elections would be held not later than October 22, 1970.

In order to enable the peaceful transfer of power to the elected representatives of the people, political parties were allowed to resume their activities from January 1, 1970. With a view to ensuring impartial and free elections, the President said that the authorities would not interfere in the normal political activities, but he warned that violence and other lawless activities should not be resorted to.

Appraisal of the Proposals. The constitutional proposals of President Yahya Khan came for sharp criticism from some of the Pakistani politicians immediately after they were announced on November 28, 1969. Voicing his disappointment, Z.A. Bhutto, former Foreign Minister and Chairman of the Pakistan People's Party, called them as only "a half road" towards constitutional settlement. He expressed his strong doubt if the Constituent Assembly would be ever able to solve problems like the extent of autonomy to be enjoyed by different units of Pakistan, and the question of bicameralism. It may be noted that East Pakistan leaders have vehemently been demanding a uni-cameral legislature. General Yahya Khan has declared that such issues will be settled by the Constituent Assembly, but Bhutto is of the view that on all such matters the President should have given clear verdict. Former Chief Minister of East Pakistan Aftab Khan Khan has also criticised some of the provisions of General Yahya Khan's announcement. He has expressed his disappointment over the fact that the question of autonomy has been left unsettled. He has expressed his fear that the Constituent Assembly would be bogged down in settling such matters. He has also demanded complete internal autonomy. Maulana Bhashani, who insists on class representation in the legislature, has said that he will oppose the elections if they are held within the framework announced by President Yahya Khan.

But the announcement bans any propaganda against the elections and any expression of opinion "prejudicial to the ideology, integrity and security of Pakistan." Again on March 28, 1970, President Yahya Khan said, "Every one has the right to offer his solution to the constitutional, political, economic and administrative problems of the country. But no one has the right to offer a solution which would adversely affect the solidarity of the people of Pakistan. This no one would tolerate. We will refuse to be silent spectators to any attacks against Pakistan's entity as a nation." This is the President's answer to the demand for the regional autonomy of East Pakistan made by Sheikh Mujibur Rehman, the leader of the Awami League. General Yahya Khan has made it plain that he has the power of veto over any constitutional scheme proposed by the Assembly.

The National Assembly has to frame the Constitution within 120 days, or it will stand dissolved. President Yahya Khan has rejected the contention of political leaders that the 120-day limit set by him for the National Assembly to finalise the new Constitution was too short. The President blames the political parties for the lack of a consensus on the future Constitution of Pakistan. General Yahya Khan holds that the National Assembly would not be starting from a scratch. It would have before it two or three drafts in the form of previous Constitutions.

When this is supplemented by the fact that the Assembly will be automatically dissolved if the President does not authenticate the constitutional Bill, and that only the President and not the National Assembly can amend the constitutional framework announced on March 30, 1970, shows that the Assembly will not be a sovereign body. It means that even if all East Pakistani members of the National Assembly—169 in a House of 313—unitedly back the Awami League's demand of internal autonomy, they might not be able to have their own way.

CHAPTER XXI

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INDIAN REPUBLIC

MAKING OF THE CONSTITUTION

Development of the idea of Constituent Assembly in India. The right of the people to determine the form of Government under which they would live and to frame their own Constitution was first conceived by a few advanced Indian nationalists during the First World War. This claim was cemented by the declaration of the Allies, conceding self-determination to all nations, big or small. But after the war had been won, the British Government denied the right of self-determination to the people of India. The Preamble to the Government of India Act, 1919, categorically stated, "And whereas the time and manner of each advance can be determined only by Parliament, upon whom the responsibility lies for the welfare and advancement of the Indian people."

But it did not put an end to the Indian demand for self-determination. In 1922, Gandhi asserted in most unequivocal terms the future of the country. He said, "Let us see clearly what Swaraj, together with the British connection, means. It means an undoubtedly India's ability to declare her independence if she wishes. Swaraj, therefore, will not be a free gift of the British people. It will be a declaration of India's full self-expression. That it will be expressed through an Act of Parliament is correct and true. But it will be merely a courteous ratification of the declared wish of the people of India even as it was in the case of the union of South Africa. Not an unnecessary adverb could be altered by the House of Commons. The ratification in our case will be of a treaty to which Britain will be party. Such Swaraj may not come this year, may not come within our generation. But I have contemplated nothing less. The British Parliament, when the settlement comes, will ratify the wishes of the people of India as expressed not through the bureaucracy but through her freely chosen representatives."

At the same time, Liberal members of the Central Legislature, under the inspiration of Mrs. Annie Besant, decided to call a National Convention "in order to obtain for the Commonwealth of India Dominion Status in her external relations and Swaraj in her internal affairs." A National Conference was held in New Delhi on February 12-13, 1923 for purposes of making arrangements for the calling of the National Convention after the election of 1923. The scheme, however, did not fructify. The newly formed Swaraj Party in the Central Legislature put forward in the Legislative Assembly a demand for the Round Table Conference or Convention for recommending a scheme of Constitution for India. This demand was reiterated in 1925, when the Report of the Muddiman Committee was being discussed in the Legislative Assembly. The demand of the Swaraj Party was not analogous to that of a Constituent Assembly, but the germs were there.

The appointment of the Statutory Commission was considered by Indians an open challenge to their patriotism, and it was at this stage that M.N. Roy put forward, for the first time, the idea of a Constituent Assembly. But it remained only an isolated suggestion. No political party owned it and, as such, it did not attract much public attention at that time. Even when in January 1930, the Indian National Congress declared full independence as India's goal, no mention was made about the Constituent Assembly. The resolution of the Congress Working Committee simply said, "we believe, therefore, that India must sever the British connection and attain Purna Swaraj or complete independence."

Demand for a Constituent Assembly. The demand for a Constituent Assembly entered Indian politics in 1934. On April 7, 1934, Gandhi approved the proposal to revive the Swaraj Party. The Swaraj Party was formed at Ranchi early in May and it placed before the country a programme which, inter alia, claimed for India, "in common with other nations, the right of self-determination." The Party maintained that the only method of "applying that principle is to convene a Constituent Assembly representative of all sections of the Indian people to frame an acceptable Constitution." The policy of the Swaraj Party was approved by the All-India Congress Committee at its Patna Session in May, 1934. The demand for the Constituent Assembly from that time onwards became the platform of the Congress, although many Congress leaders did not understand its full meaning and significance. They took it as synonymous to an All-Parties Conference.¹ Jawaharlal Nehru took note of it and apprised his colleagues of the implications of the concept of a Constituent Assembly. They did not realise, wrote Nehru, "that the whole idea behind the Constituent Assembly is that it should be elected on a very wide mass basis, drawing its strength and inspiration from the masses."² The Indian National Congress embodied the demand for the Constituent Assembly, explaining its meaning and significance, in a resolution passed at the Faizpur session on December 28, 1936. The resolution stated, "The Congress stands for a genuine democratic State in India where political power has been transferred to the people as a whole and the government is under their effective control. Such a State can only come into existence through a Constituent Assembly elected by adult suffrage and having the power to determine finally the Constitution of the country...."

This demand was subsequently ratified in resolutions passed by the Provincial Legislative Assemblies in which the Congress commanded a majority. When the Congress Ministries resigned in November, 1939, the Working Committee³ reiterated its demand for the Constituent Assembly and asserted that the right of Indians "to frame their Constitution through a Constituent Assembly, is essential in order to remove the taint of imperialism from Britain's policy.... They hold that the Constituent Assembly is the only democratic method of determining the Constitution of a free country, and no one who believed in democracy and freedom can possibly take exception to it. The Working Committee believed too that the Constituent Assembly alone "is the adequate instrument for solving the communal and other difficulties.

Demand conceded. During the next two years the idea of an Indian Constituent Assembly was prominently before the country and its pros and cons were actively discussed. Many were sceptical about its political efficacy. The Liberals were opposed to it as they deemed it an extremely democratic device and the people of India, they thought, were not politically equipped to realise its significance. They favoured and believed in the more aristocratic conference method, which had proved so useful in the British Dominions. The Princes, the Europeans, the landlords, and other vested interests were also opposed to it, as they apprehended their privileged position might disappear. Then, there was the avowed opposition of the Muslim League as they thought that the process of the Constituent Assembly would undermine the special rights and interests of the Muslims. After the Lahore resolution on Pakistan in 1940, the Muslim League changed its stand. The League adopted a favourable attitude towards the idea of the Constituent Assembly, but it demanded two separate Constituent Assemblies, one for Pakistan and the other for Hindustan. The Constituent Assembly, for framing the Constitution, thus, became the demand of the Congress and the Muslim League both, though the former demanded a single Constituent Assembly and the latter demanded two separate Constituent Assemblies, one for 'Hindu India' and the other for 'Muslim India.'

The demand for the Constituent Assembly was accepted by the British Government for the first time in March, 1942, when Sir Stafford Cripps brought to India His Majesty's Government's proposals for reforms. The Cripps proposals were rejected, but they had one redeeming feature, namely, that the right of Indians to frame their own Constitution through a Constituent Assembly was accepted. This was reiterated in March 15, 1946 statement of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, while recognising India's right to independence, said, "Is it any wonder that today India claims as a nation of 400 million people that has twice sent her sons to die for freedom that she should herself have freedom to decide her own destiny? What form of government is to replace the present regime is for India to decide, but our desire is to set up forthwith the machinery for making that decision."

The making of the Constitution. As already said, the elections to the Constituent Assembly were held, under the Cabinet Mission Plan, in July 1946. Out of 210 general seats the Congress won 199 and the Muslim League captured 73 seats out of a total of 78 Muslim seats. It was a galaxy of top-ranking leaders of the Congress and the Muslim League, veteran statesmen, seasoned administrators, eminent jurists, in fact, people drawn from all walks of life and all parts of the country. The Constituent Assembly was scheduled to meet on December 9, 1946, but the Muslim League boycotted its deliberations, although the December 6 statement of His Majesty's Government had accepted the League's interpretation of the grouping classes of the Cabinet Mission Plan. The League demanded two Constituent Assemblies. Then came the February 1947 statement of His Majesty's Government and the Mountbatten Plan of June 1947, which brought about the partition and the setting up a separate Constituent Assembly for Pakistan.

The representatives of the States of Baroda, Bikaner, Udaipur, Jaipur, Jodhpur, Rewa and Patiala entered the Constituent Assembly of India in April 1947. Rulers of other States, except Jammu and Kashmir and Hyderabad, had nominated their representatives and they participated in the deliberations of the Constituent Assembly. The representatives of Jammu and Kashmir and Hyderabad took their seats after the accession of these States to India in October, 1947 and November, 1948 respectively.

In the first session of the Constituent Assembly Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru moved the Objectives Resolution and described it as a solemn pledge to the people "which they would redeem in the Constitution they would frame." The fundamental propositions laid down in the Resolution, Pandit Nehru said, were not controversial. No body challenged them in India "and no body ought to challenge them, and if anybody does challenge, well, we accept that challenge and we hold on to our position." These utterances were greeted with wild enthusiasm. Thus, the foundations of the Constitutional structure was laid by the Objectives Resolution. It read:

"(1) This Constituent Assembly declares its firm and solemn resolve to proclaim India as an Independent Sovereign Republic and to draw up for her future governance a Constitution"

(4) Wherein all power and authority of the Sovereign Independent India, its constituent parts and organs of government, are derived from the people; and

(5) Wherein shall be guaranteed and secured to all the people of India justice, social, economic and political; equality of status, of opportunity, and before the law; freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith, worship, vocation, association and action, subject to law and public morality; and

(6) Wherein adequate safeguards shall be provided for minorities, backward and tribal areas, and depressed and other backward classes; and

(7) Whereby shall be maintained the integrity of the territory of the Republic and its sovereign rights on land, sea, and air according to justice and the law of civilised nations; and

(8) This ancient land attains its rightful and honoured place in the world and makes its full and willing contribution to the promotion of world peace and the welfare of mankind."

The Objectives Resolution was adopted on January 22, 1947. It sought to set forth fundamental objectives which were to guide the deliberations of the Assembly. Its main ingredients were:

- (1) that India is to be an independent sovereign Republic;
- (2) that it is to be a democratic Union with equal level of self-government in all the constituent parts. "There cannot be", as Nehru emphasised, "different standards of freedom as between the peoples of the states and the people outside the states."⁵
- (3) that all power and authority of the Union Government and Governments of the constituent parts is derived from the people;
- (4) that the Constitution must strive to obtain and guarantee to the people justice based upon social, economic and political equality, equality of opportunity and equality before the law;
- (5) that there should be freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith, worship, vocation, association and action, subject to law and public morality;
- (6) that the Constitution should provide just rights for minorities, backward and tribal areas, and depressed and other backward classes so that they may be equal participants in and recipients of social, economic and political justice; and
- (7) to frame a Constitution which should secure for India a due place in the comity of nations and to contribute to the promotion of world peace and the welfare of mankind.

The bricks and mortars of the constitutional structure were provided by the Report of the Union Powers Committee, the Provincial Constitution Committee, the Advisory Committee on Minorities, the Fundamental Rights Committee, Committees on Chief Commissioners, and Financial Relations between the Union and States, the Advisory Committee on Tribal Areas, and the ad hoc Committee on the Supreme Court. The final shape and form were given by the Drafting Committee consisting of seven members with Dr. B.R. Ambedkar as Chairman.⁶ While presenting the Draft Constitution to the President of the Constituent Assembly, Dr. Ambedkar observed, "The Drafting Committee was of course expected to follow the decisions taken by the Constituent Assembly, or by the various Committees appointed by the Constituent Assembly. This the Drafting Committee has endeavoured to do as far as possible. There were, however, some matters in respect of which the Drafting Committee felt it necessary to suggest some changes.⁷ There was one important change in the Draft from the Objectives Resolution which provided, "wherein the said territories... shall possess and retain the status of autonomous units, together with residuary powers...." The Draft, on the recommendations of the Union Powers Committee, proposed that the residuary powers should vest in the Union (except as regards the Indian States). The original idea of autonomous units of the Union of India was substituted by that of a strong centre and it was essentially necessitated by the partition of the country.⁸

The Drafting Committee was appointed by the resolution of the Constituent Assembly on August 29, 1947, and it submitted its Report on February 21, 1948. The Draft Constitution was presented to the Constituent Assembly on November 4, 1948, for consideration, thus, providing a sufficiently long opportunity to the public, the press and the Provincial Legislatures to discuss it and focus public opinion. Its first reading comprised general discussion which commenced on November 4 and continued till November 9. Then, began the second reading or consideration of the clauses of the Draft and it continued from November 15, 1948 to October 17, 1949. As many as 7,635 amendments were tabled out of which 2,473 were actually moved and discussed. The Assembly again sat on November 14, 1949, for the third reading of the Draft and it concluded on November 26. On this date the Constitution received the signatures of the President of the Constituent Assembly and it was declared passed.

The final session of the Constituent Assembly was held on January 24, 1950. It unanimously elected Dr. Rajendra Prasad the first President of the Republic of India under the new Constitution which came into force on January 26, 1950. This date was specifically chosen for the inauguration of the Indian Republic, as it was on January 26, 1930 that the Indian National Congress had passed the historic resolution at its Lahore session to win independence. Since then this resolution was repeated every year at public meetings all over the country till India became independent in 1947. It was, therefore, deemed apt and reverential to synchronise the inauguration of the Republic of India with the "Independence Day" celebrations on January 26, 1950.

Task of the Constitution-makers. The task of the Constitution-makers was tremendous and arduous. The problems they had to tackle were many and really difficult to resolve. They had to devise a Constitution for 400 million people in no way homogeneous and alike. There were scores of communities speaking different languages, professing different faiths, practising different customs, following different traditions and emphasising different cultures. The demand of the Muslim League for the division of the country on religious basis, culminating ultimately in slicing of territories in the West and in the East, had completely changed the pattern of the political set up contemplated for the country. The first task of the Constitution-makers was to adequately provide for the integrity of the country in the presence of a foreign State within the very compound of India.

Then, there was the baffling problem of the Indian States. The declaration of lapse of paramountcy on the transfer of power had created an intriguing situation. The States were left free "to enter into a federal relationship with the successor Government or Governments or failing this, enter into particular political arrangement with it or them."⁹ Interpreted in terms of law, the Memorandum prepared by the Cabinet Mission on 'States, Treaties and Paramountcy' and endorsed by the Mountbatten Plan, left any Prince or combination of Princes free to declare his or their independence and even to enter into negotiations¹⁰ "with any foreign power and thus become islands of independent territory within the country." In fact, some Princes had begun to flirt with foreign States and declared their independence.¹¹ The unity of what had been left as India after the partition was so vital that the "Government of India could not view with equanimity any trifling with it."¹² Professor Coupland had very correctly remarked, "India could live if its Muslim limbs in the north-west and north-east were amputated but could it live without its heart?" The foremost concern of the new Government of India was to conserve the heart of India and the heart of India was the Princely States. The makers of the Constitution had to devise means to fit the States into the constitutional structure of India as viable and sizeable units with democratised institutions. Indian independence, as the White Paper on Indian States said, would have no meaning if the people of the States did not have the same political, social and economic freedoms as those enjoyed by the people of the Provinces.

Provisions had also to be made for the backward people and areas, like tribes and tribal areas.¹³ The task of the Constitution-makers was, therefore, stupendous. They had to forge unity out of the diversities, natural and artificial. The Constituent Assembly succeeded admirably in framing a Constitution which covered all these difficult and diverse problems confronting the country.¹⁴

Sources of the Constitution. The framers of the Constitution had drawn widely and wisely upon the mature experience of advanced democratic countries. The Draft of the Constitution was prepared "after ransacking all the known Constitutions of the world." Its authors had also with them the Government of India Act, 1935 and it constituted the basis of the working Constitution. The new Constitution derived in great from the Act itself. Professor Srinivasan says, "Both in language and substance it is a close copy of the Act of 1935 and its description as a palimpsest of that Act is not incorrect."¹⁵ This may be an exaggeration, yet quite a major portion of the new Constitution owes origin to that Act, subject to the modifications necessitated by the new conditions and in the light of the experience gained by the working of the Act.

The ideological portion, namely, the Fundamental Rights, was inspired by the Constitution of the United States of America "coloured by the provisions of the later Constitutions, such as that of Eire." The federal form, as the authors of the Draft Constitution themselves explained, was primarily based upon the Canadian model and the Drafting Committee preferred "to follow the language of the preamble to the British North American Act", though there are sprinklings of Australian touches as well. The Parliamentary system of Government is the British heritage and it was adopted both for the centre and the units of the Union.

SALIENT FEATURES OF THE CONSTITUTION

Longest and ponderous Constitution. The Constitution as it emerged from the Constituent Assembly consisted of 395 Articles and Eight Schedules. It has been amended twenty-two times during the last nineteen years. The Ninth Schedule was added by the Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951. No other Constitution in the world is so long and detailed, even ponderous, as the 1950 Constitution of India. H.V. Kamath humorously said in the Constituent Assembly,¹⁶ "The emblem and the crest that we have selected for our Assembly is an elephant. It is perhaps in consonance with that that our Constitution is the bulkiest that the world has produced."

Many factors are responsible for it. The first was the overshadowing influence of the Government of India Act, 1935. It was the lengthiest Statute ever enacted by the British Parliament for the governance of India. This Act served the basis for the new Constitution. The Constitution makers borrowed profusely from the working Constitution and in many cases entire sections from the Act were transferred to the new Constitution. Dr. Ambedkar, Chairman of the Drafting Committee, admitted in the Constituent Assembly that "the Draft Constitution has reproduced a good part of the provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935.... There is nothing to be ashamed of in borrowing. It involves no plagiarism. No body holds any patent rights in the fundamental ideas of a Constitution. What I am sorry about it is that the provisions taken from the Government of India Act, 1935, relate mostly to the details of administration. I agree that administrative details should have no place in the Constitution. I wish that the Drafting Committee could see its way to avoid their inclusion in the Constitution. But this is to be said on the necessity which justifies their inclusion...."¹⁷ Whatever be the justification for their inclusion, it served to add to the enormity to the size of the Constitution of India.

Then, the task of the Constitution-makers was pre-conditioned by inescapable factors of the previous regime and politico-economic set up of the vast sub-continent. Highly divergent elements had to be welded together and widely differing units from each other were to be brought together in an organic unification. These differences created difficulties in the legislative and administrative set up and the Constitution originally provided for four distinct types of units—Part A, Part B, Part C and Part D States of the First Schedule—on a different constitutional level. Moreover, the unity of what was left as India after the partition was so vital a necessity for the political strength, full economic development, and the cultural expression of the Indian people that the Constitution-makers followed the precedent of Canada and prescribed in the federal polity they established a full-dressed Constitution for the States comprising the Indian Union. The Constitution also elaborately deals with the complicated problem of relations between the Union and the States as well as inter-State co-ordination and adjudication of disputes relating to water of inter-State rivers or river valleys. The problems relating to public services, special classes, like Anglo-Indians, scheduled castes and scheduled tribes, required, in the opinion of the Constituent Assembly, special constitutional enactments and they were, accordingly, provided for. Similarly, the question relating to official language and regional languages has been specifically dealt with in the Constitution. With the re-organization of the States, in 1956, was introduced a hitherto unknown institution into the Constitution, the scheme of Regional Committees in the States of Andhra Pradesh and the Punjab.

"The centrifugal character of political forces," says Morris Jones, "is the oldest and newest feature of the Indian public life."¹⁸ The makers of the Constitution were not oblivious of the centrifugal forces that had worked in India since the dawn of her history. They had witnessed themselves the partition of the country, its aftermath and they could anticipate the future. Dr. Rajendra Prasad gave a matter of fact analysis in his observations to the Constituent Assembly on November 26, 1949. He said, "India today needs nothing more than a set of honest men who will have the interest of the country before them. There is a fissiparous tendency arising out of various elements in our life. We have communal differences, caste differences, language differences and so forth". The Constitution, accordingly, goes into greater details regarding the distribution of powers between the Union and the States and allows the Centre to function effectively whenever any grave threat, internal or external, appears or is likely to appear threatening the unity and security of India. Referring to this important aspect of the Indian Constitution, Dr. Rajendra Prasad observed, "The Constitution has gone into great details regarding the distribution of powers and functions between the Union and the States in all aspects of their administrative and other activities. I do not wish to pass any judgment on this criticism and can only say that we cannot be too cautious about our future, particularly when we remember the history of the country extending over many centuries."¹⁹

The Constitution embodies an elaborate list of Fundamental Rights as also the Directive Principles of the State Policy. Some of these rights are unknown to other Constitutions and their inclusion was necessitated by the peculiar conditions and circumstances prevailing in India. The Authors of the Constitution also thought it desirable to deal with the organization, jurisdiction, functions and powers of the Union Judiciary as well as Judiciary of the States even at their lower levels.

Finally, the makers of the Constitution sought to incorporate the accumulated wisdom and experience of the working of all other countries which merited their consideration. "Thus it was, that an elaborate Bill of Rights was engrafted upon a Parliamentary system of government and a federal system was supplemented by provisions for centralisation of power whenever national interests demanded the strength of a unitary system."²⁰ It also codified the judicial decisions made in other countries in order to minimise the possibilities of references to the courts and judicial interpretation.

The Constitution of a country cannot be divorced from the facts of history. It is, therefore, not surprising that the Constitution-makers would have produced quite a comprehensive document which at places entered into comparatively detailed provisions. The predominance of the lawyer-element in the making of the Constitution might have been another contributory factor. But as Dr. Wheare said, "In the long process by which the Government of India Act of 1935 was framed, people in Britain learned much of the difficulties of making a Constitution of India, and any one who followed the discussions of these years, in which Indians and British alike strove to devise a good government for India will be slow to criticise the work which the Indian Constituent Assembly has done. It has been a tremendous task and to have produced any Constitution at all which can command so wide a measure of agreement is a great achievement."²¹

A Sovereign Democratic Republic. The Preamble to the Constitution declares India to be a sovereign democratic Republic. It means India is a sovereign State subject to no other authority either in her internal affairs or external relations and transactions. Its power is absolute within its own sphere. The Indian Independence Act, 1947, had continued the constitutional relationship of the Crown of Britain and the Dominion of India by providing that the Governor-General of India would be appointed by the King and he represented His Majesty for the purposes of the Government of the Dominion. The India Constitution brought to an end this constitutional relationship and with its inauguration India became completely independent and sovereign as from January 26, 1950. The Objectives Resolution of the Constituent Assembly contained the words "Independent and Sovereign." Later on the word "Independent" was dropped "simply to avoid tautology."

India is a democratic Republic. Two principles flow from the concept of democracy. The first is that India is governed by her people, that is, the representatives of the people elected by them on a universal franchise and this principle is the foundation of the system of government the Constitution establishes both at the Centre and in the States. Secondly, democracy implies the maintenance and preservation of the rights of man. The Indian Constitution contains an elaborate list of individual rights as also provision for their adequate protection by means of constitutional remedies.

It has been argued that the word "Democratic" used before the word "Republic" is redundant. But really it is not so, for democracy does not involve the existence of a republican form of government. It may be obtainable under a hereditary monarchy as well, as in Britain. A republican government, according to Madison, "derives its power directly or indirectly from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure, for a limited period or during good behaviour."²² The President of India is indirectly elected by the representatives of the people for a period of five years. The expression "democratic republic", therefore, does not only emphasise the elective principle governing the Head of the State, but it also provides the means for the realization for all citizens of India justice, liberty, equality and fraternity, the four pillars of democracy. In other words, the Preamble establishes in form as well as in substance a government of the people, for the people and by the people. Sirdar D.K. Sen characterises the Indian Constitution as pseudo-republican and he assigns three reasons to support his conclusion.²³ First, the term "republic" is not a term of constitutional law and has no definite content or meaning. Second, the term appears only in the Preamble to the Constitution and is not to be found anywhere in any of its operative provisions. Third, under the Indian Constitution, the term does not signify anything more than that the Head of the Indian Republic does not hold a hereditary office. But these conclusions seem to be far fetching the issue. Justice M. Hidayatullah has aptly said that the "Preamble resembles the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America, but is really more than a declaration. It is the soul of our Constitution and lays down the pattern of our political society which it states is Sovereign Democratic Republic. It contains a solemn resolve which nothing but a revolution can alter."²⁴

India's Commonwealth Membership and her Sovereign status. India's membership of the Commonwealth of Nations was agreed to at the Prime Ministers' Conference which met in London in 1949. This decision was embodied in the Declaration of the Conference released on April 27, 1949, and was ratified by the Constituent Assembly of India²⁵ on a resolution moved by Prime Minister Nehru. The resolution read, "This Assembly do hereby ratify the Declaration agreed to by the Prime Minister of India on the continued membership of India in the Commonwealth of Nations as set out in the official statement issued at the conclusion of the Conference of the Commonwealth Prime Ministers in London on April 27, 1949." The Declaration stated, "The Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan and Ceylon whose countries are united as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations and owe a common allegiance to the Crown which is also the symbol of their free association have considered the impending constitutional changes in India. The Government of India have informed the other Governments of the Commonwealth of the intention of the Indian people that under the new Constitution which is to be adopted, India shall become a sovereign Republic. The Government of India have however declared and affirmed India's desire to continue her full membership of the Commonwealth of Nations and her acceptance of the King as the symbol of free association of its independent member nations and as such, the Head of the Commonwealth. . . . Accordingly, the Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Pakistan and Ceylon hereby declare that they remain united as free and equal members of the Commonwealth of Nations freely co-operating in the pursuit of peace, liberty and progress."

The King, thus, assumed a triple personality; in addition to being the King of Britain, His Majesty was also the King of each of the Dominions, and the Head of the Commonwealth. The Royal Titles Act was, accordingly, changed and Queen Elizabeth II today is styled as "Queen of the United Kingdom and of her realms and territories, Head of the Commonwealth." India accepted the latter aspect only. Prime Minister Nehru said in the Constituent Assembly, "In this Declaration, nothing very much is said about the position of the King except that he will be a symbol. It has been made perfectly clear—it was made perfectly clear—that the King has no function at all. He has a certain status. The Commonwealth as such is not a body, if I may say so; it has no organization through which to function and the King also can have no functions."

There was a spade of criticism on India's membership of the Commonwealth. It was argued that acceptance of the King as Head of the Commonwealth was incompatible with the Republican status and sovereign character of India. Some regarded the Commonwealth membership as a great betrayal and "the greatest mistake committed by the Congress Party after the partition of India." This accusation has since been repeated so often. The Communist Party had been severe in its unceasing attack. A resolution was moved in the Rajya Sabha on December 7, 1956 urging India's withdrawal from the Commonwealth. The Election Manifesto of the Hindu Mahasabha declared in 1957, that "there was no other alternative for a self-respecting nation but to sever its incongruous connection with the Commonwealth."

The Commonwealth Agreement of April 1949, was really an instrument of compromises. It was a kind of improvised political device intended to reconcile two apparently inconsistent factors, namely, India's decision to adopt a republican form of government and, at the same time, her desire to continue her membership of the Commonwealth. Whatever be the advantages which flow from India's remaining in the Commonwealth and accepting the King or Queen as a symbol of free association, it cannot be denied that it is a constitutional anomaly. The position of the King or Queen as the Head of the Commonwealth of which India is a member and the Republican status of India appear irreconcilable and even contradictory. One may agree with M. Ramaswamy that the King's Headship of the Commonwealth of Nations "is only courtesy arrangement devoid of any constitutional significance, yet the constitutional pinch is there. Robert G. Menzies, Leader of the Opposition in Australia, remarked on April 28, 1949, "how a nation can become a Republic by abolishing allegiance to the Crown and at the same time retain membership of a united Commonwealth which is and must be basically a Crown Commonwealth is a complete mystery."

Menzies' appraisal of the Commonwealth Agreement is, however, not correct. India cannot be accepted in status at par with the Dominion countries, as Canada and Australia. India does not bear allegiance to the Crown. The King or Queen is recognised as the symbol of the free association of the members of the Commonwealth. The status of India differs de jure from the status of the Dominion members of the Commonwealth both from the point of view of the allegiance, as well as subordination to the Government and Parliament of the United Kingdom. Gledhill elaborates²⁶ this point and says, "Though the Statute of Westminster generally releases Dominion Legislatures from subordination to the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and though the possibility of the United Kingdom Parliament deliberately passing an Act affecting a Dominion is too remote for serious consideration, the question might arise as to the validity of an Act, passed by the United Kingdom Parliament, which inadvertently conflicted with the Statute of Westminster; it would seem that a court in the United Kingdom would be obliged to hold that, as the United Kingdom Parliament was omniscient, the later Act must prevail. Such a situation could not arise with regard to India, her legislatures are subordinate only to the Constitution."

The Commonwealth Agreement has no legal significance. It is extra-constitutional. "It is an agreement by free will", as Nehru said, "to be terminated by free will." It has not even the formality which normally accompanies treaties, he further added. By remaining within the Commonwealth, India has the right to be represented at the Commonwealth Conferences, and the right to be consulted and kept informed on Commonwealth matters. Decisions at Commonwealth Conferences are not binding on her against her will. No treaty with a foreign power, and no declaration of war by a member of the Commonwealth is binding on India without her express consent. In the course of a broadcast talk from New Delhi, on May 10, 1949, the Prime Minister emphasised this point and declared, "We took pledge long ago to achieve Purna Swaraj (complete independence). We have achieved it. Does a nation lose its independence by an alliance with another country? Alliance normally means mutual commitments. The free association of sovereign Commonwealth nations does not involve such commitments. Its very strength lies in its flexibility and its complete freedom. It is well known that it is open to any member nation to go out of the Commonwealth if it so chooses." Continuing the Prime Minister declared, "I wish to say that nothing has been done in secret and that no commitments of any kind limiting our sovereignty or our external or internal policy have been made, whether in the political or economic or military spheres. Our foreign policy has often been declared by me to be one of working for peace and friendship with all countries and of avoiding alignments with power blocs. That remains the keystone of our policy still. . . . I am convinced that the Sovereign Indian Republic, freely associating herself with other countries of the Commonwealth, will be completely free to follow this policy, perhaps in an even greater measure and with greater influence than before." The same opinion was reiterated by the Prime Minister at a Press Conference held at Ottawa on October 24, 1949.

26. The British Commonwealth: The Development of its Laws and Constitution; The Republic of India, Vol. VI, pp. 14-15.

With regard to India's acceptance of the King or Queen as Head of the Commonwealth, it may be emphasised that the King is only accepted as the symbol of the free association of the independent nations of the Commonwealth and it is only in this capacity as such a symbol that he is accepted as Head of the Commonwealth. The King is not the King of India, as he was the King of India when she became a Dominion in 1947, and had not declared herself a Sovereign Republic. The growth of republicanism within the Commonwealth has obvious implications for the Crown. Although the Queen is the acknowledged Head of the Commonwealth but she no longer has any function within a republic, such as she has within one of her Dominions. When the Queen is in Canada, she leaves, as Mr. Mackenzie King said, "one home for another"; it is her own territory. But when she is in a republic, even one within her Commonwealth, she would, in law, be in a foreign territory. The Prime Minister of India unequivocally clarified the position of the monarch in relation to India in his broadcast talk to the nation on May 10, 1949. "It must be remarked," he said, "that the Commonwealth is not Super-State in any sense of the term. We have agreed to consider the King as the symbolic head of this free association. But the King has no function attached to that status in the Commonwealth. So far as the Constitution of India is concerned, the King has no place and we shall owe no allegiance to him." This is precisely what the Prime Minister said in the Constituent Assembly on May 16, 1949.

Sardar Patel, too, expressed exactly the same opinion in the course of his address to a Press Conference, held at New Delhi on April 28, 1949. Sardar Patel maintained, "India's status of a sovereign, independent Republic is, by no means, affected, because there is no question of allegiance to His Majesty the King who will merely remain a symbol of our free association as he would be of other members...." When he was asked by one of the correspondents what the functions of the King would be as the Head of the Commonwealth, Sardar Patel replied, "So far as his functions are concerned, they are hardly any. But he gets a status." It is, therefore, wrong to assume that by accepting the Commonwealth Agreement India continues to be a part of the British Empire or that she still retains the status of a Dominion. To be a member of the Commonwealth of Nations and to accept the King as the symbol of free association of the independent nations and as such the Head of Commonwealth is not derogatory to India's independence and sovereignty. India's membership of the Commonwealth, therefore, is not independence minus something, but actually independence, plus something." It is in the words of Queen Elizabeth co-operation between the Commonwealth countries. Intervening in the debate on the Communist resolution in the Rajya Sabha urging India's withdrawal from the Commonwealth, Prime Minister Nehru said that it had been the privilege and policy of India "to be a bridge between countries and not to break bridges that already exist." India, he added, did not want to break her links, nor does she desire now, with the outside world. In fact, she wanted and still wants to strengthen and develop them.

Really, the Commonwealth is not a relationship between India and Britain. It is a relationship between India and 27 other countries of the world, of which Britain is only one. Britain is no longer the leader of the Commonwealth, though it is true she remains important because of her size and historical role. Nehru saw the great possibilities of a multi-racial Commonwealth, the value of a meeting place of nations. It is an international organization of States, complimentary to the United Nations, in which Britain has no more say than any other member country. President Nyerere of Tanzania has recently demonstrated the new nature of the Commonwealth. In 1965 he broke off diplomatic relations with Britain because he disagreed with her Rhodesia policy. But he did not take Tanzania out of the Commonwealth. That country continued to play her role in the Commonwealth affairs and indeed useful suggestions about the way the Commonwealth should develop were made by Tanzania while she was out of relations with Britain. The fact that Tanzania had quarrel with Britain did not in President Nyerere's eyes provide a reason for cutting the Commonwealth relationship with 26 other countries. There is, therefore, no justification for India to withdraw from the Commonwealth solely because of the poor state of relations between India and Britain. An Indian withdrawal would tear the heart out of the Commonwealth. India commands a unique position, the largest nation of the Commonwealth widely respected in East and West and in the non-aligned countries.

"We the people of India." The Preamble to the Constitution begins with the words, "we the people of India, having solemnly resolved to constitute India into a Sovereign Democratic Republic" and ends with the words, "In our Constituent Assembly this twenty-sixth day of November, 1949, do hereby adopt, enact and give to ourselves this Constitution." The Constitution originates from the people of India and is promulgated in the name of the people. Though, there is, in the Constitution, no independent Article, as it is in the Constitution of Eire,²⁷ declaring that all powers are derived from the people, or vesting the sovereignty of the reserved powers in the people, as in the United States,²⁸ yet the Preamble emphasises the ultimate sovereignty of the people and that the Constitution itself is founded on the authority of the people. The people, are, thus, the source of all authority and all power lies with them. In Gopalan v. State of Madras Mr. Justice Sastri observed, "There can be no doubt that the people of India in exercise of their sovereign will as expressed in the Preamble, adopted the democratic ideal which assures to the citizen the dignity of the individual and other cherished human values as a means to the full evolution and expression of his personality, and in delegating to the Legislature, the Executive and the Judiciary their respective powers in the Constitution, reserved to themselves certain fundamental rights...."

As the Constitution is given by the people of India in their aggregate capacity, and not created by the States forming parts of the Union or by the people of several States, no State or group of States can either put an end to the Constitution or secede from the Union created by it. The Supreme Court of the United States in the famous case McCulloch v. Maryland held the same view, although the American Constitution was actually born out of the agreement between several independent States; and as it emerged out of the Philadelphia convention it was subject to the ratification of nine States. The Constitution of India was not subject to the ratification of the States; the States themselves being the creation of the Constitution. The sovereignty of the people is, therefore, complete in all respects.

A Welfare State. The Constitution of India seeks to establish a Welfare State where there should be justice, social, economic and political; liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship, equality of status and opportunity. It strives to promote fraternity among all citizens assuring the dignity of the individual and unity of the nation.

Democracy requires not only equality, but also justice. The essence of justice is the attainment of happiness and good of all as distinguished from the happiness and good of individuals or even of the majority of them. But justice in this sense cannot be secured unless there is equality of status and opportunity. Equality of status and opportunity cannot be obtained unless all sections of the people are equally in a position and circumstances to benefit therefrom. Indian Constitution not only prohibits discrimination on grounds of birth, religion, caste or creed, but also adequately provides for the promotion of the interests of the backward classes.²⁹ It seeks to remove all inequities created by inequalities in the possession of wealth and opportunity, race, caste and religion by providing just and human conditions of work,³⁰ maternity relief, leisure and cultural opportunity to every individual,³¹ prevention of exploitation in labour and industry, free education for all,³² etc. The ideal of economic justice, the Constitution promises to secure by directing the State policy towards equality of reward for equal work,³³ by the distribution of ownership and control of the material resources of the community so as to subserve the common good,³⁴ and operation of the economic system in such a way that it does not result in the concentration of wealth and means of production to the common detriment.³⁵

But all these ideals can be realised only when there prevails fraternity. Fraternity here means that "All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reasons and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood."³⁶ It is this spirit of brotherhood which the Constitution aims to inculcate among the citizens of India by removing untouchability and thereby restoring the dignity of the individual, and by abolishing all communal, sectional or local or provincial feelings in order to achieve the unity of the nation.

Indian Constitution, in brief, aims to establish the Welfare or the Social Service State. It gives to the individual citizen various rights and liberties all directed towards his welfare. At the same time, the Constitution gives to the State powers to impose restraints on the exercise and enjoyment of individual rights and liberties, if they are to the common detriment. But it does not mean that in the name of the common interest, the State may impose restraints and curtail liberties which may dwarf the individual's personality or hamper his development. The element of the "dignity of the individual" which the Preamble introduces implies, as K.M. Munshi observed, "that the Constitution was an instrument not only of ensuring material betterment and maintaining a democratic set-up but that it recognised that the personality of every individual is sacred."³⁷ Once the spirit of the dignity of the individual becomes dominant amongst the citizens of the State the unity of the nation is achieved. It is the way to national integration and at the same time the repudiation of the Hegelian theory that the State is a metaphysical entity, "independent of and overshadowing the individual, whose only end was to secure its own existence."

Single Citizenship. The Constitution of India, unlike the Constitution of the United States³⁸ but like the Canadian and Burmese Constitutions,³⁹ introduces single citizenship, that is, there is no dual or double citizenship, one of the whole country and the other of a particular State in which the individual is inhabitant. Accordingly, the Constitution confers on all citizens similar rights and they are subject to identical obligations. Article 14 declares that the State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or equal protection of the laws within the territory of India. Article 15 (1) provides that the State shall not discriminate against any citizen on the grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them. Article 16 guarantees the equality of opportunity for citizens in matters relating to employment or appointment to any office under the State and further lays down that no citizen only on the grounds of religion, race, caste, descent, place of birth, residence, or any of them, be ineligible for, or discriminate against in respect of any employment or office under the State.

But the domicile rules in existence in different States⁴⁰ defeat the advantages of single citizenships. They not only discriminate between citizen and citizen, but "also engender provincialism and parochialism which tend to disrupt the unity of the nation."⁴¹ The States Reorganiza-

38. In the United States there is double citizenship, one as a citizen of the United States and the other as citizen of a particular State. Dual citizenship in the United States was the result of reconciling national unity with "State rights."

39. Section 10 of the Burmese Constitution says, "There shall be but one citizenship throughout the Union, that is to say, there shall be no citizenship of the Unit as distinct from the citizenship of the Union."

40. Domicile requirements vary from State to State and require three to fifteen years' continuous residence as also fulfilment of other conditions as well, which are often very cumbersome.

tion Commission reported that a number of States confined entry to their services to permanent residents of their States and there were variety of definitions of "permanent residence." The Commission, accordingly, recommended that Parliament should pass an early legislation removing all such restrictions. Now States have done with domicile tests in the matter of recruitment to services. But domicile rules are not confined to recruitment to public services alone. They also regulate the awards of contracts and rights in respect of fisheries, ferries, toll-bridges, forests, excise shops, and even govern the admission of students to professional colleges, engineering and medical particularly. The Bombay High Court in The State vs. N.M. Dayme,⁴² has declared the domicile rules unconstitutional. It is, however, of urgent importance that Parliament should enact legislation under Article 35 of the Constitution removing all barriers imposed by the existing rules of domicile, which are taking ugly shape after the General Elections of 1967.

✓ Fundamental Rights. Prior to the inauguration of the Constitution in 1950, no Parliamentary Act had contained a list of rights. In fact, the British statesmen had always spurned the idea of their inclusion in any constitutional enactment. Both the Simon Commission and the Joint Parliamentary Committee asserted that the declaration of such rights would impose embarrassing restrictions on the powers of the legislature and as such render many laws liable to be declared invalid. The Government of India Act of 1935, in spite of its democratic pretensions, did not contain any affirmation of fundamental rights.

The Indian National Congress throughout its struggle for independence had strived for the inclusion of the Rights of Man in India's Constitution as such rights were the sine qua non of a democratic system of government. When India won her freedom and became independent, it was the foremost concern of the Constitution-makers to enshrine them in the Constitution. There was another important reason too. A declaration of rights was deemed essential for assuring the minorities that their rights would be constitutionally guaranteed and that they should not entertain any apprehension of the alleged despotism and arbitrariness of, what Jinnah used to describe, "the brute majority." The inclusion of a Chapter on Fundamental Rights in the Constitution was, therefore, in accordance with the trend of political thought,⁴³ and in fulfilment of the pledges the Indian National Congress had given to the people as a whole, 42. 1958, A.I.R., Bombay 68.

43. In Moti Lal v. Uttar Pradesh Government, Mr. Justice Sapru observed, "The history of the evolution of thought on the rights of man takes us back into the seventeenth century or even earlier. From the time of Tom Paine's Rights of man, Jefferson's declaration of rights, Rousseau and the French Revolution, schools of thoughts had existed down to H.G. Wells and the U.N.O. discussions on human rights, which assert that man has certain natural and inalienable rights and that it is the function of the State in order that human liberty might be preserved, and human personality developed, to give recognition and free play to those rights. Fundamental Rights were practically to be found in every Constitution that came into existence after World War No. I. After World War No. II, as a result of the discussions on the proposed United Nations Charter of Human Rights, they have become even more visibly important in most Constitutions framed after the war."

and assurances to the minorities in particular. A resolution passed at the Madras session of the Indian National Congress in 1927 categorically laid down that the basis of the future Constitution of India must be a declaration of Fundamental Rights.

The Fundamental Rights guaranteed in the Constitution are comprehensive, although they do not exhaust the list of rights. There are some rights which do not find place in the Constitution, but are upheld by various existing laws and regulations. The rights are justiciable and constitutional remedies are provided for their enforcement.⁴⁴ The Constitution, thus, makes judiciary the guardian of rights and liberties of the people. But none of the Fundamental Rights is absolute. The Constitution itself provides necessary limitations,⁴⁵ and rights can be suspended under conditions of grave emergency threatening security of the State.⁴⁶

Directive Principles of State Policy. A distinctive feature of the Constitution is that it contains Directive Principles of State Policy. The Fundamental Rights aim to protect the individual's life, liberty and property. They are negative in character and prohibit the State not to do various things. The Directive Principles of State Policy, on the other hand, are positive in character and direct the State to apply these principles in making laws. They are not enforceable by any court. All the same, these principles have been declared to be "fundamental in the governance of the country."⁴⁷

The idea of incorporating Directive Principles of State Policy has been taken from the Constitution of Eire, 1937,⁴⁸ and the provisions in Part IV of the Indian Constitution are intended to lay down in general terms the social and economic order which the Fathers of the Constitution desired to be established in India. The Preamble to the Constitution sets forth the ideals which the Constitution intends to secure for the people of India and the Directive Principles of State Policy form a detailed exposition of those ideals. According to the Directive Principles, the Welfare State should be promoted; ownership and control of the material resources of the community should be so distributed as to subserve best the common good; wealth and means of production should not be concentrated to the common detriment; the right to equal pay for equal work, to a decent standard of life, to education as well as to public assistance should be secured; the interests of backward classes should be promoted; and the uniform civil code should be enacted. The Fundamental Rights and the Directive Principles of State Policy are the rock foundations on which the social structure rests.

Parliamentary System of Government. There are three characteristics of Parliamentary Government understood in the British Constitution. First, the King is the Constitutional Head of the State. The real functionaries are the ministers who belong to the majority party in Parliament and depend upon its pleasure for their tenure in office. Secondly, the popular Chamber has a democratic basis and it is the hub of parliamentary democracy. Finally, the ultimate legislative and financial control is vested in the popular House. The President of India, like the British King, is a constitutional Head. The Constitution provides that there shall be a Council of Ministers to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions; the Prime Minister shall be appointed by the President and other ministers shall be appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister; the salaries and allowances of ministers shall be such as Parliament may from time to time by law determine, and the Council of Ministers shall be collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha (House of the People). The real executive is, thus, the Council of Ministers, chosen from Parliament and which can remain in office so long as it retains the confidence of the Lok Sabha (House of the People). The President, like the British King, takes no part in politics and, accordingly, he does not participate in the confidential discussions in which his Ministers decide the advice they shall give him. In other words, the President does not preside over cabinet meetings. Though all executive action is taken in the name of the President, orders and regulations so made and executed are required to be authenticated in such manner as may be specified in rules made by the President, yet the President does nothing by doing everything, because there is a Council of Ministers to aid and advise him and this body is collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha (House of the People). The President performs no official act on his own initiative and owns responsibility for none.

Parliament of India consists of two Houses, the Lok Sabha (House of the People) and the Rajya Sabha (Council of States). The Lok Sabha is a popular chamber directly elected by voters in the States. The election is on the basis of adult franchise. The Rajya Sabha is also popular in composition, but it is indirectly elected. Twelve of its members are nominated by the President to represent letters, art, science and social services.

A bill other than a money bill normally requires approval of both the Houses separately. In case of deadlock, the President may summon a joint sitting of both the Houses for the purpose of deliberating and voting on the bill. A money bill originates in the Lok Sabha and is finally approved by it. The Rajya Sabha simply makes recommendations for its amendments and if the Lok Sabha does not accept them, the bill is deemed to have been passed by Parliament in the form in which it is approved by the Lok Sabha. The budget is laid before both the Houses, but it is the exclusive right of the Lok Sabha to grant demands. The Rajya Sabha simply discusses them.

All the three characteristics, which constitute the sine qua non of a parliamentary democracy, the Indian Constitution establishes. It was deliberately chosen by the framers of the Constitution, for the people were familiar with its working, and being simple in its operation it was intelligible to them and, accordingly, suited to Indian condition.⁴⁹ Parliamentary system of Government is both responsive and responsible. "There is," as Dr. Ambedkar put it in his speech in the Constituent Assembly, "both a daily and periodic assessment of the responsibility of government."⁵⁰ The daily assessment is done by members of Parliament through questions thereby eliciting information from the Government on issues of public importance, resolutions are moved to impress upon the Government the need for pursuing a particular programme, and by criticising the policy of the Government through debates on addresses and adjournment motions. The Government can be ousted from office through a vote of no confidence if the majority of members support such a motion. Periodic assessment is done by the electorate at the general elections. The Government, is, thus, always under scrutiny and it cannot act arbitrarily.

A Federal Polity. The Indian Constitution is federal in form, although Article I of the Constitution describes it as a Union of States. In fact, nowhere in the Constitution the word federation has been used and the omission seems to be deliberate. In his introductory note to the President of the Constituent Assembly while submitting the Draft Constitution, Dr. Ambedkar wrote, "It will be noticed that the Committee has used the term Union instead of Federation. Nothing much turns on the name, but the Committee has preferred to follow the language of the preamble to the British North America Act, 1867, and considered that there are advantages in describing India as a Union although its Constitution may be federal in character."⁵¹ But it may be noted that Canada has been described as a Dominion and not as a Union in the Preamble to the British North America Act. It reads, "whereas the Provinces of Canada, Novo Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion, under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom." There is no Article in the British North America Act containing the word 'union', except that it has been used in one of the chapter-heading of the Act. It would have been more correct if the Drafting Committee had said that it had followed to some extent the language of the Union of the South Africa Act, 1909 for describing India as a Union of States, and the Union of South Africa makes no pretence of being a federation.

The expression Union of States is, according to Dr. Ambedkar, deliberate. Moving the Draft Constitution for the consideration of the Constituent Assembly on November 4, 1938, he explained the significance of the use of the expression "union" instead of the expression "Federation". Ambedkar said, "It is true that South Africa which is a unitary state is described as a Union. But Canada which is a Federation is also called a Union. Thus the description of India as Union, though its Constitution is federal, does no violence to usage. But what is important is that the use of the word 'Union' is deliberate. I do not know why the word 'Union' was used in the Canadian Constitution. But I can tell you why the Drafting Committee has used it. The Drafting Committee wanted to make it clear that though India was to be a federation, the federation was not the result of an agreement by the States to join in a federation, and that the federation not being the result of an agreement, no state has the right to secede from it. The federation is a Union because it is indestructible. Though the country and the people may be divided into different states for convenience of administration, the country is one integral whole, its people a single people living under a single imperium derived from a single source. The Americans had to wage a civil war to establish that the States have no right of secession and that their federation was indestructible. The Drafting Committee thought that it was better to make it clear at the outset rather than to leave it to speculation or to dispute.⁵² Both these points, that the Indian federation is not the result of agreement by its units, and that the component units have no freedom to secede from it, need clarification as they have a bearing on the nature of the Indian federation.

There are two principal methods of forming a federation and the way in which it comes about depends upon the pre-existing conditions of the federating units. The first is the result of voluntary agreement between the hitherto sovereign and independent States. The States desiring to federate agree to transfer certain subjects of common concern and interest to the newly created national government and retain the rest for themselves. In this way, the federating units, while forming a union, preserve their independent existence. The distribution of subjects between the Central Government and the federating units has a constitutional guarantee and neither of them can encroach upon or destroy the other. All alterations desired to be made must be made by the consent and free participation of both the parts. No unilateral action is valid.⁵³

Before the Government of India Act, 1935, came into operation, India was a unitary form of government. The Provincial Governments were virtually the agents of the Government at Delhi, deriving authority from the latter. By the Act of 1935, the British Parliament set up a federal system in the same manner as it had done in the case of Canada. The Provinces were created compulsory units of the federation and their powers were defined by the Act. But it was a matter of choice for the Indian States to join the federation or not, and the scope of the federal jurisdiction in the States was to depend solely upon the transfer of subjects made by their respective Rulers through their Instruments of Accession. Thus, the Provinces and the States were to differ regarding the extent of their powers in the federation, although once having acceded to the federation no State could secede therefrom or diminish the subjects. They could, of course, be enlarged.

53. In Attorney General for Commonwealth v. Colonial Sugar Refining Company (1914), the Privy Council observed: "Their Lordships are called upon to interpret the legislative compact between the Commonwealth and States, and they have to determine on the language of the Statute (the Commonwealth of the Australia Constitution Act) what rights of legislation the federating colonies declared to be reserved to themselves. It is clear that any change in the existing distribution of powers has been safeguarded in such a fashion that...the Commonwealth Parliament could not legislate so as to alter that distribution on its own motion."

The federal part of the Government of India Act, 1935 had to be suspended, and it was only the Provincial Part which came into force. The Provinces derived their authority from the Crown and they were autonomous within the sphere assigned to them. But there was really no autonomy for the Provinces and the Central Government continued to exercise its control and direction through various devices like the Governor's special responsibilities and his obligations to exercise the individual judgment and direction in many matters. When India became independent, the Government of India Act, 1935 provided a working machine in the Provinces, and as Dr. Jennings remarks, "It was not possible to start afresh when Provinces became States."⁵⁴

The Constitution-makers of Independent India were in no doubt that the country could not be efficiently and satisfactorily governed as a unitary State. With the integration of the Indian States the formation of federation had become a fait accompli. It also helped the removal of the anomalies of the Government of India Act, 1935, and consequently the original idea of a variety of Constitutions was abandoned, and entries in the legislative lists which differentiated between States and Provinces were dropped. Sardar Patel could rightly claim that unlike the Government of India Act, 1935, the Indian Constitution did not form "an alliance between democracies and dynasties, but a ready union of the Indian people built upon the basic concept of the sovereign people." He further maintained that the Constitution "removes all barriers between the people of the States and the people of the Provinces and achieves for the first time the objective of a strong democratic India built on the true foundation of a co-operative enterprise on the part of the people of the Provinces and States alike."⁵⁵ The Butler Committee in 1929 had said that "politically there are....two Indias....The problem of statesmanship is to hold the two together."⁵⁶ The makers of new India firmly believed that India was politically one and their "holding together" was simply not sufficient. They strove to weld them together and integration of the States in the Indian Union was accomplished without any major pain.

The Union of India is not the result of a compact between the component units. It is the creation of the people of India assembled in the Constituent Assembly and the Constitution so framed by them determines the distribution of powers between the Union Government and the Governments of the States. The States have no rights and powers anterior to or apart from powers given by the Constitution. The Union is irrevocable, except when the people themselves determine otherwise. The States have no right to secede therefrom and put an end to the Union. Dr. Ambedkar gave a matter of fact analysis when he said that the Constitution of the Union and the States is "a single frame from which neither can get out and within which they must work."⁵⁷

According to Dr. Jennings the Government of India Act, 1935, was "a bad precedent for the Constitution of an independent country,"⁵⁸ for the scheme of federation under the new Constitution is fundamentally the same as under the Act of 1935. With minor differences, as Prof. Srinivasan says, "the distribution of the legislative authority between the Union and the States and the status accorded to the latter in the two Constitutions are identically the same."⁵⁹ The Act of 1935 enumerated the legislative powers in three Lists: The Federal List, the Provincial List, and the Concurrent List. In the Concurrent List both the Federal and Provincial Legislatures could legislate with the proviso that in case of a conflict between the federal law and the provincial law the former would prevail over the latter. The residuary power was vested in the Governor-General who could authorise in his discretion the Federal or the Provincial Legislatures to legislate on a subject not enumerated in any of the three Lists. The 1950 Constitution of India closely followed the scheme of the Government of India Act, 1935, except that under the new Constitution subjects not mentioned in any List, including taxes, fall within the exclusive competence of the Union Legislature. Thus, an elaborate scheme of federalism was there, "and hence it was quite natural and also tempting for the makers of the Indian Constitution to accept the essentials of the 1935 Act in their plan of allocation of powers."⁶⁰ Moreover, the problems confronting India had not substantially changed with the independence of the country from the alien rule.

The question whether the Indian Constitution could be classified as federal exercised the minds of its framers. Many members of the Constituent Assembly, who had faith in the inherent rights of the constituent units of the federation, expressed their disappointment with the scheme of federal polity the Constitution would set up in India. The Constitution, they contended, actually provided for a formidable unitary Constitution and reduced the States to the position of "glorified district boards." For instance, P.T. Chacko said, that what the Constitution would establish was "in form a federation...in substance a unitary Constitution."⁶¹ B.M. Gupta expressed the opinion that India would be "not a federal State but a decentralised unitary State."⁶² Shymanandan Sahay maintained that the Constitution had created "a kind of fedro-unitary system leaning heavily towards a unitary system" and the units would be "perpetual wards of the Centre."⁶³ Mahboob Ali Beg and N.G. Ranga apprehended that the emphasis on centralization and the easy means with which the Central Government could convert the federal system into a unitary one might lead to totalitarianism and to the absolute negation of democracy.⁶⁴

Since then the controversy on the nature of the Indian Constitution has remained unabated. After the Fourth General Elections in 1967, with some nine Non-Congress Governments in the States and a depleted Congress majority in Parliament, the controversy has assumed an added importance, especially when a member of the Drafting Committee of the Constituent Assembly spells out an opinion against what he himself had drafted. K.M. Munshi observed in 1953, "India is not a federation but a Union", and that "The Centre is not a federal Government but a Government of plenary powers and social purpose."⁶⁵ Those in office also do not lag behind. H.V. Pataskar, till recently the Governor of Madhya Pradesh, in the course of his address to the State unit of the Indian Council of World Affairs, said, "To my mind our Constitution is not a federal one."⁶⁶ Dr. Wheare, the renowned authority on Federalism, says, "on the whole it seems evident that the Constituent Assembly intends the Union to be more centralised than was proposed by the Act of 1935, although in that case also there were methods of intervention permitted to the Centre in the affairs of the provinces which reminded one more of the Canadian conception of federation than of the United States one. The new Constitution goes further still. It establishes, indeed, a system of government which is at most quasi-federal, almost devolutionary in character, a unitary state with subsidiary federal features rather than a federal State with subsidiary unitary features."⁶⁷ Sir Ivor Jennings and Allan Gledhill generally agree with K.C. Wheare. In his Paper, submitted to the All-India Political Science Conference, entitled: Is India a Federation?,⁶⁸ Dr. Krishna P. Mukherjee maintains, "I have come to take the view that whatever might have been the position at the drafting stage or previous to that stage, the Constitution that emerged out of the august deliberations of the Constituent Assembly of India in January 1950, is a definitely unfederal or unitary Constitution." Professor Morris-Jones, in an article in the Sunday Times, wrote that as a result of the Fourth General Elections "India comes of age as a federal State in the full sense of the term and with all the difficulties that it entails. As the United States has learnt many times, this makes problems but also marks a step towards a pattern of politics that really fits her diversity."⁶⁹ The Chief Minister of Madras, C.N. Annadurai said that under the present Constitution, powers which strictly came under the States' sphere were being slowly taken over by the Centre. "We must correct this and leave those powers to the States." Annadurai maintained that an ideal centre in a federation was one which left sufficient powers to the States and kept just enough power to itself to protect the integrity and sovereignty of the country.⁷⁰ On the other hand, M.C. Setalvad would give to the Centre yet more powers "to legislate in matters of education, food production and distribution which are vital needs."⁷¹

What does federalism really mean? Federalism, in its traditional analysis, is a system of government in which powers are divided and distributed between a central government and governments of the units which make the State. It postulates dual polity, national and regional governments, within the framework of the same State. Both sets of government exercise powers granted by the Constitution and both are supreme within the spheres assigned to them by the Constitution. The central or national government is given jurisdiction over matters which are of common concern and interest of the people as a whole, and affairs of local and particular interest to people of different regions are left to the regional governments. The national government which presides over the general interests concerning the nation as a whole does not carry any precedence or superiority in status over the regional governments. Federalism, thus, presupposes equality of status between two sets of government, the one is not simply the creation of the other. Both enjoy a juridical status and corporate personality.

But equality of status does not mean absolute equality of powers. This is an impossible task and not within the reach of practical politics. The distribution of powers between the centre and the units depends upon various factors and every country has its own peculiar problems. Federalism is, after all, a device for securing the unity of the newly created State and a good government to effectively ensure its integrity. The distribution of powers is made with that end in view. The balance of powers is, accordingly, differently tilted in different federations. In some, it is in favour of the centre and in others it is in favour of the units. It does not deprive the Constitution of its federal character "so long as the one is not rendered thereby helplessly dependent on the other for its existence or proper functioning."⁷² By the federal principle, observes Prof. Wheare, "I mean the method of dividing powers so that the general and regional governments are each, within a sphere, co-ordinate and independent."⁷³ The mode of distribution of powers between the central and regional governments is, therefore, not the essential characteristic of federalism.

An important implication of the co-ordinate and independent character of both sets of government is the dual citizenship with separate privileges and immunities. In the United States of America it is so.⁷⁴ It also implies a double set of officials and a double system of courts manned by separate personnel.

Another very important characteristic of federalism is the supremacy of the Constitution. It has three implications: (1) the Constitution must necessarily be written and all causes of disputes arising between one set of government or the other or between the regional governments themselves must be settled with reference to its provisions; (2) the Constitution must be rigid and it should not be alterable either by the central legislature or by regional legislatures under the ordinary law-making procedure; and (3) sovereignty rests with the State and it is exercised by the Constitution amending authority. Every legislative body, central or regional, is a subordinate law-making body.

Lastly, it is the pre-requisite of a federal polity that there should be an independent judicial tribunal to finally interpret the Constitution and to maintain its sanctity. This court should act as a guardian of the Constitution and see that it is not violated by either set of the government or any authority thereof. The successful working of the federal principle depends upon the vigilance of the federal judiciary, independent of both central and regional governments, so that none of the governments disturbs the balance between the centrifugal and centripetal forces. Happy balancing between these two forces is the essence of federalism. Prof. Dicey described this aspect of federalism in his own characteristic way, a desire for union rather than unity, that is, the desire for national unity and the determination of each individual unit to maintain its identity and independence. Oneness of the State with separateness of the units is, therefore, the formula of federalism and there can be no other authority than an independent and impartial judiciary to protect it.

No federal Constitution can claim to completely fulfil all the requirements of the federal principle. Not even the Constitution of the United States which sets the model for others. Prof. Wheare is, accordingly, constrained to remark that "It seems essential to define the federal principle rigidly, but to apply the term 'federal Constitution' more widely."⁷⁵ If a Constitution predominantly fulfils the federal principle so as to overshadow the unitary features, it may still be regarded as a federal Constitution. Accepting this basis of classifying the Constitutions, Dr. A.K. Ghosal concludes that "Federal Constitutions may be arranged in an ascending scale of conformity to the rigid federal principle beginning with Australia at the one end of the pole where the degree of conformity is the highest, to Canada at the other where it is the lowest. India's place in the scale would be by the side of Canada rather than Australia."⁷⁶

But a simple classification of the Constitution is not sufficient for our purposes. There can be a good deal of difference in the law and practice of the Constitution, thus, signifying the difference between a federal Constitution and a federal government. Prof. Wheare places particular emphasis on this difference and says, "A country may have a federal Constitution, but in practice it may work that Constitution in such a way that its government is not federal. Or a country with a non-federal Constitution may work it in such a way that it provides the example of a federal government."⁷⁷ Take the example of the Canadian Constitution. Lord Haldane held that the North America Act, 1867, was not federal.⁷⁸ The Fathers of the Canadian Constitution were not wedded to the narrow ideas of federalism and the Act of 1867, contains many exceptions to the federal principle. Prof. Wheare characterises it as "a quasi-federal Constitution." But in actual practice the unitary elements in Canada have either now become obsolete or are being so worked as not to compromise with the federal principle. If Canada, therefore, as Prof. Wheare concludes, "has not a federal Constitution, it has a federal government." United States, Switzerland and Australia, on the other hand, have federal Constitutions as well as federal governments though the process of centralization in all these countries is assuming alarming proportions.

What has been said above is a lengthy description of the theory and practice of federalism. But such a description is necessary to decide the controversy at issue, viz., the nature of the Indian Constitution.

The Union of India, according to Dr. Krishna Mukherjee, does not satisfy any one of the conditions enshrined in the federal principle. "On the contrary," he observes, "our Constitution in the four opening articles makes it amply clear that it is a unitary Constitution, and whatever categorisation of the units of the Union and distribution of powers between the union and the units are there, they are for the sake of administrative convenience, and whenever they create administrative inconvenience they may be constitutionally withdrawn, abolished or changed."⁷⁹ Article 3 of the Constitution provides: Parliament may by law:

- (a) form a new State by separation of territory from any State or by uniting two or more States or parts of States or by uniting any territory to a part of any State;
- (b) increase the area of any State;
- (c) diminish the area of any State;
- (d) alter the boundaries of any State;
- (e) alter the name of any State."

The same Article provides that no bill proposing such a legislation can be introduced in Parliament, except on the recommendation of the President. Further, where the name⁸⁰ or boundaries of any State are proposed to be altered the views of the Legislature of the State or each of the State "both with respect to the proposal to introduce the Bill and with respect to the provision thereof have been ascertained by the President." It means that the views of the State Legislature are to be ascertained on two points: (i) as regards the proposal to introduce the Bill; and (ii) as regards the provisions of the Bill. But the President only ascertains the views of the States involved and it is for him to accept those views or not. He is not required to obtain the consent of the States concerned or their Legislatures.⁸¹

81. According to the Constitution of the United States, Article IV, section 3(1): "But no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of the two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of Article 4 further provides that laws made under Article 2 of the Constitution, regarding Parliament's right to admit into the Union, or establish new States, on such terms and conditions as it thinks fit, and Article 3, as referred to above, shall not "be deemed to be an amendment of this Constitution for the purposes of Article 368." It means that Parliament can be means of an ordinary process of legislation, subject to ascertaining the views of the Legislatures of the States concerned, can redraw the map of India; amendment of the Constitution is not required.

All this means that by a unilateral action, Parliament can make or unmake the territories of the States of the Union of India, change the shape of the existing States or abolish some and substitute other units for them. The Andhra State Act, 1953, created the new State of Andhra by the partition of Madras, and the States Reorganization Act, 1956 really changed the map of India. The bifurcation of the State of Bombay into Maharashtra and Gujarat States on May 1, 1960, meant again redrawing the map of India. It has been followed by the creation of the State of Nagaland and division of the Punjab into two States, Punjab and Haryana with parts of the territory going to Himachal, and Chandigarh formed into a Union Territory. The Constitution (Twenty-second Amendment) Act, 1969 paves the way for the creation of an autonomous Hill State within the State of Assam. In the United States alterations in the boundaries of the States cannot be made against their consent. In Australia alterations in the boundaries of a State can only be made with the consent of the Legislatures of the State concerned, and approval of the majority of the electors of the State voting upon the question at a referendum. Equal participation of the States in matters relating to the alterations in their boundaries is the essence of the federal principle. Leaving aside all political considerations and exigencies and speaking strictly in terms of law, Articles 3 and 4 of the Indian Constitution are not only the negation of the federal principle, but the very definition of a unitary Constitution.

The Constitution of India conforms to the traditional criteria of a federal Constitution in so far as it is written; provides for the distribution of powers between the two sets of government within the framework of the same State; their sphere of jurisdiction is clearly demarcated and if a change is desired to be made in the division of powers, it needs a constitutional amendment at least one half of the States agreeing thereto.⁸² Thus, neither the central government nor the regional governments have the power of altering unilaterally the provisions of the Constitution relating to the scheme of distribution of powers between the two thereby upsetting the balance of power. Then, there is the Supreme Court, the guardian of the Constitution, with powers to interpret it and preserve its the States concerned as well as of the Congress." According to Articles 123, 124, of the Constitution of Australia, the Commonwealth Parliament is empowered to create new States from an existing State or from parts of existing States with the consent of the Legislatures of States concerned. But the boundaries of the States can be altered only by the consent of the Legislature of the State concerned and approval of the majority of the electors of the State voting upon the question.

sanctity and supremacy. The right of judicial review vested in the Supreme Court empowers it to intervene in case any of the two governments oversteps its jurisdiction or increases its powers upsetting the federal principle. Refuting the criticism of over-centralization in the Constituent Assembly, Dr. Ambedkar said, "A serious complaint is made on the ground that there is too much centralization and that the States have been reduced to municipalities. It is clear that this view is not only an exaggeration but is also founded on a misunderstanding of what exactly the Constitution contrives to do. As to the relations between the Centre and the States it is necessary to bear in mind the fundamental principle on which it rests. The basic principle of federalism is that the legislative and executive authority is partitioned between the Centre and the States not by any law made by the Centre but by the Constitution itself. This is what the Constitution does. The States in our Constitution are in no way dependent upon the Centre for their legislative and executive authority. The Centre and the states are co-equal in this matter.... The chief mark of federalism lies in the partition of the legislative and executive authority between the Centre and Units by the Constitution. This is the principle embodied in the Constitution. There can be no mistake about it. It is therefore wrong to say that the States have been placed under the Centre...."⁸³

Ambedkar gave a matter of fact analysis of a federal polity, but he did not present a true picture of the Indian Constitution. He did not state clearly the Centre's constitutional powers to abridge the autonomy of the States in normal times and to abrogate it, if it so desired, during emergencies. The fact of the matter is that the Constitution sets up a highly centralised structure of government and some of its provisions are reminiscent of a unitary system. And the Constitution-makers deliberately did it. "All Constitutions," as Ivor Jennings remarks, "are the heirs of the past as well as testators of the future." The Founding Fathers were fully conscious of the centrifugal forces which have worked in India since the dawn of her history. The partition of the country was a rude shock to India's solidarity, and the partition did not mean the complete disappearance of separatist trends so systematically encouraged and nursed by the foreign rulers for cementing their stronghold in the country. It left behind a trail of sinister forces of communalism, casteism and regionalism. At the time of Constitution-making the disruptive forces were already revealing symptoms of revival.⁸⁴ It was, therefore, the anxiety of the Constitution framers to give to the centre enough powers to meet effectively the menace of disruptive forces. While defending the emergency powers vested in the President, T.T. Krishnamachari observed, "...these emergency provisions have got to be tolerated as a necessary evil, and without these provisions it is well nigh possible that all our efforts to frame a Constitution may ultimately be jeopardized...."⁸⁵

The emphasis of the Constitution-makers on unity rather than union can thus well be appreciated. The Constitution-makers in no country can divorce their Constitution from the realities of the past and anxieties of the future. They make a Constitution which can serve the best interests of the people and forges them into a strong and unified nation. They would not, accordingly, hesitate even if they have to deviate from the principles of Political Science or Constitutional Law. Dr. Mukherjee, however, does not agree with this point of view. Adhering to the traditional principles which distinguish a federal from a unitary system of government, he says that "there can be no leniency on the part of the Constitution classifier who is a scientist. For him either the difference between federal and unitary Constitutions does or does not exist. If it does not exist, no time need be wasted on idle discussions. If, however, it does exist it is necessary for him to find out the principle of distinction, in this case the federal principle and if that principle has been violated in any Constitution (no matter for what political, social and economic reasons) that Constitution is not federal." The main provisions of the Constitution which violate the traditional principles of federalism are:

(1) The Constitution of India, like that of Canada, prescribes the Constitutions of the Union as well as those of the States, except that of Jammu and Kashmir. It means that the principle of equality of status between the States is destroyed, no matter with what considerations. Even the original division of States in Part A and Part B was incongruous in a federal polity. Part B States did not enjoy the same status as Part A States. Now defunct Article 371 placed Part B States under the general control of the Union Government and they were required to comply with such particular instructions as were issued to them from time to time. It is matter of common knowledge that the control and direction of the Union Government over Part B States was reminiscent of the proverbial control and direction of the Political Department of the Government of India before Independence.

(2) The States in India, unlike the Provinces of Canada, have no independent power of constitutional amendment. Even a decision to abolish the Legislative Council (upper chamber) in a State requires an Act of Parliament.⁸⁶ Most other changes can be effected only by constitutional amendment and in the process of constitutional amendment there is unequal association of the central and regional governments. Except for a few specified matters,⁸⁷ when ratification of at least one half of the State Legislatures is required, the Constitution can be amended by Parliament, when the Bill has passed in either House by a majority of the total membership of the House, and by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members of that House present and voting.

(3) One of the essential principles of federalism on which the Constitution of the United States is based is the equality of the component States irrespective of their size or population. In fact, it was a great compromise which smoothened the way to union and it was reflected in equal representation of the States in the Senate. Article V of the American Constitution provides "that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." This principle of equal representation in the Upper House of the Federal Legislature is followed in the Constitutions of Switzerland and Australia as well. In Canada while the original Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Brunswick, have 24 members each in the Senate, the number of members from other Provinces, subsequently added to the Union, varies down to a minimum of four. Under the Indian Constitution there is no equality of representation of the States in the Rajya Sabha (Council of States). The number of members from several States varies from 1 to 34.⁸⁸ Then, the Rajya Sabha, unlike the Senates of the United States, Australia and even Canada, is not exclusively representative of the States. It consists of 12 members nominated by the President, apart from the representatives of the States.⁸⁹ This is a glaring exception to the federal principle.

(4) The concept of dual polity as obtainable in India is also a departure from the federal principle. As a recognition of the 'Sovereignty' of the States or what Prof. Wheare calls "co-ordinate and independent" character of the original governments, the American Constitution made a logical provision for double citizenship, a double set of officials and a double system of courts. The Indian Constitution, like the Canadian Constitution, creates only single citizenship.⁹⁰ Though there are two sets of services, State Services and All-India Services, but there is, like the United States of America, no clear-cut demarcation of administration of State laws and Union laws. The State Services administer the State laws as well as the Union laws, and the Union Services while serving in a State likewise administer State laws. Article 258 provides delegation of functions "in relation to any matter to which the executive power of the Union extends." There are also Articles 256 and 257. Article 256 specially makes it the duty of the State "to ensure compliance with the laws made by Parliament." Article 257 provides that "the executive power of every State shall be so exercised as not to impede or prejudice the executive power of the Union." The Union Government would give the State Governments such directions as may appear to the Government of India necessary for that purpose. It is further provided that the power of the Union shall also extend to the giving of directions to a State as to the construction and maintenance of means of communication declared to be of national or military importance, the declaring authority being the Union Government. Finally, there is no separate system of federal courts for the administration of federal laws. As in Canada, the same system of courts in the State administer both the Union and the State laws. The President appoints not only Judges of the Supreme Court, but also Judges of the High Courts. The President can also, under Article 222, transfer a Judge from one High Court to another after consultation with the Chief Justice of India. At the top of the judicial hierarchy is the Supreme Court.

(5) The Union Government is not simply empowered to give directions to the States. Failure to comply with, or give effect to, any directions given by the Government of India in the exercise of its executive powers under any of the provisions of the Constitution would entitle the President to declare "that a situation has arisen in which the government of the State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution,"⁹¹ and, thus, supersede the State government for the time being.⁹² It means bringing the State under the unitary rule of the Union.

(6) The State government is superseded on a report from the Governor of the State. The Governor is appointed by the President by warrant under his hand and seal.⁹³ He is, accordingly, the nominee of the party in power at the Centre. The tenure of office of the Governor is five years and he holds office during the "pleasure of the President."⁹⁴ The implication clearly is that the Governor can be recalled even during his normal term if the Union Government so desires and the President is advised accordingly. It means that the Governor will act primarily as an agent of the Central Government, and as such, he may come into conflict with his duly constituted Ministers. So long as the same Party reigns supreme at the Centre and in the States, the possibilities of a conflict of authority between the Governor and the Ministry are remote. But when the Party or Parties in power in a State is different from the one in power at the Centre, the Governor and the Ministry are sure to pull in opposite directions if the interests of the Centre and the State conflict. The Central Government may use the Governor as their agent for influencing or controlling the policy and measures of the State Government and if the Governor fails to impress the State Ministry with his directions, the Central Government may on his report take over the State Government. No appeal can be made to the electorate before the suspension of the constitutional machinery of the State. The suspension of the constitutional machinery in a State, under Article 356, on the report of the Governor is a violation of the most cherished federal principle of equality of status between the national and regional governments.

(7) Article 365 gives a general power to the Union Government: "where any State has failed to comply with, or to give effect to, any directions given in the exercise of the executive power of the Union under any of the provisions of this Constitution, it shall be lawful for the President to hold that a situation has arisen in which the Government of the State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution." This provision is a paradise for the Union Government, because the Centre may consider non-compliance of a State with any of its directives, given in the exercise of its executive power under any of the provisions of the Constitution, as a breakdown of the constitutional machinery of the State and proclaim an emergency according to Article 356.

(8) That the Governor of a State is not a mere constitutional head can be appreciated from the provisions of Articles 200 and 201, which empower the Governor to withhold assent to a Bill passed by the State Legislature, or reserve it for the consideration of the President. When a Bill is reserved for the consideration of the President, the President shall declare either that he assents to the Bill or that he withholds assent therefrom. Under a Parliamentary system of Government, it is inconceivable that the Ministry, initiating the legislation and anxious to see that it passes through the legislature, itself will advise the Governor to withhold his assent to the Bill or reserve it for the consideration of the President. Prof. Kogekar pertinently asks, "On what ground then except that of the Union Government's discretion, can the Governor stultify the legislature's power."⁹⁵ It should be noted, he further adds, "that the Governor is not confined in his negative action to those matters only which under the constitution require the President's approval, as, for instance, under Article 31(3)."⁹⁶

(9) The scheme of distribution of subjects between the Centre and the Units follows essentially the pattern of the Government of India Act, 1935, which broke away from the traditional system. There are three Lists of subjects, the Union List, the State List and the Concurrent List. The residuary powers rest in Parliament. The total number of subjects given to the Central Government are 97 as compared with 66 given to the States. Concurrent List contains 47 subjects.⁹⁷ Both the Centre and the States have concurrent powers of legislation with regard to matters in the Concurrent List. But if both legislate and if the law made by the State Legislature is repugnant to any provision of law made by Parliament on the same subject, the Union law supersedes the State law. Parliament has also been empowered to legislate on any matter in the State List, if the Rajya Sabha (Council of States) passes a resolution by a two-thirds majority declaring a particular subject or subjects of national importance or interest.⁹⁸ When a Proclamation of Emergency is in operation, Parliament is empowered to make laws for the whole or any part of the territory of India with respect to any subject enumerated in the State List.⁹⁹ When the Legislature of one or more States determine by a resolution that Parliament should legislate on a particular matter on the State List, Parliament can make laws with respect to that particular matter.¹⁰⁰ The State Legislatures of Bombay, Madhya Pradesh, Orissa, Punjab, Uttar Pradesh, Rajasthan, etc., allowed Parliament to levy estate duty on agricultural land situated in those States. Parliament, accordingly, passed the Estate Duty Act, 1953 and it applied to agricultural land situated in those States. Surrender of such powers to Parliament is unconditional and irrevocable. Any Act so passed by Parliament can be amended or repealed by Parliament alone and not by the States to which it is applicable.¹⁰¹ Finally, Article 253 empowers the Union Parliament to pass legislation implementing any treaty, agreement or convention with another country "or any decision made at any international conference, association or other body." This last phrase is remarkably vague, as Jennings remarks, and the Union Parliament can acquire jurisdiction of any subject, as for example, even over university education, "by the simple process of a decision of the inter-university Board of India, which is an international body because it contains representatives of universities in Burma and Ceylon."¹⁰²

(10) The rest is achieved under the emergency powers.¹⁰³ Dr. Ambedkar frankly admitted in the Constituent Assembly that "the Constitution has not been set in a tight mould of federalism." It has been so designed that it should work as a federal system in normal times and as a unitary system in war and other emergencies without the slightest pretence of being a federation. While a Proclamation of emergency is in operation Parliament gets the power to legislate for the whole or any part of the territory of India with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the State List and the Executive power of the Union extends to the giving of directions to any State as to the manner in which the executive authority thereof is to be exercised. In case of financial emergency the directions of the Central Government may include: (a) a provision regarding the reduction of salaries and allowances of all or any class of persons serving in a State, and (b) a provision that Money Bills or other Bills involving financial implications be reserved for the consideration of the President after they are passed by the Legislature of the State.

(11) Then, there is the Election Commission established under Article 324. It is a centralised electoral machinery which is required to superintend, direct and control elections not only to Parliament but also to the State Legislatures. The members of the Commission are appointed by the President. There is also the Comptroller and Auditor-General appointed by the President,¹⁰⁴ who keeps careful vigilance not only over the finances of the Union but also of the States. As Comptroller, he controls the issue of public money, his duty being to satisfy himself that no money is paid out of the exchequer without proper legal authority. As Auditor he audits the accounts and reports annually thereupon.

It will, thus, be clear that the Indian Constitution makes a wide departure from the traditional theory of federalism. Since the Constitution became operative in 1950, the bias has increasingly been towards centralization. Even Ministers of the Central Government have time to time given expression to their feelings decrying the tendency towards the increasing concentration of power, authority and functions and urged the need for decentralization of power to make the democratic process and concept of federalism more concrete and tangible to the common man. M.M. Shah, Union Minister of Industries, in his address to the Harold Laski Institute of Political Science, Ahmedabad, analysed the causes contributing to the process of centralization and maintained that the Centre in India was becoming a steamroller and the States appeared to be in a pitiable position. Shah's conclusion was that in a federal polity "the Centre should only be felt and the States should be seen."¹⁰⁵

T.T. Krishnamachari, one of the architects of the Constitution, and a Minister without Portfolio in 1962, suggested re-examination of the relationship between the Centre and the States and their respective spheres of power. He asserted that, no doubt, the strength and prosperity of the nation depended upon and was derived from the strength of the Federal Government, but "in the achievement of this great result, it cannot be denied that a certain political imbalance creeps in the relationship between the Centre and the States."¹⁰⁶ That imbalance, Krishnamachari added, had occasionally given rise to frictions. If the conflicts did not come to surface it might have been because the same ruling Party functioned at the Centre and in the States, the Governments at both levels pursuing common policy.

The charge of over-centralization making inroads on State authority is the logical consequence of a Single Party Government both at the Centre and in the States for an interrupted period of seventeen years. The Party in power was the Indian National Congress which, according to Morris-Jones, "inherits the traditions of a national movement and reflects these in its rather centralised structure."¹⁰⁷ When one single Party rules the nation, without any electoral shock, for such a long time, it regards itself the custodian of the nation more especially when the Party had strived and won freedom for India from the alien rule. With its centralised structure and command policies it ignored the barriers which a federal polity creates and it treated the State Governments as subordinates. This was precisely the condition before the 1967 General Elections. It is a matter of common knowledge that the Central organization of the Indian National Congress Party determined the policy and its decisions were unquestionably accepted by the Central and State Governments. The Central Parliamentary Board, which consisted of the top leaders of the Congress, including Central Ministers high in the rank of the Party, was the maker and unmaker of State Governments. It even imposed the man of its own choice to assume the leadership of the State Legislature to become the Chief Minister. The Chief Minister did not select his own team to constitute the Council of Ministers. All initiative, thus, flowed from the Central Party organization and the State Governments looked to the Centre for direction. While reviewing the working of the Constitution, the Council of Public Affairs at a symposium at Madras, held that the domination of a single Party had resulted in centralization of policy-direction which negated the feeble principles of federation on which the Constitution was based.¹⁰⁸

And not all Indians had put their implicit faith in federalism.¹⁰⁹ Since the inception of the Union of India some politicians, including those belonging to the Congress Party, Political Scientists and citizens are in favour of scrapping the federal system altogether and replacing it by a unitary government because federalism encourages centrifugal tendencies and generally weakens the country. Unitary government, they urge, will effectively prevent the numerous sectarian, communal and other fissiparous tendencies which plague the country today.¹¹⁰ V.V. Giri, in his capacity as Governor of Mysore, deplored the formation of States on linguistic basis and pleaded for a unitary government.¹¹¹ His preference for the unitary government still remains unabated, although he is the occupant of the exalted office of the President of India,¹¹² and, despite the government of India has strongly rejected such a demand.¹¹³

All discussions of establishing a unitary government have only academic value and India shall remain a federation with a strong Centre. But the existence of a strong Centre is not inconsistent with the theory and practice of federalism. Each country evolves its own pattern of Union-State relations in the light of its historical background and its political, economic and social conditions. In India the balance of power, as said earlier, was deliberately tilted in favour of the Centre to meet the realities of the partition of the country, to reconcile with the scheme of government the legacy of the Provincial Autonomy and the regional loyalties, and to fulfil the hopes for the future. After having enunciated the basic ideals of a Welfare State in the Preamble and the Directive Principles of State Policy, the makers of the Constitution had to arm the Centre with adequate and effective powers in order to realize the cherished ideal.

A.H. Birch has aptly said that a federal government is not limited

Speaking with reference to the Chinese aggression against India, Home Minister of Orissa, Niamani Routray said, 'the people are now prepared to have a unitary form of Government.' He demanded the immediate amendment of the Constitution to curb 'narrow, parochial interests of state, language, religion and caste' and 'if necessary the powers of the states should be curtailed by reducing them to the status of local units.' The Hindustan Times, New Delhi, January 20, 1963, p. 4.

to its own sphere when it passes a good deal of legislation in relation to welfare, and State Governments are not in practice independent of the federal government when they derive a considerable proportion of their revenues from federal payments.¹¹⁴ This is precisely the position in America, Canada and Switzerland and it is equally applicable in India too. The execution of welfare projects cannot succeed in isolated moulds, particularly when a State is constitutionally committed to a welfare ideal. The welfare content of the State can only be achieved through the joint Co-operative efforts of the National and State Governments. In India the co-operation is sought in different ways and the best example in this respect is the Zonal Councils. According to Morris-Jones, Zonal Councils have proved "a most useful device in the development of co-operative federalism." These Councils help to facilitate co-operation between the Centre and the States, and between the States themselves. Economic planning on a unified basis has the effect of centralizing power and direction, no doubt. But the preparation of the plan, defining the stages in the execution of the plan, allocation of resources and fulfilment of targets are decided by mutual consultation and understanding. "The plan," according to V.T. Krishnamachari, "is a joint national enterprise in which the Centre and the States are partners, united in a common purpose and working with agreed policies in different fields of national development."¹¹⁵ Then, there is the technique of conferences evolved to ensure harmony in Union-State relations and inter-level co-operation. These conferences are numerous and for different purposes for the solution of important problems confronting the life of the nation. Some of the conferences are regularly held as the Governors' Conference, the Chief Ministers' Conference, and so many other meetings of the State Ministers. All these Conferences and meetings "seek to provide a forum for discussion of mutual problems and set the stages for the co-operative solution of these problems."¹¹⁶

The dominant spirit of federalism is not competitive, but co-operative exercise of authority by different governments. The traditional theory of federalism is a political anachronism now. Centralization is a universally accepted phenomenon and the concept of 'dual sovereignty' is untenable. David Fallman has correctly observed that the American Supreme Court "has snuffed out the heresy of dual federalism. The Court, by invoking the doctrine of implied powers, has assigned a vast sweep of authority to the Centre. In fact, the centralization is the most significant aspect of the operative machinery not only of American Federalism but also of the Australian, Canadian and Swiss Federalism." What Courts, conventions, practices and usages have achieved in America, Canada, Australia and Switzerland, these have been enshrined in the express constitutional provisions in India.¹¹⁷ Intervening in the debate in the Constituent Assembly on November 8, 1948, Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyer observed that all that the Draft Constitution had done was to take note of the inevitable tendency in every modern federation in the direction of strengthening the federal government and to make suitable provisions for the purpose, instead of leaving it to the Supreme Court, as in the United States, to extend the powers of the Central Government by a process of judicial interpretation.¹¹⁸ Ambedkar maintained that the Draft Constitution had struck a fair balance between the claims of the Centre and the States and the Centre had not been given more powers than were strictly necessary in the context of conditions in the modern world which rendered centralization of power inevitable.¹¹⁹ Perhaps he forgot to say that the makers of the Constitution had to arm the Centre with sufficient power to defend and maintain the Constitution rather than to allow certain forces to wreck it from within. Two Politburo members of the Indian Communist Party (Marxists), Kerala Chief Minister E.M.S. Namboodripad and A.K. Gopalan, declared in a statement that the avowed objective of the Marxists was to promote discontent among the people and prepare them for a class-war. "Our objective", they said, "is to capture power by making the fullest of the constitutional machinery so that we can break the Constitution from within."¹²⁰

What really matters in a federation is whether the Centre and States ordinarily enjoy autonomy within the spheres assigned to them in the Constitution. The Seventh Schedule of the Indian Constitution clearly demarcates the spheres of the Centre and the States and within those spheres both are ordinarily autonomous. The Centre, no doubt, possesses the power to act decisively and expeditiously in the national interests, but this power is used as a medicine and not a daily diet. Constitutional remedies apart, "self-consciousness and self-assertiveness" of the State Governments deter even a strong Centre to intervene without a convincing cause which it may be able to plead at the bar of public opinion. In a democratic set up, with a Parliamentary system of Government, the actions of Government are ever under scrutiny. No government can forget that tomorrow is the day of election. If the Central Government ventures to trespass the limits ordinarily assigned to it, it shall have to pay the penalty at the next elections.

It is often maintained that the sense of "self-consciousness and self-assertiveness" of the State Governments was curbed during the last seventeen years of a single Party rule. This is not entirely correct, although this sense of awareness has considerably increased with the coming into power of the non-Congress Governments in various States. The Congress Chief Ministers had also differed with the Centre, but their differences were confined, by and large, to the inner councils of the Party and were not aired publicly. Sometimes, however, the din of controversy was heard outside, as for instance, when during Lal Bahadur Shastri's tenure of Prime Ministership the Madhya Pradesh Chief Minister, D.P. Mishra, got a decision on a food policy reversed within twenty-four hours. The non-Congress Governments are today more articulate and vocal. The interplay of non-Congress points of view on the Centre's policies and measures can be extremely beneficial if they express their views with restraint, responsibility and spirit of co-operation in the larger interest of the country as a whole. It is in this sense that Morris-Jones expressed the view that after the General Elections of 1967, India had come of age as a federal State in the full sense of the term. It is important to remember that the Centre's authority should not be weakened, for herein lie seeds of disintegration and danger to the unity of the country. Benjamin Schoenfeld has aptly said, "The problems which Indian federalism forces stem from the need of the people to have a government armed with sufficient powers, needed to solve modern economic problems on the one hand, and to combat the strong sentiments of regionalism found throughout the land."¹²¹

Doubts about the nature of Indian Constitution arise because of our rigid adherence to the traditional theory of federalism which divides authority into two sets of government, central and regional, each within the spheres assigned to them, co-ordinate and independent. But this is irrelevant in the context of modern times and not one of the federal unions, as Gopalaswami Ayyanger pointed out in the Constituent Assembly, "will be found to conform to the actual terms."¹²² A.H. Birch rejects the classical theory of dualistic federalism. He defines federalism as a system of government "in which there is a division of powers between one general, and several regional authorities, each of which, in its own sphere, is co-ordinate with others, and each of which acts directly on the people through its own administrative agencies."¹²³ He eliminates from his definition the term "independent" within its own sphere, although he retains their co-ordinate character. But Vile says that the equality of federal and State Governments "may be defensible in legal terms, but it is very difficult to interpret in terms of power and influence."¹²⁴ The leadership of the Central Government in a federation is unchallengeable and all federal unions have moved alike in this direction. According to Vile federalism is "a system of government in which neither level of government is wholly dependent on the other nor wholly independent of the other."¹²⁵ Their functions cannot be divided into water-tight compartments. Independence and interdependence is, thus, the hall-mark of the federal State. The Central and regional governments act independently within the spheres assigned to them, but when vital interests of the State intervene the decisions of the former prevail, though they concern matters outside its jurisdiction. It does not, however, mean that the Central Government should become so dominant that it should always dictate its decisions. Dictation is not the essence of interdependence. Since Central and regional authorities, in a federal system of government, "are linked in a mutually interdependent political relationship; in this system a balance is maintained such that neither level of government becomes dominant to the extent that it can dictate the decision of the other, but each can influence, bargain with and persuade the other." The Constitution of India fulfils all these elements of federalism which is co-operative.¹²⁶ The present distribution of powers does not reduce the States to the level of municipalities. Sri Ram Sharma has aptly said, "India is a shining example of co-operative federalism."¹²⁷

Amendment of the Constitution and its Rigidity. Supremacy of the Constitution, inter alia, involves its rigidity. The rigidity of the Constitution depends upon two factors. First, it depends on the degree of difficulty in the amending process, that is, a procedure other than the one required in the ordinary legislation is needed for a constitution amendment. Secondly, it depends upon the content of the Constitution. "What makes the Indian Constitution so rigid," says Jennings, "is that in addition to a somewhat complicated process of amendment, it is so detailed and covers so vast a field of law that the problem of constitutional validity must often arise."¹²⁸ Really speaking the method of amendment is not so complicated. It is simple, though far from easy. All the same, it has sought to avoid the difficult processes laid down by the American and Australian Constitutions. The Indian Constitution may be characterised as partly flexible and partly rigid. Prof. Whearè says that the Indian Constitution strikes a good balance between extreme rigidity and too much flexibility. The reason for introducing the element of flexibility in the Constitution was explained by Jawaharlal Nehru. He said, "While we want this Constitution to be as solid and permanent as we can make it, there is no permanence in constitutions. There should be a certain flexibility. If you make anything rigid and permanent, you stop the nation's growth, the growth of a living, vital, organic people.... In any event, we could not make this Constitution so rigid that it cannot be adapted to changing conditions. When the world is in turmoil and we are passing through a very swift period of transitions, what we may do today may not be wholly applicable tomorrow." Jennings, too, expresses the same opinion. He says that a Constitution has to work not only in the environment in which it was drafted but also centuries later. "It must therefore, be capable of adaptation to new Constitutions as they arise." He, accordingly, suggests that "The golden rule for Constitution-makers, therefore, is never to put in anything that can safely be left out."¹²⁹ Referring to the Indian Constitution, he says, "What the Constituent Assembly has done is to produce a long and complicated document which cannot easily be amended. It is quite obvious that there are clauses which do not need to be constitutionally protected. An example taken at random is Article 224, which empowers a retired judge to sit in a High Court. Is that a provision of such constitutional importance that it needs to be constitutionally protected, and be incapable of amendment except with the approval of two-thirds of the members of each House sitting and voting in Union Parliament?" But Sir Ivor Jennings completely missed two important points. He completely ignored, as Sardar D.K. Sen observes, "The political and social circumstances prevailing in India as well as the ethos of the Indian people."¹³⁰ Secondly, the mere fact that a Constitution has long and detailed provisions does not necessarily mean that it is a rigid Constitution. Detailed provisions, in fact, render it unnecessary to introduce any constitutional amendment, and also save a great deal of litigation. It is true that Article 224 of the Indian Constitution, to which Sir Ivor Jennings refers, and some other, too, add to the bulk of the Constitution but they do not make it any more rigid. Wyne correctly observed, "The tendency in recent times has been to extend the number and variety of matters which are deemed sufficiently important to warrant provisions which shall be rendered more or less immutable by inclusion in the Constitution."¹³¹ What appears to Sir Ivor Jennings as unnecessary may have been considered extremely important by the Indian Constituent Assembly. There is no such thing as the "golden rule."

But the majority decision rendered by the Supreme Court in Golak Nath and others v. the State of Punjab has certainly introduced rigidity in the Constitution. The Supreme Court declared that in future Parliament cannot abridge Fundamental Rights through the normal procedures of constitutional amendment.

The Indian Constitution prescribes three different methods for amendment of the different provisions of the Constitution:

(1) Some parts of the Constitution can be amended by a simple majority in both Houses of Parliament. It must, however, be pointed out that there are very few provisions which allow alterations by simple majority. By this process new States may be created and the existing States reconstituted,¹³² the qualifications of Indian citizenship may be changed,¹³³ Upper Chambers may be created and abolished in the States,¹³⁴ the provisions for the Administration of Scheduled Areas and Scheduled Tribes may be altered.¹³⁵

But these matters will not be treated as amendments to the Constitution, although they deal with some of the essential provisions of the Constitution.

(2) The amending clause is Article 368. Certain specified subjects, as amendments affecting the method of electing the President, the extent of the executive and legislative powers of the Union or the States, the provisions regarding the Supreme Court and the High Courts, the representation of the States in Parliament, and the method of amending the Constitution¹³⁶ require: (a) a majority of the total membership in each House of Parliament; (b) a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting in each House of Parliament; and (c) ratification by the Legislatures of one half of the States. It is to be noted that in the United States two-thirds majority in Congress of the members present and ratification by three-fourths of the States is required.

133. Article 11.

134. Article 169.

135. Schedule V. Part D.

136. Proviso to Article 368.

(3) The remaining provisions of the Constitution require: (a) a majority of the total membership in each House of Parliament; and (b) a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting in each House of Parliament. The Supreme Court has now decided in Golak Nath and others v. The State of Punjab that Parliament could not amend the Constitution so as to take away or to abridge the Fundamental Rights. It does not, however, mean that the Supreme Court prohibits the amendment of Fundamental Rights. But the Court reserves to itself the power of determining in each specific case whether the amendment in question takes away or abridges the rights.

A few observations may be made regarding the procedure adopted for passing the amendment Bill. The President of the provisional Parliament ruled that a Bill amending the Constitution must be passed by the House, clause by clause, with the required majority for every clause. This view was confirmed by the Supreme Court in Shankar Prasad v. Union of India. The Supreme Court held that the procedure required for amending the Constitution is a legislative procedure and that the rules framed by Parliament under Article 118 relating to its ordinary legislative business shall be followed, so far as applicable, in the matter of an amendment Bill under the provisions of Article 368.

The Indian Constitution, like the Constitution of the United States, does not prescribe any time limit within which State Legislatures¹³⁷ should ratify or reject the amendment referred to them. Closely connected with it is another question. Is it necessary that Bills required to ascertain the will of the States must be submitted to all the States, or is it enough if a Bill is submitted to some of them? A situation did arise in the case of the Third (Amendment) Act. The Constitution was amended before some of the States could consider the provision on the ground that half of the States had signified their approval thereto. The Mysore Legislative Assembly strongly protested against this procedure.

When the procedure adopted in the amendments is similar to ordinary legislation, can the President withhold his assent therefrom? Article 368 does not make any reference to the President's power to do as such. It simply says that, "...it shall be presented to President for his assent and upon such assent being given to the Bill, the Constitution shall stand amended in accordance with the Bill." Article 111 refers to the assent of the President with regard to ordinary Bills. It says, "when a Bill has been passed by the Houses of Parliament, it shall be presented to the President, and the President shall declare either that he assents to the Bill, or that he withholds assent therefrom." When Article 368 does not specifically say anything about his power to withhold assent to an amendment Bill, the President's assent to a Bill duly passed by Parliament as an amendment is only a formality. The question of his withholding assent only arises when the procedure prescribed in Article 368 has not been duly followed.¹³⁸ In the United States constitutional amendments are not presented

137. In the United States ratification is by the States and not by the Legislatures of the States.

138. There are authorities in India who hold that as the constitutional amendment has to be in the form of a Bill subject to rules and regulations to the President and hence the question of vetoing a constitutional amendment in any form does not arise.

Another important fact to be noted in this connection is that the power of initiating an amendment to the Constitution is vested exclusively in the Union Parliament. The States have absolutely no right to propose constitutional amendment, except under Article 169 when the Legislative Assembly of a State may propose for the creation or abolition of the Legislative Council (Vidhan Parishad) of a State. Nor is the right to initiate constitutional amendment conceded to the people. The exclusion of the States in the process of amending the Constitution is the negation of the federal principle and contrary to the practices followed in other federations. The Drafting Committee claimed to have largely followed the model set by the Canadian federation. But even in Canada the Provincial Legislatures have the unfettered power to amend the Provincial Constitution in the ordinary process of legislation, "excepting on one point only, viz., the office of the Lieutenant-Governor."¹³⁹

To sum up, the process of amendment is not easy as it apparently appears to be. To secure a double majority, a majority of the total membership and a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting of each House of Parliament, is not easy to obtain. So long as one single party commanded a comfortable majority both in the States and in Parliament, it was possible to secure the double majority. But now when the Congress majority has been sufficiently reduced in Parliament and in the States and quite a good number of States are being governed by non-Congress Governments consisting of in very many cases seven or eight heterogeneous parliamentary groups, the requisite majorities cannot be obtained and the amending process can hardly be used for altering the Constitution under Article 368. This is the practical outcome of Indian politics. So far as the letter of the law is concerned Indian Constitution is no more rigid than any other federal Constitution; on the contrary it is more flexible than many existing federal Constitutions such as those of the United States, Switzerland and Australia.

Judicial Review. The Constitution establishes a Supreme Court and the doctrine of judicial review is implicit in the Constitution. In a federation, apart from the doctrine of separation of powers, there is a distribution of powers between the two sets of government and this distribution is as binding on the federal authorities as it is on the member States. The federal government cannot ordinarily enter the sphere of jurisdiction relating to the ordinary legislative procedure, the President can withhold assent. Contesting the argument of the Additional Solicitor General, in the writ petitions of I.C. Golak Nath and others challenging the constitutional validity of the Constitution (17th Amendment) Act, 1964, Mr. R.V.S. Mani submitted to the Full Bench of eleven Judges of the Supreme Court, that it was not correct that Article 368 is a code by itself and that the assent of the President was only a formality. The word "assent" in Article 368, he said, must have the same meaning as it has in Article 111 and other Articles. Therefore the President should be assumed to have in Article 368 the power to withhold his assent or to return the Bill amending the Constitution as he can do so in the case of ordinary legislation.

exclusively assigned to the States; nor can the States entrench upon the exclusive competence of the federal Government. In a federation, therefore, it is imperatively necessary that there should be a duly constituted authority to enforce the observance of the constitutional limitations. Moreover, in a federation Constitution is the supreme constitutional law and any executive or legislative act, whether federal or State cannot be operative if it infringes the provisions of the Constitution. It is, accordingly, necessary that there should be an impartial umpire to annul such acts and protect the Constitution. Lastly, all federal Constitutions, except for the Constitutions of Canada and Australia, contain a declaration of rights which protect the liberties and freedoms of the citizens from the encroachments of the governments, both federal and State. An independent judiciary is necessary to enforce the due observance and fulfilment of the fundamental rights.

In the Indian Republic all questions arising under the Constitution or involving its interpretation fall within the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts, subject, however, to the final authority of the Supreme Court. In Nar Singh v. State of U.P. the Supreme Court declared, "This Court has general powers of judicial superintendence over all courts in India and is the ultimate interpreter and custodian of the Constitution. It has a duty to see that its provisions are faithfully observed and, where necessary to expound them." Under Article 131 of the Constitution the Supreme Court has jurisdiction in all disputes in respect of justiciable issues between any two governments. Article 246 which deals with the nature of the division of powers involves the power of judicial review. But Article 13 clearly enacts that every law in force or every future law inconsistent with or in derogation of the Fundamental Rights shall be void. Speaking about the significance of Article 13, Chief Justice Kania observed in Gopalan v. The State of Madras that "The inclusion of Article 13(1) and (2) in the Constitution appears to be a matter of abundant caution. Even in their absence, if any of the Fundamental Rights was abridged by any legislative enactment, the Court has always the power to declare the enactment, to the extent it transgresses the limits, invalid...." The right of judicial review is implicit in Article 32 which guarantees the right to constitutional remedies to all persons in the enjoyment of rights and empowers the Supreme Court and other Courts authorised by Parliament to issue any of the writs known as prerogative writs in Britain.

A Secular State. A secular State is primarily devoted to political order and freedom and pursues all its activities in promoting economic stability and welfare of the people. By a secular State is, thus, meant a system of government which is conducted in "conformity with the needs of the world and on the basis of the fundamentals and methods provided for modern civilization by science or technique." It is not to be guided in the discharge of its functions by the teachings of any particular religious faith or creed practised within the territories of the State, no matter what may be the numerical strength of its followers. A secular State does not allow its resources and prestige to be utilised for the propagation of any particular religion. It allows freedom of religion to all, provided such freedom is exercised subject to law and morality. According to P.B. Gajendragadkar, the former Chief Justice of India, secularism was the pragmatic approach to the problems of society. It was not anti-God or anti-religion. "So long as religions keep themselves within their bounds, it does not seek to interfere with them."¹⁴⁰ The basis of secularism is ethics and dedication to its promotion would be the striving to bring about a society of equality and justice.

The Indian Constitution establishes a purely secular State wherein there would be complete freedom from religious or communal bias. It guarantees to all citizens freedom of faith, worship and conscience, consistent with the security of the State and ethical standards of the society. All citizens are guaranteed enjoyment of equal rights without any distinction of religious belief, caste, creed or sex.

The secular basis of India is a revolutionary departure from the traditional Indian approach to the problem of political obligation. But the facts of history, the circumstances attending the birth of India's national independence, and aspirations of the people to make India strong and united all combined together to make a secular approach to the problems of the State as an indispensable condition.

There is no specific provision in the Constitution which provides against communalism or prohibits political activities by religious groups as such. Presumably the framers of the Constitution did not envisage the emergence of these ugly forces in view of the marked strength of national feeling after the achievement of independence and the bitter experience of partition. Prof. Damle points out that in the Indian context the content of secularism stemmed from the country's concern to bury the two-nation theory that had caused immeasurable communal strife in the sub-continent.¹⁴¹ But communalism and separatism are again the grim realities and both offer a serious challenge to the integrity of the State. The now abandoned secessionist movement of the Dravida Munnetra Kazhagam, the constant cry of Sikh "homeland" by a group of Akalis now headed by Kapur Sigh, and the communal poison emitted by the Jiamate-i-Islami and some other parties of their like in the North shake the indissolubility of the Union and secularism which constitute two of the four fundamentals of the Indian Constitution. If the makers of the Constitution had envisaged the emergence of these ugly forces, they would probably have had made specific and explicit provisions to deal with them vigorously and effectively. It cannot, however, be denied that any challenge to the integrity of the Union and importation of religion into politics are against the spirit of the Constitution.

Adult Suffrage. As a step towards secularism, the Constitution abolishes communal representation and communal electorates. This ensures national solidarity. Another radical feature of the Constitution is the introduction of adult suffrage. "The introduction of adult suffrage", writes Prof. Srinivasan, "without any qualifications of any kind is the boldest step taken by the Constituent Assembly and is an act of faith."¹⁴² Under the Government of India Act, 1935, only 14 per cent of the total population secured franchise, and women constituted just a negligible proportion of the total franchise. Under the new Constitution both men and women enjoy the equal right to vote.

CHAPTER II

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS AND THE DIRECTIVE PRINCIPLES OF STATE POLICY

The importance of Fundamental Rights. "Rights are the groundwork of the State. They are the quality which gives to the exercise of its authority a moral character. And they are natural rights in the sense that they are essential for the good life"; as essential as light and air, food and clothing are necessary for the existence of life. They are rights for which man struggled from the dawn of history against autocrats and tyrants and he still continues to struggle not only for their due recognition, but to make them inviolable under all conditions so as to bring to a citizen the full enjoyment of his liberty. The problem of democracy is really the problem of liberty and the success and failure of a democratic government depends largely on the extent in which civil liberties are enjoyed by the citizens in general. If democracy has put to an end the personal rule of the despots, it has, undoubtedly, brought in its wake "the tyranny of the majority". The tyranny of the majority, as John Stuart Mill has rightly said, is "among the evils against which society requires to be on its guard", because of the ease with which it can be exercised and the severity with which it operates. Willoughby, a distinguished American publicist, has emphasised that "there can be no tyranny of a monarch so intolerable as that of the multitude, for it has the power behind it that no king can sway."

Fundamental Rights are a declaration of the fact that certain elementary rights of the individual are not subject to the vagaries of the shifting legislative majorities, Mr. Justice Jackson of the United States Supreme Court, in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, declared, "The very purpose of the Bill of Rights was to withdraw certain subjects from the vicissitudes of political controversy, to place them beyond the reach of majorities and officials and to establish them as legal principles to be applied by the courts. One's right to life, liberty and property, to free speech, a free press, freedom of worship and assembly, and other Fundamental Rights may not be submitted to vote; they depend on the outcome of no elections".

The Theory of Fundamental Rights implies limited and free government. To put it in the words of the Constitution of the German Republic, the function of the Fundamental Rights is "to supply standards and prescribe limits for legislature, the executive and the administration of justice". The incorporation of a Bill of Rights in a Constitution acts as a great safeguard, not only against any "misconstruction or abuse of" power on the part of a department of a government, but also against the tyranny of the majority. It aims at preventing the government and the legislature from becoming despotic and it is the duty of the courts to ensure the observance of Fundamental Rights. Fundamental rights are, accordingly, justiciable. In Hurtado v. People of California Mr. Justice Mathews of the United States Supreme Court observed, "The limitations imposed by our constitutional law upon the actions of the Governments, both State and national, are essential to the preservation of public and private rights, notwithstanding the representative character of our political institutions. The enforcement of these limitations by judicial process is the device of the self-governing communities to protect the rights of individuals and minorities, as well as against the power of numbers, as against the violence of public agents transcending the limits of public authority, even when acting in the name and wielding the force of the government." In the State of Madras v. V.G. Row, Chief Justice Sastri observed, "our Constitution contains express provision for judicial review of legislation as to its conformity with the Constitution..... If then, the courts in this country face up to such important and none too easy task, it is not out of any desire to tilt at legislative authority in a crusader's spirit, but in discharge of a duty plainly laid upon them by the Constitution. This is especially true as regards the Fundamental Rights as to which this Court has been assigned in the role of sentinel on the qui vive....." A mere declaration of Fundamental Rights does not serve the desired purpose. Nor does it contribute to the enjoyment of liberty unless an infringement of any of such rights can be prevented by providing adequate safeguards and guaranteeing ample remedies by resort to the highest courts in the land for asserting such Fundamental Rights. The Constitution makes the independent judiciary of a country the guardian of Fundamental Rights. When the essential human rights are enshrined in the Constitution, they are cherished as sacred and any trifling with them by any agency of the State is viewed with horror and deemed as a violation of the Constitution. Herein lies the importance of Fundamental Rights.

But Fundamental Rights are not absolute. They are subject to limitations in order to secure or promote the greater interests of the community. Freedom does not mean anarchy. "There cannot be any such thing as absolute or uncontrolled liberty wholly free from restraint; for that would lead to anarchy and disorder. The possession and enjoyment of all rights.....are subject to such reasonable conditions as may be deemed to be, to the governing authority of the country, essential to the safety, health, peace, general order and morals of the community.....What the Constitution attempts to do in declaring the rights of the people is to strike a balance between individual liberty and social control." Restrictions are a necessary part of the rights and many Constitutions provide for such restrictions, as the Constitution of India does. When the Constitutions state the rights broadly and leave their interpretation to the courts, reasonable restrictions have been imposed in public interest. For example, the Australian Constitution provides that trade, commerce and intercourse between the States shall be "absolutely" free, but the Australian Courts and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have held that this freedom must be qualified, that is, freedom to trade, like other freedoms, must be subject to reasonable restrictions in the public interest.

Fundamental Rights in the American Constitution. The Constitution of the United States is perhaps the best example of a democratic Constitution in which the idea of fundamental rights is developed. As originally drafted, the Constitution contained no Bill of Rights, although it did contain some provisions relating to individual liberty. The absence of the Bill of Rights from the Constitution created apprehensions and Jefferson and others expressed the desire for its early incorporation. Hence the first ten Amendments were adopted which became a part of the Constitution in 1791. These ten Amendments are generally referred to as the American Bill of Rights.

The most important feature of Fundamental Rights, as developed in the United States, is the doctrine of "due process of law." Amendment V of the Constitution, which is directed against the Federal Government, inter alia, provides that "no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty or property without due process of law." A similar provision is contained in Amendment XIV which relates to the powers of the States. It provides, "nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law." It means that any law or action of the Federal or State Government can be challenged, under the due process of law clause, in a court of law if it amounts to depriving a man of his life, liberty or property. Due process of law means 'reasonable law or reasonable procedure', that is to say, what the court finds to be reasonable. There is no doctrine of the 'security of the State' in the United States and the legislature cannot suspend or abridge any individual right on the ground of the safety of the State. It is for the judiciary to decide and determine whether there is "a clear and present danger" to the existence of the social order so as to justify a curtailment of the rights of the individual. The courts have, of course, been responsive to the needs of the time and determined accordingly. In 1937, the Supreme Court held that interception of telephonic messages by government agents to collect information was unconstitutional as it contravened the Fourth Amendment.² In 1942, the same Court reversed its own previous order and held interception of telephonic messages valid under the stress of war conditions.³ The same Court, which had upheld the Espionage Act during the World War I,⁴ refused in time of peace "to prohibit by injunction a regular vilification of public officers by a newspaper."⁵

The Supreme Court, however, has conceded that the Legislature has the power of making laws and regulating individual rights for the advancement of public warfare. This power is known as the "Police Power" of the State and may be defined "as the legal capacity of the Government to control the personal liberty of individuals for the protection of social interests, or common good of the people." Chief Justice Hughes writes, "Both Congress and the State Legislatures must have a wide field of legislative direction that is essential to the exercise of legislative power. The due process clause does not substitute the judgment of the Court for this discretion of the legislature. . . . Changing social conditions require new remedies, the moral exercise of the Police Power, to care for both social and individual interests. Our Federal Constitution has vested in the Supreme Court, and the inferior Federal Courts, the judicial, not the legislative power. Those who find fault with the multiplicity of laws, and with vexatious interference, normally must address themselves to the Legislature, and not to the Court: they have their remedy at the ballot box."⁶ But there is a limit to legislative direction and the courts reserve to themselves the last word by declaring whether the legislative action was arbitrary or without reasonable relation to some purpose within the competence of the State. The Supreme Court, no doubt, takes into account changes in the social and economic conditions of the country while determining the validity or otherwise of the legislation. Mr. Justice Sutherland, while delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., observed, ".....for while the meaning of constitutional guarantees never varies, the scope of their application must expand or contract to meet the new and different conditions which are constantly coming within the field of their operation. In a changing world, it is impossible that it should be otherwise. But although a degree of elasticity is thus imparted, not to meaning, but to the application of constitutional principles, statutes and ordinance, which after giving due weight to the new conditions, are found clearly not conform to the Constitution, of course, must fall...."⁷

In the United States, therefore, it is the Supreme Court which has the final and conclusive say in determining whether curtailment of individual rights justify the changing requirements of society or not. The judiciary, as guardian of the Fundamental Rights, is competent to override the wishes of the legislature and, as such, the wishes of the representatives of the people. It is a safeguard against the despotism of the majority and legislative omnipotence. But judiciary is neither responsive nor responsible and being proverbially conservative it cannot adequately appreciate the changing demands of the people consistent with the needs of the time. Moreover, when the judiciary considers the justification or otherwise of the legislation with reference to the changing social and economic conditions, it directly enters into the arena of political controversies. The Supreme Court in the United States has, thus, not only assumed the position of a super-legislature, without being responsive and responsible to any one, but its virtue of impartiality also becomes questionable.

FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS IN INDIA

Demand for Declaration. Before the enactment of the Constitution of 1950, there was no charter of fundamental rights of a justiciable nature, although the demand for such rights and their constitutional guarantee goes back to 1895. The Constitution of India Bill, described by Mrs. Annie Besant as the Home Rule Bill, had envisaged for India a Constitution guaranteeing to all citizens freedom of speech and expression, right to personal liberty, inviolability of one's house, right to property, equality before the law, equality to admission to public offices, and right to petition for redress of grievances. Immediately after the publication of the Montague-Chelmsford Report, the Indian National Congress at its Bombay session in August 1918, demanded the new Constitution of India should contain a "declaration of the rights of the people of India as British citizens" guaranteeing equality before the law, freedom of speech and press, and protection in respect of liberty, life and property.

The Constitution of the Irish Free State in 1921, which contained a Bill of Rights, had a profound effect on the political thought in India. The Commonwealth of India Bill drafted by the National Convention in 1925, embodied a "declaration of rights" more or less similar to the provisions of the Irish Constitution. A resolution passed at the Madras session of the Indian National Congress emphasised that the future constitution of India must guarantee fundamental rights. The Nehru Committee appointed by the All-Parties Conference, in its report included an enumeration of such rights and in recommending their declaration the Committee urged that "Ireland is the only country where conditions obtaining before the Treaty were the nearest approach to those we have in India. The first concern of the people of Ireland was, as it is indeed of the people of India today, to secure fundamental rights that have been denied to them. The other Dominions had their rise from earliest British settlements which were supposed to have carried the law of England with them. Ireland was taken and kept under the rule of England against her own will, and the acquisition of Dominion Status became a matter of Treaty with the two nations...." Another reason why India attached great importance to a declaration of the rights was, in the opinion of the Nehru Committee, the unfortunate existence of communal differences in the country. "Certain safeguards and guarantees," the Committee urged, "are necessary to create and establish a sense of security among those who look upon each other with distrust and suspicion. We could not better secure the full enjoyment of religious and communal rights to all communities than by including them among the basic principles of the Constitution. The Committee added, "It is obvious that our first care should be to have our fundamental rights guaranteed in a manner which will not permit their withdrawal under any circumstances."

In 1931, the Indian National Congress passed a Resolution on Fundamental Rights. In order to end the exploitation of the masses, the Resolution emphasised, political freedom must include real economic freedom of the starving millions. It was further declared that any Constitution which might be agreed to on behalf of the Indian National Congress should provide, or enable the Swaraj Government to provide, for certain fundamental rights and duties. But the British Government was in no mood to reconcile to this primary demand of the Indians. In fact, such a demand was unsuited to the British genius. The Simon Commission had ridiculed the idea of fundamental rights. "Abstract declarations", the Commission observed, "are useless unless there exists the will and the means to make them effective."⁸

All the same, the matter came for consideration during the Round Table Conferences. At the second Round Table Conference, M.K. Gandhi, the sole representative of the Indian National Congress, circulated a memorandum, inter alia, demanding that the new Constitution should "include a guarantee to the communities concerned for the protection of their cultures, languages, scripts, education, profession and practice of religion and religious endowments." Another memorandum on the subject was put forward jointly by the representatives of the minorities. Ramsay MacDonald, the then Labour Prime Minister, announced that he felt the need of incorporating fundamental rights in the proposed Constitution of India for safeguarding the interests of the minorities. Immediately after came the National Government into power with Ramsay MacDonald as Prime Minister, but with an avowed majority of the Conservatives in the Government. This made a sharp swing in the official policy. Lord Reading and Sir John Simon were vehement in opposing the inclusion of fundamental rights in the new Constitution for India. The Indian representatives at the conference could not agree amongst themselves on the basic problems of constitutional reforms and, accordingly, the issue of fundamental rights also lapsed.

The Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Government of India Bill 1934, endorsed the observations of the Simon Commission on the demand for a constitutional guarantee of fundamental rights to subjects of British India. The Committee said, "A cynic might indeed find plausible arguments....for asserting that the most effective method of ensuring the protection of a fundamental right is to include a declaration of its existence in a constitutional instrument. But there are also strong practical arguments against the proposal, which may be put in the form of dilemma: for either the declaration of rights is of so abstract a nature that it has no legal effect of any kind, or its legal effect will be to impose an embarrassing restrictions on the powers of the legislature and to create a grave risk that a large number of laws may be declared invalid by the Courts as being inconsistent with one or other of the rights so declared. There is this further objection, that the States have made it abundantly clear that no declaration of fundamental rights is to apply in State territories; and it would be altogether anomalous if such a declaration had legal force in part only of the area of the Federation...."⁹ The Committee, however, conceded that there were some legally recognised principles which could be included in the New Constitution and, accordingly, the Government of India Act, 1935 conferred certain rights and forms of protection on British subjects in India.¹⁰

The subject of fundamental rights came for active consideration in the deliberations of the Conciliation Committee, also known as the Sapru Committee, appointed by the All-Parties Conference (1944-45). The Committee was of the opinion that fundamental rights were not only "assurances and guarantees to the minorities but also prescribing a standard of conduct for the legislatures, governments and the courts."¹¹ The Committee further said that it was for the Constitution-making body to settle the list of fundamental rights and, then, to decide about their division into justiciable and non-justiciable rights and to provide in the case of the former, suitable machinery for their enforcement.

Constituent Assembly and the Fundamental Rights. The Cabinet Mission Plan conceded the demand for the Constituent Assembly as well as the need for a written guarantee of fundamental rights in the Constitution of India. It recommended the appointment of an Advisory Committee on the Rights of Citizens, Minorities and Tribal and Excluded Areas, containing the interests affected, which would prepare a list of fundamental rights and also to recommend their inclusion in the State or the Union List. By the Objectives Resolution introduced by Jawaharlal Nehru and adopted on January 22, 1947, the Constituent Assembly solemnly pledged to draw up for India's future governance a Constitution wherein "shall be guaranteed and secured to all the people of India, justice, social, economic and political, equality of status, of opportunity and before the law: freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith, worship, vocation, association and action, subject to law and public morality."

Two days after adopting the Objectives Resolution, the Constituent Assembly elected an Advisory Committee for reporting on minorities, fundamental rights and on the tribal and excluded areas. The Advisory Committee consisted of 54 members with Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel as its Chairman. The Advisory Committee constituted on February 12, 1947, five sub-committees one of which was to deal with fundamental rights.¹² The draft report of the sub-committee was circulated to its members with the explanatory notes on various clauses prepared by B.N. Rau. These were thereafter discussed in the Sub-Committee in the light of the comments offered by the members and the final report was submitted to the Chairman of the Advisory Committee on April 16, 1947. Ambedkar, Jairam Das Daulatram and K.M. Munshi. The President of the Committee was authorised to nominate additional members.

tee accepted the recommendations of the Sub-Committee: (1) for division of rights into justiciable and non-justiciable rights; that is, rights enforceable by appropriate legal process and rights consisting of directive principles of state policy, which though not enforceable in courts, were nevertheless to be regarded as fundamental in the governance of the country, (2) certain rights being guaranteed to all persons and certain others to citizens only, and (3) all such rights being made uniformly applicable to the Union and the units. The Constituent Assembly adopted all these recommendations and the Constitution of 1950, contains two Chapters, Chapter III enumerating the Fundamental Rights and Chapter IV dealing with the Directive Principles of State Policy.

Some Features of Fundamental Rights in India. The Indian Constitution sets out a most elaborate declaration of human rights as compared with the Bill of Rights contained in any other existing Constitution of importance. The provisions are detailed covering a variety of topics and some are purely the outcome of the peculiar social conditions prevailing in India.¹³ Whereas some of the rights granted by the Constitution are limited to citizens, such as freedom of speech, assembly and cultural and educational rights, while in the case of others, as equality before the law, religious freedom, etc., such a limitation does not exist; these are applicable to citizens and aliens alike. The relevant Articles of the Constitution make use of the two terms 'citizens' and 'persons' and they are indicative of the distinction between citizens and aliens. Even in the absence of such a distinction all the rights would not have been available to citizens and aliens alike, but the matter would have remained undecided until the Supreme Court would have determined so.

Some of the provisions of the Fundamental Rights are of the nature of prohibitions and place constitutional limitations on the authority of the State, e.g., no authority of the State can deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws; discrimination against any citizen; and no titles other than a military or academic distinction can be conferred. From the point of view of an individual, such rights may be termed as negative rights. The remaining provisions of the Chapter on Fundamental Rights, as such, can be said to contain positive rights of the individuals. In spite of this distinction no clear-cut line of division can be drawn between the two. There is, however, one important distinction between them. The provisions which impose constitutional limitations on the authority of the State are binding for all intents and purposes and any action, legislative or executive, which contravenes any of these provisions would be void altogether. The provisions relating to individual rights, on the other hand, are subject to the regulation of the State within certain prescribed limits and restrictions so imposed cannot be held to be void unless they travel beyond the prescribed limits.

The Fundamental Rights as contained in the Constitution of India place limitations on all kinds of authority that has either the power to make laws or the power to have discretion vested in it. The Fundamental Rights are, accordingly, binding on the Union Government, the State Governments as also the local bodies including the village Panchayats.

13. Articles 15(2), 15(4), and 17.

Dr. Ambedkar explained to the Constituent Assembly the word "State" as used in the Chapter on Fundamental Rights. "The object of the Fundamental Rights", he said, "is two-fold. First, that every citizen must be in a position to claim those rights. Secondly, they must be binding upon every authority... upon every authority which has got either the power to make laws or the power to have discretion vested in it. Therefore, it is quite clear that if the Fundamental Rights are to be clear, then they must be binding not only upon the Central Government, they must not only be binding upon the Provincial Government,... they must also be binding upon District Local Boards, Municipalities, even village panchayats and taluk boards, in fact, every authority which has been created by law and which has got certain power to make laws, to make rules, or make by-laws."¹⁴

Absolute or unrestricted rights, as said before, are not possible. This is the position in Britain, although there are no constitutional guarantees of fundamental rights in that country.¹⁵ In the United States there are no direct restrictions imposed by the First Ten Amendments which determine the American Bill of Rights. But under the doctrine of Police Power the Supreme Court has recognised the inherent power of the State to impose such restrictions on Fundamental Rights as may be deemed reasonable to protect the common good.¹⁶ The final say, however, rests with the Supreme Court to determine whether such restrictions justify the common good or not. There is no doctrine of the "security of the State" in the United States and no legislation can override any individual right on the ground that the safety of the State is in danger. The Constitution of India, on the other hand, imposes direct limitations on Fundamental Rights. Dr. Ambedkar, while introducing the Draft Constitution and supporting the restriction clauses, maintained, "what the Draft Constitution has done is that instead of formulating fundamental rights in absolute terms and depending upon our Supreme Court to come to the rescue of Parliament by inventing the doctrine of police power, it permits the State directly to impose limitations upon the fundamental rights."¹⁷ Courts in India cannot, therefore, question the propriety of legislation once it has been established that it is within the competency of the legislature to make such a law or in any way to modify its effect on the ground that it seeks to "unduly restrict personal liberty."¹⁸

The Constitution of India, thus, does not recognise the supremacy of the judiciary against the Legislature, although the Constitution gives to the Judiciary the power to review legislation repugnant to the Fundamental Rights. The position before February 1967 was that Parliament would abrogate or abridge Fundamental Rights by amending the Constitution by the provisions of Article 368 and thereby override the unwholesome decisions of the Judiciary simply by securing the requisite special majority, which the Congress Party had commanded in Parliament all those years. The first Amendment of the Constitution in 1951, was necessitated with a view to override a series of decisions rendered by the Supreme Court. It was intended to save the Zamindari Abolition Acts from judicial scrutiny. The Fourth Amendment was enacted with a view to render the question of reasonable compensation for acquisition of estates non-justiciable. In 1961 and 1963, the Supreme Court declared that the Kerala and Madras Land Reform Acts, which provided for a ceiling on land holdings, were bad. In the wake of these declarations the Seventeenth Amendment was enacted in 1964 where 44 laws passed by both the States were included in the Ninth Schedule in order to maintain them valid. A good number of writ petitions challenging the competence of Parliament to enact the Seventeenth Amendment were moved in the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court by a historic 6-5 ruling¹⁹ on February 27, 1967 reversed its earlier decisions and declared that Parliament has no power to abridge or take away Fundamental Rights guaranteed under the Constitution. Chief Justice K. Suba Rao observed, "I have...no hesitation in holding that the Fundamental Rights created by the Constitution are transcendental in nature, conceived and enacted in the national interest and therefore cannot be waived." The Court rejected the Government argument that if the power to amend the Constitution was not all-comprehensive no way would be left to change the structure of the Constitution or to abridge the Fundamental Rights in the event demanding such a change and declared that it "was too extravagant a demand". If such a contingency arises the residuary power of Parliament may be relied upon to call the Constituent Assembly to make a new Constitution or to change it radically.

The resultant position is that the amendment of Fundamental Rights is not forbidden, but the Supreme Court reserves to itself the powers of determining in each specific case whether the amendment in question takes away or abridges the rights. The precariously balanced six to five decision establishes the supremacy of the judiciary so far as Fundamental Rights are involved. The decision affirms what Chief Justice Hughes of the United States once said that "we are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the Judges say it is." The Supreme Court of India, like its counterpart in the United States, has become a super-legislature because what is taken away by Justices from Parliament is taken away from the people.

K. Suba Rao reiterated his stand on the Fundamental Rights which he had taken in the Golak Nath case.²⁰ The former Chief Justice of India further maintained that the two instruments provided in the Constitution to preserve the Fundamental Rights of the people, namely,

19. The majority view was expressed by two separate judgments, one by the Chief Justice Mr. K. Suba Rao, for himself and Justices J.C. Shah, S.M. Sikri, J.M. Shelat and C.A. Vaidyalingam and the other by Mr. Justice M. Hidayatullah. The dissenting Justices were Wanchoo, Bhargava, Mitter, Bachawat and Ramaswami.

the provision for proclamation of emergency and the power to amend the Constitution had turned out to be "instruments of destruction." Justice K.N. Wanchoo, who succeeded K. Suba Rao as Chief Justice and was with minority on the Supreme Court's historic decision, on the other hand, said that the Constitution should in order to endure, subserve the needs of generations which came into being after its adoption. Delivering Feroze Memorial Lecture in New Delhi, Mr. Justice Wanchoo said the decision taken by the Supreme Court by a majority of one showed "how the problem of interpretation of the Constitution by the Court may have far-reaching consequences". He affirmed that the contents of the Constitution may change from time to time as new ideas gain force in the body politic of the country and new concepts of law and justice emerge. He added that it was inevitable that the view of life of individual Judges would have an impact when considering the question of Fundamental Rights, but "at the same time it must not be forgotten that the view of the elected legislatures should not be overridden lightly."²¹

The Supreme Court's judgment in the Golak Nath case that the Chapter on Fundamental Rights is beyond Parliament's jurisdiction to alter has given rise to a sharp controversy, both in Parliament and outside. Nath Pai, the PSP Member of Parliament, said, "The destiny of India depends on one Judge—that's my quarrel."²² He, accordingly, introduced the Constitution (Amendment) Bill, 1967, in Parliament for the restoration of what he described the supremacy of Parliament. It is not the Fundamental Rights, he said, which are at stake but the sovereignty of the people of India. He added, "The power to amend the Constitution is an inalienable part of the sovereignty of people. It is this sovereignty that is being challenged by the Supreme Court. My Bill merely seeks to assert that the sovereignty of the people cannot be abridged by a group of judges."²³ The Supreme Court should not sit as a super-legislature, he concluded.

Nath Pai's Constitution (Amendment) Bill was referred by the Lok Sabha to a Joint Select Committee of Parliament on August 4, 1967. Among other amendments in the Bill, the Joint Select Committee recommended that the State Legislatures should also be associated with the amendments of the provisions contained in Chapter III and henceforth all constitutional amendments be ratified by the Legislatures of not less than one-half of the States. The Government is committed to support Nath Pai's Bill. But when the Lok Sabha took up for consideration the Joint Select Committee's Report on November 29, 1968, the Congress and the Opposition both were divided and divergent views were expressed. Nath Pai's Bill is, therefore, as controversial as the Supreme Court's decision in the Golak Nath case. The sharp differences in the Congress Party do not augur well for the Bill. S.N. Mishra, a Congress Member of Parliament, declared that he objected to Nath Pai's Bill on three counts: it is a self-defeating measure, and void ab initio; it will be nearly impossible to have the Bill passed; and it is absolutely unnecessary.²⁴

Another important feature of Fundamental Rights in India is that there is a special constitutional provision for their enforcement. The right to move the Supreme Court for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights is itself a guaranteed right as provided for in Article 32. The Supreme Court is, accordingly, the protector and guarantor of Fundamental Rights.²⁵ The citizen whose rights have been infringed by any public authority in India can move the Supreme Court by appropriate proceedings for the enforcement of his rights and the Court is empowered to issue directions or orders or writs including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, certiorari, whichever may be appropriate.²⁶ The State High Courts have also the power of issuing writs under Article 226 and enforce rights in the same manner within the limits of their respective jurisdictions. Thus, the constitutional remedies for the enforcement of rights are made available to every citizen and within his easy reach.

Fundamental Rights in India can also be restricted or suspended. According to Article 33 the provisions relating to Fundamental Rights may be restricted or abrogated in their application "to the members of the Armed Forces or the Forces charged with the maintenance of public order. The special feature of the Indian Constitution is that the provisions of Article 33 apply not only to the armed forces but also to the ordinary police force who are charged with maintenance of public order. Article 34 further empowers Parliament to pass a law of indemnity, legalising acts done during the operation of martial law which would otherwise have been wrong under the ordinary law. Finally, rights may be suspended during the Proclamation of Emergency as provided in Articles 358 and 359. The Constitution also empowers the President to suspend, under an emergency, the right to move any court of law for the enforcement of any of the Fundamental Rights.

There are no natural or unenumerated rights under the Indian Constitution. This is in sharp contrast to the Constitution of the United States. Amendment IX to the American Constitution provides that "enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." The Supreme Court, accordingly, held that an Act of the Legislature which is contrary to the first principles of social compact will be ultra vires.²⁷ What these principles of social compact are, it is for the courts to determine. In this respect the Supreme Court in the United States assumes the role of a super-legislature. The Constitution of India does not permit so. The Supreme Court in India has definitely held that unless there is an express provision in the Constitution with which the Act of a Legislature conflicts, it cannot be held to be void merely on the ground of its being inconsistent with what the court considers to be the spirit of the Constitution.²⁸ In other words, a right which has not been enumerated and expressly declared to be a Fundamental Right in Part III of the Constitution is not a Fundamental Right. It does not, however, mean that there are no rights apart from those included in the Fundamental Rights. But all such rights are ordinary legal rights and not Fundamental Rights and they cannot be enforced in the Supreme Court under Article 32 or in the State High Courts. The legal remedies provided under Article 32 are only applicable to Fundamental Rights. Take, for example, Article 265. It provides that no tax shall be levied or collected except by authority of law. Although this right is a constitutional right, yet it is not a Fundamental Right and it cannot be enforced by the Supreme Court under Article 32,²⁹ as remedies provided for under Article 32 are only applicable to Fundamental Rights.

Finally, there are the Directive Principles of State Policy as contained in Chapter IV. In considering the question of fixing the Fundamental Rights and incorporating them into the Constitution, the Advisory Committee, appointed by the Constituent Assembly,³⁰ came to the conclusion that the Fundamental Rights should be divided into two parts—the first justiciable and the other non-justiciable. The non-justiciable rights are put under the heading Directive Principles of State Policy and according to Article 37 they are not enforceable by any Court, “but the principles laid down are nevertheless fundamental in the governance of the country and it shall be the duty of the State to apply these principles in making laws.” To put it in a more matter of fact language, whereas the Fundamental Rights “are in effect, injunctions prohibiting Government from doing certain things, the directive principles are affirmative instructions to Government to do certain things.”³¹

SOME SPECIFIC FUNDAMENTAL RIGHTS

The Right to Equality. The right to equality guaranteed in Part III of the Constitution has no socialist implication. It is essentially negative in character and is intended to remove the social and civic disabilities from which the masses of India had suffered all through these ages. Democracy can only exist and flourish amongst a society of equals and the Indian Constitution makes social and civic equality as the bedrock of Indian polity. It guarantees equality of all persons before the law,³² prohibits discrimination on grounds of religion, race, caste, sex or place of birth as between citizens,³³ grants to all equality of opportunity in the matter of public employment,³⁴ and abolishes untouchability³⁵ on the one side and titles³⁶ on the other. Citizens may not be denied admission to educational institutions maintained by the State or receiving aid out of State funds on the grounds only of religion, race, caste, or language.³⁷ Minorities may establish their own schools and government may not discriminate against them in making grants on the grounds of religion, race or language.³⁸

Some exceptions are, however, inevitable and the Constitution sets out these exceptions. A legislature may make laws with special provisions for women and children.³⁹ The Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951 further provided that "Nothing in this article or in clause (2) of Article 29 shall prevent the State from making any special provision for the advancement of any socially and educationally backward classes of citizens or for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes."⁴⁰ Another exception made is with regard to the equality of opportunity in public employment. Parliament may confine employment under a State or local authority to residents.⁴¹ The States may also provide for the reservation of appointments or posts for members of backward classes which in the opinion of the State are not adequately represented in the services under the State.⁴² Offices connected with the religious denominations may be reserved for the adherents of that denomination.⁴³

The right to equality, therefore, aims to protect citizens against discriminatory treatment by the State in the fields of administration and legislation, to advance the uplift of the socially backward classes even to the exception of granting them special privileges, and removing other cruder forms of social inequality. It uplifts about 50 million untouchables of India from their age-old degraded social status. Such social customs and disabilities as enforced segregation of the so-called untouchables at wells, in streets, schools and places of worship are declared illegal.⁴⁴ In fact, the Constitution bans all kinds of untouchability specified and unspecified.

The Right to Freedom. The Right to Freedom is covered by Articles 19 to 22 and embraces the classical liberties of the individual. Of these, Article 19 is the most important as it guarantees seven fundamental rights, which may be described as the seven freedoms, viz., (a) freedom of speech and expression; (b) freedom of assembly; (c) freedom of association; (d) freedom of movement; (e) freedom of residence and settlement; (f) freedom of property; and (g) freedom of profession, occupation, trade or business. All these seven categories of freedom are the most important ingredients of human happiness and progress as without them no individual can rise to the full stature of his personality. The Preamble of almost every Constitution epitomises these freedoms and declares as its objectives. For instance, the Preamble to the Constitution of the United States, inter alia, declares "to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity." The Preamble to the Indian Constitution declares that one of its objectives is to secure "Liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship."

41. Article 16 (3).

42. Article 16 (4).

43. Article 16 (5).

44. Article 15 (2).

Article 19 may be divided into two parts. The first is the declaration of rights and, as said above, contains seven freedoms. The second part contains limitations [clauses (2) to (6)] each governing one or more clauses of the first part. Consistent with the theory that rights can never be absolute, the Constitution imposes specific limitations on their exercise and enjoyment. This is an improvement on the American Constitution which leaves the determination of restrictions and adjustment of conflicting interests of the individual and society to the Courts. The Constitution of India defines the scope of limitations and authorises the State to restrict the exercise of freedoms guaranteed by Article 19 within the restricting clauses of the same Article. It has been maintained that these limitations are, in fact, the partial codification of the American doctrine of Police Power.

The limitations imposed on the freedom to speech and the right to property were substantially modified by the Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951. On May 12, 1951, about 16 months after the Constitution had been working, a Bill to amend the Constitution was introduced in Parliament. On May 16, the Prime Minister moved for reference of the Bill to a Select Committee and the Committee reported back on May 25. Parliament started discussion on the Select Committee's Report on May 29 and finally passed the Bill on June 2, 1951. The President assented to the Bill on June 18, 1951 and it became the First Amendment of the Constitution. The main objects for amending the Constitution can best be explained from the Statement of Objects and Reasons attached to the Amending Bill.⁴⁵ The Statement read, "During the last fifteen months of the working of the Constitution, certain difficulties have been brought to light by judicial decisions and pronouncements especially in regard to the Chapter on Fundamental Rights. The citizen's right to freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by Article 19(a) has been held by some Courts to be so comprehensive as not to render a person culpable even if he advocates murder and other crimes of violence. In other countries with written Constitutions, freedom of the speech and press is not regarded as debarring the State from punishing or preventing abuse of his freedom. The citizen's right to practise any profession or to carry on any occupation, trade or business conferred by Article 19(1)(g) is subject to reasonable restrictions which the laws of the State may impose "in the interests of the general public." While the words cited are comprehensive enough to cover any scheme of nationalisation which the State may undertake, it is desirable to place the matter beyond doubt by a clarificatory addition to Article 19(6)."

The scope of the freedom of speech under the original provisions was, indeed, exceptionally wide. There were only four reservations restricting this right, viz., laws relating to libel, slander and defamation; contempt of court; decency or morality; and security of the State. Thus, "public order" was not one of the purposes for which the freedom of speech could be restricted. Similarly, incitement to an offence was not made one of the objects to restrict the freedom of speech. The Supreme Court held in a series of cases that a law restricting the freedom of speech and not relating to defamation or contempt of court and not involving offences against decency or morality would be ultra vires unless it related to any matter which undermined the security of, or tended to overthrow the State. In Romesh Thapar v. The State of Madras it was held that the Constitution "has placed in a distinct category those offences against public order which aim at undermining the security of the State or overthrowing it and made their prevention the sole justification of legislative abridgment of the freedom of speech and expression, that is to say, nothing less than endangering the foundations of the State or threatening its overthrow could justify the curtailment of the freedom of speech and expression."⁴⁶

The Amendment of 1951 added three more reservations to the existing list contained in Article 19(2). The new reservations were: friendly relations with foreign States, public order, and incitement to an offence. Article 19(2) now reads: "Nothing in sub-clause (a) of clause (1) shall effect the operation of any existing law, or prevent the State from making any law, in so far as such law imposes reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right conferred by the said sub-clause in the interests of the security of the State, friendly relations with foreign States, public order, decency or morality, or in relation to contempt of court, defamation or incitement to an offence." With the inclusion of the three additional reservations the right to freedom of speech has been considerably curtailed and the scope of interference appreciably widened, provided the Courts could be satisfied about the reasonableness of such restrictions. By reasonable restrictions the Supreme Court has meant such restrictions which are not excessive in nature and beyond what is required in the interests of the public. The Supreme Court has also held that "the determination by the Legislature of what constitutes a reasonable restriction is not final or conclusive; it is subject to supervision by this Court. In the matter of Fundamental Rights the Supreme Court watches and guards the rights guaranteed by the Constitution and in exercising its functions it has the power to set aside the Act of the Legislature if it is in violation of the freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution."⁴⁷

The Constitution (Sixteenth Amendment) Act, 1963, added the Sovereignty and integrity of India" as one of the grounds in the interests of which Legislatures could impose reasonable restrictions on freedom of speech and expression. Asoke Sen, the Law Minister, while moving a motion to refer the Constitution (Sixteenth Amendment) Bill to a Joint Committee of Parliament, said in the Lok Sabha on January 22, 1963, that powers were also being taken to impose restrictions on those individuals or organisations who wanted to make secession from India as political issues for the purposes of fighting elections. This, he maintained, had become necessary as some decisions of the Supreme Court had made it clear that Article 19 of the Constitution in its present form was not enough to ban secessionist activity. He also said that it was also being provided that any person who wanted to stand as candidate for a seat in the Assembly in a State or in the Lok Sabha or a State Council or the

Rajya Sabha should take an oath pledging himself to uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India. This would ensure that no candidate would make secession a political issue in the elections. Further, after elections, every member would have to take another oath pledging himself to the same thing, namely, upholding the sovereignty and integrity of India.⁴⁸

Other rights guaranteed by Article 19 may be briefly stated. Freedom of assembly is subject to reasonable restrictions in the interests of public order.⁴⁹ The right to form associations or unions is subject to reasonable restrictions in the interests of public order or morality.⁵⁰ The restrictions, thus, imposed on the freedom of assembly and to form associations must, in the first place, be reasonable, and secondly, be in the interests of public order or morality. In the State of Madras v. V.G. Row, Chief Justice Patanjali Sastri observed, "The right to form associations or unions has such wide and varied scope for its exercise, and its curtailment is fraught with such potential reactions in the religious, political and economic field that the vesting of authority in the executive government to impose restrictions on such right, without allowing the grounds of such imposition, both in their factual and legal aspects, to be duly tested in a judicial inquiry, is a strong element which, in our opinion, must be taken into account in judging the reasonableness of the restrictions imposed. . . . The formula of subjective satisfaction of the Government or of its officers with an Advisory Board thrown in to review the material on which the Government seeks to override a basic freedom guaranteed to the citizen, may be viewed as reasonable only in very exceptional circumstances and within the narrowest limits, and cannot receive judicial approval as a general pattern of reasonable restrictions of Fundamental Rights." It was, accordingly, held that Section 15(2) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1908 as amended by the Criminal Law Amendment (Madras) Act, 1950, was ultra vires as the impugned provision imposed unreasonable restrictions on the freedom of association. The Constitution (Sixteenth Amendment) Act, 1963, amended clauses 3 and 4 of Article 19, precisely providing that the State could pass laws imposing reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right to assemble peaceably and without arms and on the right to form associations or unions, if such restrictions were in the interests of the sovereignty and integrity of India.

The right to move freely is the right of movement unchecked and unrestricted anywhere within the territories of the Indian Union, subject to such restrictions as are imposed by any existing law or such as the State may in future impose in the public interest or to safeguard the interests of any scheduled tribe. In times of emergency, such as war, every citizen cannot claim as a matter of right access to places considered of military or strategic importance. Similarly, when an epidemic spreads in one part of the country, people may be prohibited by law from entering or leaving such affected area in the interest of public health. The freedom of movement also does not take away the right which law gave to the government to extern any person from any part of the country for a particular period in the interests of maintenance of law and order⁵¹ as also the right to detain any person for sufficient grounds if the public interest demands it.⁵²

Allied to the right of free movement is the right to reside or settle in any part of the territory of India, and to acquire, hold or dispose of property, limited, of course, by reasonable restrictions in the interests of general public or for the protection of the interest of the scheduled tribes. These rights are characteristic of every free nation.

Finally, the right to practise any trade or profession is subject to the right of the State to prescribe professional or technical qualifications to enable a citizen to become a lawyer or an engineer. This restriction is natural and necessary. The Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951, further empowered the State to reserve to itself the right to carry on any trade, business, industry or service either directly or through State controlled corporations to the complete or partial exclusion of private citizens. This amendment was necessitated because of the judgment of the Allahabad High Court in Motilal v. The Government of Uttar Pradesh. The U.P. Motor Vehicles Act, 1939 was challenged in the Court as it conflicted with Article 14 of the Constitution. The Allahabad High Court decided that it could not allow the exemption of transport vehicles owned by the State Government from Section 43(3)(a) of the Motor Vehicles Act which required that all vehicles should be used in accordance with the conditions of permits granted by the Regional or Provincial Authority. The purpose of the amendment was explained by the Union Law Minister during the course of debate on the Amendment Bill. He said that the State Governments would gradually take the nationalization hence it was necessary that the Constitution should be amended to provide authority for the same.

It shall, therefore, be obvious that under the amended Clause (6) the restrictions on the right of carrying on any trade or profession, etc., fall into three classes: (a) reasonable restrictions imposed under the general power in the interests of the general public; (b) restrictions in the form of professional or technical qualifications; and (c) any law relating to carrying on of trade or business, industry or service, by the State or by a corporation owned or controlled by the State. It must be noted that restrictions imposed in the interests of general public give a very wide scope for interference and can include all matters affecting public welfare, such as public safety, public health, public morals, etc.

Personal Liberty. The rights guaranteed in Articles 20—22 relate to the individual's personal liberty and collectively come under the sub-heading "Right to Freedom." These rights strengthen the liberties conferred on citizens under Article 19. Article 20 deals with certain Fundamental Rights of a person accused of a crime and embodies certain important principles of criminal jurisprudence. Clause (1) of the Article embodies the principle that no one should be made to suffer any punishment for an offence under any law not in force at the time of the commission of an offence. Similarly, no person shall be subject to a penalty greater than that which might have been inflicted under the law in force at the time of the commission of the offence. The second clause embodies the fundamental principle that no one should be placed in jeopardy twice for the same offence. The principle underlying this clause is the same as it underlies the "double jeopardy" clause of the American Constitution, though the words used are different. The third clause gives effect to the principle that no one should be compelled to give evidence against himself in a criminal case. This clause follows the language of the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, though the rule laid down in the Indian Constitution is "narrow than the American rule as expanded by interpretation."⁵³

Article 21 guarantees to every person the most essential of all rights, the right to life and personal liberty, which the Article says cannot be taken away except according to procedure established by law. The Constitution permits the continuance of preventive detention, but only in accordance with the laws providing for it. The Article is not intended to be a constitutional limitation upon the power of the Legislatures. "Its object is simply to serve as a restraint upon the Executive so that it may not proceed against the life or personal liberty of the individual save under the authority of some law and in conformity with the procedure laid therein." The procedure so laid down must be in conformity with Article 22 of the Constitution.

The provisions of Article 21 are analogous to the provisions of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the Constitution of the United States. Under the Fifth Amendment no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law and under the Fourteenth Amendment no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law. The Indian Constitution gives the right to property a separate treatment and substitutes for "due process of law" "procedure established by law." The words "procedure established by law" have been borrowed from Article 31 of the Japanese Constitution of 1946.⁵⁴

Article 22 of the Constitution gives certain constitutional rights to arrested persons and also lays down certain fundamental rules with regard to preventive detention. It should be noted here that provisions relating to preventive detention are peculiar inasmuch as that the Constitution of India permits resort to preventive detention even in peace time. In other democratic countries preventive detention is usually a method resorted to in emergencies like war.⁵⁵

Preventive detention for reasons connected with the security of the State, or the maintenance of public order, or of supplies and services, is on the Concurrent List,⁵⁶ but preventive detention for reasons connected with defence, foreign affairs, or the security of the Union, is within the exclusive competence of Parliament.⁵⁷

Ordinarily an Act may not authorise detention for longer than three months unless within that period an Advisory Board, composed of persons qualified for appointment to a High Court, holds that there is a sufficient cause for further detention up to a limit set by Parliament which may, in specified circumstances, or in respect of certain specified classes of cases, authorise detention without resort to the Advisory Board for periods exceeding three months.⁵⁸

Every detenu has a constitutional right to be informed of the grounds of detention, and to the earliest opportunity of making representations against the order of detention,⁵⁹ but the authority issuing the order may withhold such facts if he considers it contrary to the public interest to disclose.⁶⁰ Replying to the criticism Dr. Ambedkar agreed that Article 22 excepted certain cases from the purview of the Advisory Board, but he felt that it was necessary to make such a distinction because there might be particular cases of detention in which the circumstances were so severe and the consequences so dangerous to the very existence of the state that it would not even be desirable to permit the members of the Board to know the facts. Even in cases so excepted from the purview of the Board, Ambedkar added, there were two mitigating circumstances: (i) such cases were to be defined by Parliament and not by the Executive arbitrarily; and (ii) in every case the maximum period of detention would have to be prescribed by law.⁶¹

Right Against Exploitation. Article 23 and 24 come under the sub-heading right against exploitation. Article 23 categorically prohibits all traffic in human beings and begar and other similar forms of forced labour. "Traffic in human beings" is evidently a very wide expression and would embrace not only the prohibition of slavery but also traffic in women for immoral or other purposes. Contravention of this prohibition has been made an offence punishable in accordance with law. Clause (2) of Article 23, however, provides for the power of the State to impose compulsory service for public purposes. The word public service has nowhere been defined, but it must include an object or aim in which the general interest of the community, as opposed to particular interests of individuals, is directly and vitally concerned.⁶² It will be instructive to note that in America it has been held that the State has inherent power to require any able-bodied man within its jurisdiction to labour for a reasonable time on public roads near his residence without direct compensation.⁶³ In the United States, military service is a public service. The Supreme Court observed in Arver v. United States that "the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need and the right to compel it." In India "compulsory service for public purposes" must likewise include military service as it is clearly a service for a public purpose to maintain the integrity and sovereignty of the State.

Article 24 ordains that no child below the age of fourteen years shall be employed to work in any factory or mine or engaged in any other hazardous employment. Here the Indian Constitution goes ahead of the American Constitution as there is no express prohibition against the employment of children in any factory or mine or in other hazardous occupations.

Right to Freedom of Religion. The particular religious rights contained in Articles 25—28 have a wide scope, and they cover both the personal and social aspects of religion. These rights are equally enjoyed by all persons living in India, citizens and aliens. The Constitution guarantees to all persons the right of freedom of conscience, and to profess, practise and propagate any religion subject to the prescribed limitations. Religious institutions being on the Concurrent List, the right to freedom of religion does not, accordingly, prevent the State Legislatures from making any law regulating or restricting any economic, financial, political or other secular activity of a religious body, nor render invalid Acts throwing open public religious institutions formerly reserved for a section of the adherents of any one of the Hindu, Sikh, Jain or Buddhist religions to all adherents of that religion. All religious denominations are 'guaranteed autonomy, the right to establish institutions, and the right to acquire and deal with property, but only subject to public order, health and morality.'⁶⁴ No one can be compelled to pay taxes for the propagation or maintenance of any religion,⁶⁵ and religious instruction is not to be given in schools and colleges wholly maintained out of government revenues. But religious instruction may be imparted in private institutions receiving a grant from public funds or recognised by the State provided no pupil is given religious instruction or to attend religious worship in a building attached to the institution without his consent, or, if he is a minor, his guardian's consent.⁶⁶

Cultural and Educational Rights. Article 29 guarantees to every minority or section of the people to preserve its language, script and culture notwithstanding the provisions of Article 343 under which the official language of the Union shall be Hindi in Devnagari script. Clause (2) of the same Article provides that no citizen may be denied admission to State and State-aided educational institutions on the grounds only of religion, race, caste, or language.⁶⁷ All minorities whether based on religion or language have the right to establish their own schools and Government shall not discriminate against them in making grants on the grounds of religion, race or language.⁶⁸

Right to Property. Article 31 recognise as a matter of Fundamental Right the sanctity of private property. Under Article 19 every citizen is assured the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property. Under Clause (1) of Article 31 every person is guaranteed the right not to be deprived of his property except by authority of law. No one can, accordingly, be deprived of his property merely by an Executive action and unless the Executive acts under the authority of law its action is repugnant to Article 31 of the Constitution and hence void. Clause (2) of Article 31 further provides that no property should be acquired by the State or requisitioned by the State except for public purposes and on payment of compensation. Clauses (3) to (6) and Articles 31A and 31B are concerned with the exceptions to the general provisions of acquisition and requisition of property by the State for public purposes and compensations to be paid thereto. Articles 31A and 31B were incorporated by the Constitution (First Amendment) Act, 1951. The effects of these Articles are very wide and were intended to validate the acquisition of Zamindaries on the abolition of Permanent Settlement without interference from Courts. Article 31A provides that no law, past or future, affecting rights of any proprietor or intermediate holder in any estate shall be void on the ground that it is inconsistent with any of the Fundamental Rights contained in Part III of the Constitution. That is to say, no law shall be liable to challenge in a Court on the ground that no compensation has been provided for, or that there is no public purpose or that it violates some other provisions of Part III of the Constitution. The Article, accordingly, overrides the decision of the Patna High Court in Kameshwar Singh v. State of Bihar wherein it was held that whether a particular piece of land is for a public purpose is a matter which is not beyond the scrutiny by the Courts,⁶⁹ and since the Bihar State Management of Estate and Tenures Act 21 of 1949 was not for a public purpose, it was not valid. Article 31B was inserted by way of "abundant caution" to save the Acts in the Ninth Schedule of the Constitution notwithstanding any decision of a Court or tribunal that any of these Acts is void for contravention of any of the Fundamental Rights. The Article, however, reserves the power of a competent legislature to repeal or amend any of the Acts included in the Ninth Schedule.

With regard to compensation, the Constitution of United States⁷⁰ and Australia⁷¹ provide for payment of just compensation and Courts in both the countries have held that the determination of "just" compensation is a matter for the Courts and not for the Legislature or the Executive.⁷² The Constitution of India, on the other hand, gives final authority to the Legislature "subject only to the scrutiny of the Courts in cases of frauds on the Constitution, e.g., where the provision was merely a cloak for a confiscatory legislation, or where the legislature seizes property without referring to compensation at all."⁷³

The Patna and Calcutta High Courts, however, held otherwise. In Kameshwar Singh v. The State of Bihar the Patna High Court held that the omission of the word "just" or "fair" does not make the question of amount of compensation non-justiciable. A similar opinion was held by the Calcutta High Court.⁷⁴ If the amount which a law gives by way of compensation be not just or reasonable then it cannot be regarded as compensation within Clause (2) of Article 31 and the law is, accordingly, ultra vires.

These decisions were endorsed by the Supreme Court. In December 1953 the Supreme Court reversed the opinion of the Bombay High Court in Dwarkanadas Shrinivas v. Sholapur S. & W. Co. and held that the Sholapur Mills Ordinance and Act were ultra vires under Article 31. The need for amending Article 31, thus, became obvious and the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Bill was passed on April 12, 1955 by an overwhelming majority of 302 votes against 5.⁷⁵ Before the final voting, Prime Minister Nehru declared that the Bill would remove certain difficulties in their way and would make it easier for them to bring about the desired changes in "their social structure without injuring any interest. The object of the amendment can best be explained in the words of the Prime Minister. "We are not suggesting", observed Nehru, "any arbitrary, confiscatory or expropriatory action. In fact the law provides that acquisition of property be by law, and compensation should be paid. But the quantum of compensation will be determined by the legislature. I cannot say off hand, what the legislature might do in a particular case, but by and large, if you think of governing this country democratically, you should trust the legislature."⁷⁶ The Prime Minister further maintained that the Amendment did not completely abolish the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in the matter of compensation but only limited it. Nehru, however, expressed the hope that while interpreting the laws, the Supreme Court will take full cognisance of the "new atmosphere" in the House and the country about "this business of compensation"⁷⁷ and should not attempt to act as a "third House of Parliament." The effect of the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act was: (i) provision was made for acquisition and requisitioning; and (ii) it was expressly stated that no law would be called in question in any court on the ground that the compensation was unjust. A new clause (2-A) laid down that the obligation to pay compensation would not arise unless either the ownership or right to possession of the individual was transferred to the State or to a corporation owned or controlled by the State.

The Supreme Court in 1964 again struck at the validity of the Kerala and Madras Land Reforms Acts which fixed ceiling on land-holdings. This led to the passing of the Seventeenth Amendment by virtue of which 44 Acts of the States were included in the Ninth Schedule in order to maintain them valid in spite of the Judgment of the Supreme Court. The competence of Parliament to enact the Seventeenth Amendment was challenged and the Supreme Court in Golak Nath case decided by a majority Judgment that Fundamental Rights were beyond the reach of Parliament and none of the Fundamental Rights enshrined in Part III of the Constitution can be taken away or abridged by Parliament by amending the Constitution under Article 368. The Court also held that the First, Fourth and Seventeenth Amendments which validated laws violating the Fundamental Rights had infringed the injunctions contained in Article 13(2) and therefore void and unenforceable.

But the Justices representing the majority opinion felt that by disturbing the previous Amendments a chaotic situation of law and legal authorities might result in the country. Therefore Chief Justice Suba Rao by applying the American doctrine of "Prospective Overruling"⁷⁸ preserved the past but protected the future so that similar onslaughts on the freedoms of the individuals might not be made. Mr. Justice Hidayatullah, who concurred with the majority opinion and reached the same conclusion to preserve the existing arrangements, did not rely on the doctrine of "Prospective Overruling." He relied upon the doctrine of "acquiescence" which implied that whatever Amendments with regard to Fundamental Rights had been made were valid but in future Parliament could not abridge or change them.

Right to Constitutional Remedies. Article 32 of the Constitution guarantees to every citizen to move the Supreme Court for the enforcement of all the Fundamental Rights. And for that purpose the Supreme Court is given general power to safeguard the Fundamental Rights as well as the power to issue directions or orders or writs, including writs in the nature of habeas corpus,⁷⁹ mandamus,⁸⁰ prohibition,⁸¹ quo warranto⁸²

78. Defining Prospective Overruling, in the majority opinion, the Chief Justice observed, "It is a modern doctrine suitable for a fast moving society. It does not do away with the doctrine of Stare decisis, but confines it to the past transactions...."

79. Habeas Corpus is intended to protect the citizen from unlawful arrest and detention, particularly at the order of the executive. Detention is permitted vide Article 22 of the Constitution and for an application under habeas corpus to succeed, it is necessary to show that there is no constitutionally valid law authorising the detention, or that the detention is not a bona fide exercise of the powers given by the law invoked to justify it.

80. Mandamus is used to enforce the performance of a public duty by an official. It is not available if there is any other adequate legal remedy.

81. Writ of Prohibition. Prohibition and certiorari are appropriate to complaints of excess of jurisdiction. Prohibition is intended to prevent an inferior court or tribunal dealing with a matter over which it has no jurisdiction.

82. Quo Warranto is issued for the purpose of determining the right of a person in office to hold on to that office. Quo Warranto will be issued only at the instance of the Union or a State Government.

and *certiorari*⁸³ whichever may be appropriate for the enforcement of any of the rights conferred by Part III of the Constitution.

The provision relating to the Constitutional remedies was described by Dr. Ambedkar as the "heart and soul of the Constitution." In fact, a declaration of Fundamental Rights is meaningless unless there are effective judicial remedies for their enforcement. In Britain, individual rights are safeguarded, although there is no declaration of Fundamental Rights in that country, by means of the "prerogative writs" which have been called by Dicey "the bulwark of English Constitution." In the Constitution of the United States there is no specific provision for the issue of these writs. The Fathers of the Constitution had assumed that these Common Law writs would be available in the United States and, as such, they specifically prohibited against the suspension of habeas corpus.⁸⁴

But in India while a Proclamation of Emergency is in operation, Fundamental Rights relating to the seven freedoms stand automatically suspended.⁸⁵ The President may also suspend the right to move Courts to enforce any other Fundamental Right but such an order must be laid before Parliament according to the requirements of the Constitution.⁸⁶

DIRECTIVE PRINCIPLES OF STATE POLICY

✓ The Directive Principles. Part IV of the Constitution contains certain Directive Principles of State Policy which are declared fundamental in the governance of the country.⁸⁷ These Directive Principles are intended to lay down in general terms the objects which the framers of the Constitution desired that the Governments, at the Centre and in the States, should pursue in guiding the destinies of the nation. They are in the nature of affirmative instructions to Governments to direct their activities to do certain things and thereby promote the realization of the high ideals set forth in the Preamble of the Constitution. The Preamble declares the resolve to secure to all citizens social, economic, and political justice, liberty of thought, expression and belief, equality of status and opportunity, and fraternity, assuring the dignity of the individual and unity of the nation. Speaking about the purpose of the Chapter on the Directive Principles of State Policy, Dr. Ambedkar said in the Constituent Assembly, "In enacting this part of the Constitution, the Assembly is giving certain directions to the future legislature and the future executive to show in what manner they are to exercise the legislative and the executive power they will have. Surely it is not the intention to introduce in this part these principles as mere pious declarations. It is the intention of this Assembly that in future both the legislature and the executive should not merely pay lip-service to these principles but that they should be made the basis of all legislative and executive action that they may be taking hereafter in the matter of the governance of the country.⁸⁸

83. Certiorari is available when a tribunal acts without jurisdiction as well as when it exceeds jurisdiction. It, thus, enables proceedings before an inferior Court to be quashed or transferred to a competent court. Both Prohibition and Certiorari govern, accordingly, judicial as opposed to ministerial acts.

The idea of making constitutional declaration of social and economic policy is the recognition of the ideal of service State in place of the regulatory State. It originated with the Weimar Constitution. Since then most of the democratic countries have included such declarations of policy in their Constitutions.⁸⁹ But all these Constitutions, except that of the Eire, did not distinguish between justiciable and other rights. The Constitution of Ireland separates the justiciable rights of the individual from the non-justiciable social policy⁹⁰ and the Indian Constitution follows the example of Ireland, though the Irish themselves had taken the idea from the Constitution of the Republic of Spain, which was the first ever to incorporate such principles as a part of her Constitution. The importance of the Directive Principles has since been fully realised and quite a few States, Burma, Indonesia, Nepal, Thailand and Pakistan, have incorporated them in their Constitutions.

✓ The Directive Principles and Fundamental Rights. The Directive Principles of State Policy are in many cases of wider import than the Fundamental Rights. Whereas the Fundamental Rights are, in effect, negative injunctions to the Government not to do certain things, the Directive Principles are positive commands to the Government to promote social welfare through corrective or constructive measures. But the Directive Principles differ in one vital respect from the Fundamental Rights. The former are non-justiciable whereas the latter are justiciable. That is to say, the Fundamental Rights are enforceable by the Courts as they are mandatory,⁹¹ while the Directive Principles are declaratory and have expressly been excluded from the purview of the Courts.⁹² If the Government does not take any positive action in promoting the objects set forth in the Directive Principles no action can be brought against it in a Court of law. But the Courts are bound to declare as void any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of any of the Fundamental Rights. The Courts cannot, on the other hand, declare any law void, which is otherwise valid, on the ground that it contravenes any of the Directives. In case of conflict between Fundamental Rights and Directive Principles the former will prevail in the Courts. The Supreme Court in the State of Madras v. Champakan Dorairajan held: "The Directive Principles of State policy which are expressly made unenforceable by a court cannot override the provisions in Part III which, notwithstanding other provisions, are expressly made enforceable by appropriate Writs, Orders or Directions under Article 32. The Chapter on Fundamental Rights is sacrosanct and not liable to be abridged by any Legislative or Executive act, or order except to the extent provided in the appropriate Article in Part III. The Directive Principles of State Policy have to conform to and run subsidiary to the Chapter on Fundamental Rights.... That is the correct way in which the provisions found in Parts III and IV have to be understood. However, so long as there is no infringement of any Fundamental Right, to the extent conferred by the provisions in Part III, there can be no objection to the State acting in accordance with the Directive Principles set out in Part IV, but subject again to the Legislative and Executive powers and limitations conferred on the State under different provisions of the Constitution." In Golak Nath case the Supreme Court rejected the argument of the Government that if Parliament was not given the power to amend the Constitution it would be difficult to implement the Directive Principles of State Policy and there would be revolution in the country. The majority judgment declined to take decision on such hypothetical situations and held, "If it is the duty of Parliament to enforce the Directive Principles it is equally its duty to do so without infringing upon the Fundamental Rights. The Constitution-makers thought that it could be done and we also think: That the Directive Principles could reasonably be enforced within the self-regulatory machinery provided by Part III of the Constitution." But it is to be noted that the Directive Principles constitute the national policy of the country which the representatives of the nation assembled in the Constituent Assembly formulated and enshrined in the Constitution. "Far from being a proclamation or promulgation of principles, the Directives constitute a pledge by the framers of the Constitution to the people of India and a failure to implement them would constitute not only a breach of faith with the people but would also render a vital part of the Constitution practically a dead letter."⁹³

The Directive principles of State Policy are in the nature of Instrument of Instructions, which both the Legislature and Executive authorities are expected to respect and follow, in enacting legislation to implement these "directive principles" and incorporate their spirit in the laws hereafter to be placed on the statute book. The Chairman of the Drafting Committee made this point expressly clear in the Constituent Assembly. Dr. Ambedkar observed, "The Directive Principles are like the Instrument of Instructions which were issued to the Governor-General and to the Governors of the Colonies and to those of India by the British Government under the 1935 Act. What is called 'Directive Principles' is merely another name for Instrument of Instructions. The only difference is that they are instructions to the Legislature and the Executive. Such a thing to my mind should be welcomed. Wherever there is a grant of power in general terms of peace, order and good government, it is necessary that it should be accompanied by instructions regulating its exercise."⁹⁴ Commenting on Article 32^m of the Constitution of Burma, which contains provisions similar to Article 37 of the Indian Constitution, B.N. Rau maintained that "they are in the nature of moral precepts for the State authorities and are open to the facile criticism that the Constitution is not the place for moral precepts. But they have an educative value and most modern Constitutions lay down general principles of this kind. They correspond to the Instrument of Instructions with which we are familiar in the Indian Constitution; only, instead of being addressed to the Governor-General or the Governor they are addressed to all State authorities, legislative or executive."⁹⁵

Value of the Directive Principles. The Directive Principles of State Policy have been variously criticised. It has been asserted that their inclusion in the Constitution is out of place for want of enforceability. The Directive Principles are, accordingly, nothing more than a political manifesto, devoid of any constitutional importance. Nasiruddin, a member of the Constituent Assembly, characterised them as a set of new year resolutions. Prof. K.T. Shah likened them to a cheque on a bank payable at the convenience of the bank. Dr. Wheare, Gladstone Professor of Government and Public Administration at the University of Oxford, described them as "a little more than a manifesto of aims and aspirations." He is of the opinion that a Constitution should include only those provisions which can be capable of enforcement and are, thus, obligatory on the State. The criticism offered by Jennings seems to be unfair when he says, "The ghosts of Sidney and Beatrice Webb stalk through the pages of the text. Part IV of the Constitution expresses Fabian Socialism without the Socialism, for only the 'nationalization of the means of production, distribution and exchange' is missing: but nationalization for the Fabians was a means to an end and not the end itself; the end is quite adequately expressed in the Constitution."⁹⁷ At another place Dr. Jennings questions the reasonableness of inserting in a Constitution a collection of political principles which "obviously derive from English experience in the nineteenth century and are deemed to be suitable for India in the middle of the twentieth century." He remarks that the ideas expressed in Part IV will survive for a generation and some of them may even survive for a longer period. "The question whether they are suitable for the twenty-first century, when the Constitution may still be in operation, cannot be answered, but it is quite probable that they will be entirely outmoded."⁹⁸

But, though the Principles enunciated in Part IV are not directly enforceable, it would be too cynical a view to take that they have no value. The aim of such constitutional declarations, as it has been said before, is to anchor the human rights of the Welfare State in the Constitution. The Directive Principles of State Policy declare the ideal of the Welfare State and emphasise that the regulatory State of the past has

95. It provides: "The principles set forth in this chapter are intended for the general guidance of the State. The application of these principles in legislation and administration shall be the care of the State but shall not be enforceable in any court of law."

given place to the Service State of the present day. Article 38 clearly prescribes that "The State shall strive to promote the welfare of the people by securing and protecting as effectively as it may a social order in which justice, social, economic and political, shall inform all the institutions of the national life." The State shall, in particular, direct its policy so that wealth, its source of production, and its means of distribution shall not be concentrated in the hands of a few, but shall be distributed so as to subserve the common good; there shall be adequate means of livelihood for all, and labour shall not be exploited or forced to operate in inhumane conditions; the standard of living shall be raised, and public health improved; public assistance shall be provided for the sick, disabled and aged; there shall be free and compulsory primary education; agriculture shall be improved and organised.⁹⁹

The aim of the Constitution, in short, is to establish a State which shall be a democracy not only in the political field where legislative authority is based on adult franchise and the executive is parliamentary, but also to promote a Welfare State where social and economic democracy, as Dr. Ambedkar put it, shall prevail.¹⁰⁰ Article 36 lays down that "the State shall strive to promote the welfare of the people...." Dr. Ambedkar stated in the Constituent Assembly that the word "strive" had been purposely used "because their intention was that however adverse the circumstances that stand in the way for Government in giving effect to these principles and however improptitious the time might be they should always strive for the fulfilment of the principles. Otherwise it would be open to the Government to say that circumstances were not good and the finances were so bad that they could not implement them."

There is a definite advantage in not making the Directive Principles enforceable and, accordingly, rigid. The Directive Principles require positive action on the part of the State to secure justice, social, economic and political. Actions of the State are the product of time and circumstances. Time moves on, circumstances change rapidly and so does our concept of justice. If the State policy is to adequately cater to the needs of the people and be in accordance with their sense of justice, it is neither expedient nor practicable to make the Directive Principles enforceable and, therefore, rigid. At the same time, they provide an element of permanency in democracy and make it possible for the parties of the Right and the Left to strive in their own way to reach the ideals of social and economic democracy whenever they get an opportunity to form the government after having received the verdict of the people at the polls. Dr. Ambedkar said in the Constituent Assembly: "We have deliberately introduced in the language that we have used in the Directive Principles, something which is not fixed or rigid. We have left enough room for the people of different ways of thinking, with regard to the reaching of the ideal of economic democracy, to strive in their own way, to persuade the electorate that it is the best way of reaching economic democracy; the fullest opportunity to act in the way in which they want to act."¹⁰¹

The Directive Principles, though not directly enforceable, are bound to affect decisions of Courts on constitutional matters. Being a part of the Constitutional Scheme, the Directive Principles do not, in the words of the late Chief Justice Kania, "represent a temporary will of a majority, but the deliberate wisdom of the nation expressed through the Constituent Assembly entrusted with the duty of settling the paramount and permanent law of the country."¹⁰² As the Directive Principles are a part of the Constitutional Scheme and the political, social and economic ideals expressed therein are fundamental in the governance of the country it, ipso facto, becomes the duty of the courts to safeguard them "from the vicissitudes of fortune of political parties who may come into and go out of power from time to time." The Directive Principles are intended to impart continuity to the national policies and it is for the Courts to see that this continuity does not become the plaything of party politics and retarded at any stage.

Moreover, many of the Fundamental Rights are subject to reasonable restrictions in the interests of public. In interpreting these rights, which are justiciable, the Courts have the obligation to lay down the canons for determining what is reasonable and a public interest and while doing so they must take cognizance of the Directive Principles as the Constitution holds them fundamental in the governance of the country. This point has been clearly explained in Surayopal Singh v. Government of Uttar Pradesh: "The distinction between public purpose and public policy may be well founded if by public policy is meant no more than the policy of the political party which then holds office. But the distinction ceases if by public policy is meant State policy or the policy solemnly laid down in the Constitution, the principles of which are declared to be fundamental to the governance of the country. A law made for the purpose of securing an aim declared in the Constitution to be a matter of State policy would be a public purpose. If, therefore, the acquisition of property sought to be effected by the U.P. Zamindari Abolition and Land Reforms Act, I of 1951, is for the purpose of implementing one or more of the Directive Principles of State policy it will be for the public purpose within the meaning of the Constitution and it will not be necessary for the courts to consider whether for other purposes it comes within the meaning which the law has given to that expression. In seeking to answer this question the court is not concerned with the wisdom of the means embodied in the Act to carry into effect the purpose of the Legislature; that it will neither approve nor condemn. The acquisition of the property effected by the U.P. Act has for its object the implementation of one or more of the Directive Principles of State policy and is, therefore, for a public purpose."

The mere fact, therefore, that a principle is not enforceable in a court of law does not deprive it of the Constitutional sanctity. Its violation is as much unconstitutional as a violation of a principle or provision which can be enforced in a court of law. If the Government pursues a policy which conflicts with the Directive Principles, it acts unconstitutionally, that is, contrary to the Constitution. And no ministry responsible to the people can afford light-heartedly to do so. Alan Gledhill rightly observes, "If the Indian Constitution becomes vested with the cope of sanctity essential to its durability it will be difficult for any public figure to propose any important legislative measures without making any appeal to the Fundamental Rights or the Directive Principles. Measures will be attacked by the opposition as 'unconstitutional' in so far as they conflict with the Directive Principles."¹⁰³

The Government in a parliamentary system of government is ever under scrutiny. The people and their leaders jealously scrutinize the actions of the Government and they measure its success or failure in the light of its achievements as prescribed by the Constitution. If the Government pursues a policy which is in accordance with the principles enunciated in the Constitution and caters to their sense of justice they would endorse its policy and allow it to continue in office. If it does not, the Government goes out of office. Thus, the vigilant public opinion operates as the sanction behind the Directive Principles. It follows, then, that although the Principles enunciated in Part IV of the Constitution lack, in the strictly legal sense, direct enforceability through the courts, they surely carry the sanction of public opinion as expressed in elections. The sanction of public opinion is the real force behind democracy. When a member of the Constituent Assembly moved an amendment which sought to make Directive Principles justiciable, another member observed: "There is no use being carried away by sentiments. We must be practical. We cannot go on introducing various provisions here which any government, if it is indifferent to public opinion, can ignore. It is not a court that can enforce these provisions or rights. It is the public opinion that is behind a demand that can enforce these provisions. Once in four (or five) years elections will take place and then it is open to the electorate not to send the very same persons who are indifferent to public opinion. That is the real sanction and not the sanction of any court of law."¹⁰⁴

Even if it be conceded that the Directive Principles of State Policy are in the nature of good resolutions or moral precepts still their importance cannot be denied. "The lives of countless individuals", writes Alan Gledhill, "have been shaped and re-directed by moral precepts impinging upon their minds, and it is not difficult to find instances of similar precepts directing the course of the history of nations."¹⁰⁵ The influence of Magna Carta is profound upon the development of the rights of Englishmen and various Acts of Parliament "may, without undue violence to the facts, be regarded as in direct line of descent from Magna Carta."¹⁰⁶ The Preamble to the American Declaration of Independence (1776) has considerably influenced the social and political development of that country, although it is neither a part of the American Constitution nor the ideals it enunciated are enforceable in Courts. Just as the provisions of the Magna Carta have affected the decisions of British Judges, and the Preamble to the Declaration of Independence the decision of American Judges, so shall the Principles of Directive Policy guide and shape the policy of the Government in India and influence the decisions of Indian Judges while interpreting the Constitution. How the Directive Principles have influenced and guided the decision of the Judges is evident from the State of Bihar vs. Kameshwar Singh. Answering the question whether there was any public purpose to justify the legislation which acquired compulsorily vast lands of private owners, Mr. Justice Mahajan observed, after quoting Article 37, "Now it is obvious that the concentration of big blocks of land in the hands of a few individuals is contrary to the principles on which the Constitution of India is based. The purpose of the acquisition contemplated by the Act, therefore, is to do away with the concentration of big blocks of land and means of production in the hands of a few individuals and to distribute the ownership and control of the material resources which come in the hands of the State, so as to subserve the common good as best possible."

But the effectiveness of the Directive Principles shall really depend upon the people of India and their political education. Professor Laski aptly observes, "Musty parchments will doubtless give them greater sanctity; they will not ensure their realization."¹⁰⁷ It is upon the vigilance of the people and their social conscience that the real success of the Constitution depends. Even the best of the Constitution that can be conceived and framed is sure to be reduced to a mere scrap of paper if citizens of the State show apathy and indifference in public affairs. It is an old maxim of Political Science that the people get the kind of government that they deserve. Hence it is up to the people of India to make the best of their Constitution and avail themselves of the opportunities that it provides no matter whether they are justiciable or not. If they become oblivious of their duties as citizens of the State, and the party in power does not properly enforce the Directive Principles the fault will not be that of the Constitution. It is, accordingly, suggested that efforts should be made for the political education of the masses as well as of the classes and thereby create conditions for the expression of genuine public opinion. That is the real sanction behind the Directive Principles. In order to create a healthy political climate it is imperative that Fundamental Rights and the Directive Principles of State Policy are taught to every school-going boy and girl.

Classification of the Directive Principles. The first three Articles (36, 37 and 38) of the Chapter on Directive Principles are general in character and deal with definitions, legal effects and objectives. The remaining Articles of the Chapter may, for purposes of clarity, be grouped into three distinct categories: (i) those that aim to shape India into a Welfare State; (ii) those that aim to shape India into a Gandhian State; and (iii) those that aim to promote International peace.

(i) Article 38 provides that the State shall promote the welfare of the people by securing and protecting as effectively as it may a social order in which justice—social, economic and political, shall inform all the institutions of the national life. Thus, promotion of the welfare of the people is the objective which the Constitution sets forth and aims to secure a social order where justice—social, economic and political, shall prevail. Welfare and justice are, accordingly, the twin objects of the Constitution. Article 39, then, proceeds to particularise some of the methods by which the object of general welfare, through justice, can be obtained and the basis of the new social order established. This Article finds adequate support from the provisions of subsequent Articles for bringing about what Prime Minister Nehru stated in Parliament a “caste-less and classless society” through the “peaceful and co-operative method.” With this end in view the State shall direct its policy in securing—

107. A Grammar of Politics, p. 103.

 - (d) equal pay for equal work for both men and women;¹¹¹ predominantly non-violent State of Gandhi's conception. The Directive Principles enjoin that:

- (a) the State shall take steps to organise village panchayats and endow them with such power and authority as may be necessary to enable them to function as units of self-government;¹¹⁹
- (b) the State shall endeavour to promote cottage industries on an individual or co-operative basis in rural areas.¹²⁰

Both these provisions aim at Sarvodaya. Sarvodaya or pure socialism, as Prof. S.N. Agarwal calls it,¹²¹ is the Gandhian technique of decentralized economy and "composite democracy" in the form of self-dependent and self-governing village communities or panchayats. While initiating the debate in Parliament on the economic policy of India, C.D. Deshmukh, the then Finance Minister, observed that whereas the development of major industries must continue in national interest it was necessary to develop small-scale and village industries "with great opportunities for employment and more and more chances of improving the resources of the population." Prime Minister Nehru, intervening in the debate, re-affirmed his policy of bringing about casteless and classless society through the peaceful and co-operative method. He further maintained that the biggest private sector in the country was "the private sector of peasant with his small holdings."

- (c) to promote with special care the educational and economic interests of the weaker sections of the people and in particular, of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes in order to protect them from social injustice and all forms of exploitation;¹²²
- (d) to bring about prohibition of the consumption, except for medicinal purposes, of intoxicating drinks and of drugs which are injurious to health;¹²³
- (e) to organise agriculture and animal husbandry on modern and scientific lines;¹²⁴
- (f) to take steps for preserving and improving the breeds, and prohibiting the slaughter of cows and calves and other milch and draught cattle;¹²⁵
- (g) to protect, preserve and maintain places of national and historical importance;¹²⁶ and

- (h) to take steps to separate judiciary from the executive;¹²⁷ and to secure for citizens a uniform civil code throughout the country.

III. In the international field India shall strive:

- (a) to promote international peace and security;¹²⁸
- (b) to maintain just and honourable relations between nations;¹²⁹
- (c) to foster respect for international law and treaty obligations;¹³⁰
- (d) to encourage settlement of international disputes by arbitration.¹³¹

These principles find their fullest expression in the external policy of India and Prime Minister Nehru's doctrine of dynamic neutrality. India's deep faith in co-existence, her advocacy of Panch Sheel and acceptance of these lofty ideals of peace and mutual tolerance by the major countries of the world is the greatest contribution which Independent India can claim. India has, indeed, saved world from disaster. Michael Foot writes, "power corrupts and the world owes Independent India an immense debt for helping to save us from the corruption of power on an international scale; which might so easily have led us to disaster."¹³² The five principles¹³³—(1) mutual respect for each other's territorial integrity and sovereignty; (2) non-aggression; (3) non-interference in each other's internal affairs for any reasons, either of an economic, political or ideological character (4) equality and mutual benefit; and (5) peaceful co-existence—contained in the Panch Sheel helped to outlaw from the minds of the Heads of the great States the possibility of war, little, of course, knowing that one of the signatories to the Panch Sheel would become an aggressor. "We have only one ambition", said Dr. Rajendra Prasad, addressing the Constituent Assembly at midnight on August 14, 1947, "and that is to make our contribution to the building of peace and freedom for all". India has done so and still holds steadfast to this spirit which inspires the last of the Directive Principles, though herself a victim of imperialistic designs by a country outwardly wedded to anti-imperialist policy. From ancient times India has been a land where a tradition of peace and love of tranquillity have pervaded the life of the people. Gandhi glorified this tradition through his weapons of Truth and Ahimsa, the framers enshrined it in the Constitution which they made and those noble ideals have ever since guided the statesmen who are responsible for moulding the destiny of India.

Implementation of Directive Principles. The Lok Sabha rejected, on August 31, 1958, by a voice vote a resolution moved by Tushar Chatterjee, Communist Member of Parliament, urging the appointment of a 15-member Parliamentary Committee to inquire into the implementation of the Directive Principles of State Policy embodied in the Constitution. While moving his resolution Chatterjee catalogued the failures of the Government and maintained that "the common people did not feel any difference from the state of affairs that existed during the British days and conditions that existed today. Several problems like food, education and health still remained unsolved while the life of the common people had become more burdensome and difficult. They could not but feel that these solemn declarations in the Constitution were not directives but only 'decoratives' in the Constitution."¹³⁴

The Minister for Home Affairs, B.N. Datar, in his reply to the criticism raised by Tushar Chatterjee said that the Directive Principles were like a "manifesto of aims" and were not a matter of immediate achievement. "They are directives to which we have to go. They are trends of tendencies that have to be taken into account in laying down the policies of the Government." B.N. Datar further added that the Government in all the policies had kept uppermost the Directives laid down in these Principles. The policy of the Government had been shaped according to these Principles which was more than evident in the social, labour and economic legislation undertaken by it. This was also evident in the work of the Planning Commission. "Every decision of the Planning Commission has been guided or coloured by the Directive Principles."

The Communists and Socialists are seldom fair to the Congress Government. They deliberately minimise the achievements of the Government and paint the economic picture of the country much darker than it actually is. The problem of achieving full employment, appreciably raising the living standards, and an equitable distribution of national wealth is colossal and no Government, whatever its party complexion, can work miracles. It will take several decades to achieve the goal set in the Directive Principles and create a Welfare State in the true sense of the term. The economic development of the country depends upon hard and sustained work of all sections of the people and upon their ability to make sacrifices for a brighter and happier future. But there is a strong feeling among the people that Government is not strong enough to checkmate the designs of the anti-social elements and overcome difficulties created by the privileged classes in the way of realising a Socialist Society. Whatever be the reasons of such a feeling and whether the feeling is right or wrong, no one can deny that it is there and the Government cannot remain oblivious of this fact. A man in the street is frankly sceptical about the possibility of an equitable socio-economic order being created in the near future. It is, therefore, necessary rather imperative that the Government should periodically provide an opportunity to the people and their representatives to evaluate its policies and find out whether we are following the right direction and whether we are moving towards our goal with resolution and courage. If welfare is to be real and a matter of substance, it is necessary that those for whom welfare is sought in the policies of the Government must be consulted. "A Government", says Prof. Laski, "which embarks on policy must offer the means of judging that policy. The opinion it has elicited by organised inquiry is fundamental to that end. The evidence it has collected, the facts at its disposal, can never be refused to its subjects if it is to build its opinion in the reasoned judgment of its citizens."¹³⁵ That is the way for the Directive Principles of State Policy to help India steer clear of the two extremes, the dictatorship of the proletariat which destroys the liberty of the individual and a capitalist oligarchy which cripples and frustrates the masses so far as their economic security is concerned. Malcontents of today are the revolutionaries of tomorrow and the Directive Principles of State Policy ensure the eventual emergence of an economic democracy in a bid to sustain political democracy. Political democracy without economic democracy is a sham affair.

GOVERNMENT AT THE CENTRE THE PRESIDENT

Nature of the Union Executive. One of the most important questions to engage the attention of the Constitution-makers related to the nature of the Executive. Dr. Ambedkar observed in introducing the Constitution, "A student of constitutional law, if a copy of a Constitution is placed in his hands, is sure to ask two questions. Firstly, what is the form of Government that is envisaged in the Constitution; and, secondly, what is the form of the Constitution? For these are the two crucial matters which every Constitution has to deal with."¹ From the earliest stages of the discussions on the principles of the new Constitution there was an overwhelming opinion in favour of the Parliamentary system of Government.² In the Memorandum on the Principles of the Union Constitution,³ submitted by Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar and N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar, for the consideration of the Union Constitution Committee, it was specifically suggested that the Executive "power of the federation will, subject to the provisions of the Constitution, be exercised by, or on the authority of a Council of Ministers, to be called Cabinet, which will be collectively responsible to the House of Representatives."⁴ It may, however, be noted that at this stage it was contemplated to confer certain special powers on the President. In his Memorandum on the Union Constitution prepared by the Constitutional Adviser for the use of the Union Constitution Committee, it was provided that "there shall be a Council of Ministers, with the Prime Minister at the head, to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions, except in so far as he is required by this Constitution to act in his discretion."⁵ The President was also to be vested with specified

3. June, 1947.

4. The Framing of India's Constitution, Select Documents, op. citd., Vol. II, p. 546.

5. In a note on this clause it was stated, "Although under responsible government the head of the State acts for the most part on the advice of Ministers responsible to the Legislature, nevertheless there are certain matters in which he is entitled to exercise his own discretion: e.g., (in certain events) in the choice of a Prime Minister and in the dissolution of Parliament. In India, such matters as the appointment of Judges, the protection of minorities and the suppression of widespread disorder may properly be added to the list. Of special responsibilities* and where any special responsibility of the President was involved, he exercised his discretion as to the action to be taken. But to safeguard against the arbitrary use of discretionary authority by the President, the Constitutional Adviser had provided for the creation of a Council of State, a kind of Privy Council, consisting of the Prime Minister, the Deputy Prime Minister, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the Presiding officers of the two Houses of Parliament, the Attorney-General, such former Presidents, Prime Ministers and Chief Justices as were willing and able to serve on the Council, and not more than seven other persons of experience and eminence appointed by the President. This was really a system of checks and balances designed to prevent both the President and the Ministry from resorting to an arbitrary use of untrammelled authority.

This matter was considered by the Union Constitution Committee on June 8 and 9, 1947. The Committee generally agreed that the Union Executive should be of the Parliamentary type and that the President should have no special responsibilities as suggested by the Constitutional Adviser in his Memorandum and that he would exercise his powers, including the power to dissolve Parliament, only on the advice of his Ministers.⁷ This recommendation of the Committee also made Constitutional Adviser's proposal for the setting up of the Council of State infructuous.

When the Report of the Union Constitution Committee came up for consideration before the Constituent Assembly, there was general agreement for establishing a Parliamentary form of Executive. The critics of such a system of government, Kazi Syed Karimuddin and Hussain Imam, however, moved an amendment proposing a non-Parliamentary Executive. Hussain Imam thought that the system of Government, as obtainable in the United States of America, was "more democratic and based on better and sounder principles" than the Parliamentary system of British type.

course, it may not always be possible for the President to use his "discretionary" powers. Thus a Ministry may threaten to resign if in the exercise of "discretionary" power he overrules them; in that case, the President can do so only if he has the support of the Legislature and can get an alternative Ministry enjoying its confidence. Failing this he can dissolve the Legislature and appeal to the electorate in an extreme case. Thus the "discretionary" powers will at least give the President a chance of appealing to the Legislature and, in the last resort, to the people." Ibid., p. 476.

6. The following special responsibilities were proposed in the Memorandum:

- (a) the prevention of any grave menace to the peace or tranquillity of the Union or any part thereof;
- (b) the safeguarding of the financial stability and credit of the Union government;
- (c) the safeguarding of the legitimate interests of minorities.

In a note to this clause it was stated, "The matters referred to in this clause may be regarded as matters of national importance in the decision of which any party bias was to be avoided. The President is therefore enjoined in these matters to act in his discretion and will have available to him the advice of the Council of State." Ibid., p. 477.

7. Minutes of the Meetings of the Union Constitution Committee, June 8 and 9, 1947. Ibid., pp. 554-55.

The Constituent Assembly finally accepted the principle of a Parliamentary Executive collectively responsible to the representative chamber of Parliament and the Drafting Committee based the Draft Constitution on this concept.*

In the Draft Constitution of February 1948, there was a provision made for the Instrument of Instructions, as embodied in the Government of India Act, 1935, for Governors alone. The Drafting Committee decided, on further consideration, to remedy the omission and provide for one for the President too. Accordingly, in October 1948, the Committee gave notice of an amendment to Article 62 of the Draft Constitution proposing to add a new clause: "In the choice of the Ministers and the exercise of his other functions under this Constitution the President shall be generally guided by the instructions set out in Schedule III—A, . . ."

The draft of the Instrument of Instructions prepared by the Drafting Committee was much more elaborate than the corresponding instructions to the Governors. The Instrument of Instructions, inter alia, directed the President to set up an Advisory Board consisting of not less than 15 members of the two Houses of Parliament elected by proportional representation. This Board was to advise the President on the appointments of the Chief Justices and other Judges of the Supreme Court and High Courts, Ambassadors, the Auditor-General, the chairman and other members of the Union Public Service Commission, and the members of the Election Commission. The Instrument further required the President to consult the Advisory Board on any other appointment, other than of the Governor of a State, if required to do so by a resolution passed by both Houses of Parliament.

Ambedkar's amendment adding a clause in the Constitution for an Instrument of Instructions to guide the President in the exercise of his functions was accepted by the Constituent Assembly. On October 11, 1949, however, when the new Schedule III-A containing the Instrument of Instructions was due to be considered by the Assembly, T.T. Krishnamachari expressed the desire of the Drafting Committee that the proposal for the inclusion of the Instrument of Instructions to the President should be dropped. He also moved that a similar Instrument already included in the Draft Constitution for Governors as the Fourth Schedule, should be omitted and also the consequential clause.

The Drafting Committee appeared to have been persuaded by Jawaharlal Nehru to accept the view that the Council of Ministers should be collectively responsible to the representative Chamber of Parliament and, under the circumstances, it would be impolitic to confer on the President, through the Instrument of Instructions, powers that might give him an effective voice in the formation of the Council of Ministers or in moulding the policies of the Government. Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar forcefully put this point in the Constituent Assembly. This view was accepted and the proposal to omit the Instrument of Instructions and the related clause was approved.

The President of India. The Constitution provides for a President of India⁹ and the executive power of the Union including the Supreme Command of Defence Forces is vested in him.¹⁰ But the executive power of the union vested in the President must be exercised in accordance with the Constitution¹¹ and the Constitution prescribes that there shall be a Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister at the head to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions.¹² When this provision is read with other provisions of the Constitution, the constitutional position of the President of India becomes abundantly clear. Under Article 75(3), the Council of Ministers is made collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha (House of the People). Under Article 78(a) the Prime Minister is required to communicate to the President all decisions of the Council of Ministers. Clause (c) of the same Article further provides that it is the duty of the Prime Minister, if the President so requires, to submit to the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister but which has not been considered by the Council.

The logical implication of all these provisions is that the President of India is bound to act on the advice of his responsible ministers, although the executive power of the Union is vested in him and all executive actions of the Government of India must be expressed to be taken in his name.¹³ There is no provision in the Constitution making the President responsible for the acts of the Government. The Council of Ministers, on the other hand, has been specifically made responsible to the Lok Sabha (House of the People). There would have been no sense in making the Council of Ministers responsible to the Lok Sabha, if the final authority of deciding matters concerning the executive actions of the Union is not conferred by the Constitution on them. Article 78, Clauses (a) and (c) make the conferment of such authority in clear terms, although dubious meanings have been given by some writers to these clauses.¹⁴

It is significant to note that the Constitution simply creates the office of the "President of India."¹⁵ Nowhere does it say that the President is either the Head of the State or the Head of the Executive. The omission is deliberate. The Union Constitution Committee proposed to call the President the "Head of the Federation",¹⁶ but the Drafting Committee omitted both the words 'Head' as well as 'Federation' and created the President of India. When this article of the Draft Constitution was being discussed in the Constituent Assembly Prof. K. T. Shah moved an amendment that "the Chief Executive and Head of the State in the Union shall be called the President."¹⁷ Dr. Ambedkar opposed it and said, "His amendment, if I understood him correctly, is fundamentally different from the whole scheme as has been adopted in the Draft Constitution. Prof. Shah uses the words 'Chief Executive and the Head of the State'. I have no doubt about it that what he means by the introduction of these words is to introduce in the American presidential form of executive but not the parliamentary form of executive which is contained in the Draft Constitution.¹¹⁸

The Constitution, therefore, establishes a Parliamentary form of Government and the Head of the State is a necessary adjunct of such a system no matter whether he is a King or a President. The real functionaries are the responsible Ministers who make and run the government. Jawaharlal Nehru told the Constituent Assembly, "We want to emphasise the ministerial character of the Government, that power really resided in the ministry and in the legislature and not in the President as such."¹¹⁹ There were various supporting reasons with the Father-framers to adopt such a form of Government. They were keen to devise a system of government which should combine stability with responsibility. Britain was the best example, it was argued which presented both these virtuous elements of government. K.M. Munshi emphatically said, "The strongest government and the most elastic executive have been found to be in England and that is because the executive powers vest in the cabinet supported by a majority in the lower House which has financial powers under the Constitution. As a result it is the rule of the majority in the legislature, for it supports its leaders in the Cabinet, which advises the head of the State, namely, the King. The King is thus placed above party. He is really made the symbol of the impartial dignity of the Constitution. The Government in England is found strong and elastic under all circumstances.... We must not forget a very important fact that during the last hundred years, Indian public life has largely drawn upon the traditions of British Constitutional law. Most of us have looked up to the British model as the best. For the last thirty or forty years, some kind of responsibility has been introduced in the governance of this country. Our constitutional traditions have become parliamentary and we have now all our Provinces functioning more or less on the British model. To-day, the Dominion Government of India is functioning as a full-fledged parliamentary government. After this experience, why should we go back upon the tradition that has been built over a hundred years and try a novel experiment....?"¹²⁰

The Parliamentary form of Government with which the Indians were adequately familiar ensured daily assessment of policy rather than a periodic assessment upon which the American system of Government is founded. Moreover, under the Presidential system there is no cohesion between the executive and legislative departments of the government. The party ties which bind the two departments are too flimsy for an integrated policy. The incoherency and irresponsibility so often exhibited by the American system has been viewed by the statesmen of that country with alarm and various plans ensuring co-ordination between the executive and the legislative departments have been suggested from time to time, though without any tangible results. India could not afford to hazard such a risk. Her imminent necessity, after one and a half century of bondage, was to devise a system of government which should be responsive and responsible so that manifold policies of national development aimed to secure for the people economic democracy, as envisaged in the Objectives Resolution, could be planned, sanctioned and executed without the least possibilities of conflict and friction between the executive and legislative departments of the Government. Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar elaborated this point in the Constituent Assembly. He said, "There are obvious difficulties in the way of working the Presidential system. Unless there is some kind of close union between the Legislature and the Executive, it is sure to result in a spoils system... Parliament may take one line of action and the Executive may take another line of action. An infant democracy cannot afford, under modern conditions, to take the risk of a perpetual cleavage, feud or conflict or threatened conflict between the Legislature and the Executive. The objective of the present constitutional structure is to prevent a conflict between the Executive and the Legislature and to promote harmony between the different parts of the governmental system.... After weighing the pros and cons of the Parliamentary Executive as they obtain in Great Britain, in the Dominions and in some of the continental Constitutions, and the Presidential type of government as it obtains in the United States of America, the Indian Constitution had adopted the institution of Parliamentary Executive."²¹

Although the Constitution establishes a Parliamentary form of Government and it is working at the Centre and in the States for the last two decades, eminent opinion in the country is now veering round the Presidential form of Government and since the 1967 General Elections its advocates have become many. K.M. Munshi, one of the few living members of the 7-man Committee which drafted the Indian Constitution, expressed an opinion that if he were to frame a Constitution for the country again he would favour the Presidential system as in the United States. He said, "Those of us who supported the British Cabinet system, to which we were accustomed, thought that it would work effectively in India, but I must confess that we have failed to evolve the two-party democratic tradition necessary to support the cabinet system.... The cabinet system of Government has not been a success.... We are heading towards a situation in which either the presidential system or military rule would become inevitable."²² K.S. Hedge, Chief Justice of the Delhi High Court and now a Judge of the Supreme Court, said on April 15, 1967, that the Constitution should be reshaped to provide, among other things, for the Presidential form of Government. For multiplicity of political parties might soon lead in India to conditions similar in pre-De Gaulle France.²³ Madhu Limaye, a Member of Parliament, speaking on

"Future of Parliamentary Democracy in India," observed that many people in India were doubting whether democracy was successful in India. Some were thinking whether Presidential form of Government would not be better than the present Parliamentary form of Government. Limaye was of the opinion that adoption of Presidential form of Government involving separation of executive and legislative functions might foster national feeling during the election of the President and may also help emergence of two strong contending parties or coalition of parties."

S.N. Mishra, Deputy Leader of the Congress Parliamentary Party, declared in New Delhi, that the Congress Socialist Forum had come to the opinion that the Presidential system might prove helpful in facing the challenges which had come up after the 1967 General Elections. B.P. Sinha, former Chief Justice of India, delivering his Convocation Address of Indore University on January 13, 1968, suggested that the Constitution be amended to provide for a Presidential form of Government. The present federal system of government, he said, had only "succeeded in creating during the last twenty years of independence confusion if not chaos" in several State Governments. The Presidential form of Government with a President at the Centre and Governors in States with power to choose governing bodies could achieve a well-established, strong and efficient Government at all levels. The Ex-Deputy Prime Minister, Morarji Desai, on the other hand, had stated that the Presidential form of Government would bring in dictatorship. He pleaded for the retention of Parliamentary form of Government which the Constitution so wisely established. There is, however, no denying the fact that the democratic instincts of Indians have proved immature and the bane of defections after the 1967 General Elections has demoralized politics thereby threatening the future of Parliamentary democracy in India. If the Presidential system at all comes it will mean total revision of the Constitution and till it comes Parliamentary form of Government continues at the Centre and in the States.

Qualifications and Compensation of the President. The Constitution requires that the President should be a citizen of India, must have completed the age of thirty-five years and is qualified for election as a member of the Lok Sabha.²⁴ But he must not at the time of his election hold any office of profit under any Government federal, State or local. A person, however, is not to be deemed to hold any office of profit by reason only that he is the President or Vice-President of the Union or the Governor of any State or is a Minister either for the Union or for any State. The President must not be a member of either House of Parliament or

The corresponding provision in the American Constitution is, "No person except a natural born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this constitution, shall be eligible to the office of the President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years and been fourteen years a resident within the United States", Art. II, sec. 1 (5).

the State Legislatures and if he is, he must vacate his seat in that House before he enters upon his office as President.²⁶ In order to prevent abuse of authority by such candidates, the Constitution vests the superintendence, direction and control for the election of President in the Election Commission which, in its turn, is subject to the control of Parliament.²⁷ The decision on doubts and disputes relating to the election of President rests with the Supreme Court, and its decision is final.²⁸ The procedure according to which the Supreme Court will inquire into and decide such disputes is to be determined by the Court itself.

The salary and other emoluments, allowances and privileges to which the President is entitled are determined by Parliament.²⁹ They cannot, however, be increased or diminished during his term of office.³⁰ Parliament fixed the salary at Rs. 10,000 a month and a pension of Rs. 15,000 a year on vacating Presidency. The President is also entitled, without payment of rent, to the use of official furnished residence. He is permitted to spend a total amount of Rs. 15,26,000 a year on travel, entertainment, discretionary grants, staff, household expenses and his own allowances. When the first President relinquished office in 1962, Parliament supplemented the pension by Rs. 12,000 a year for incidental expenses, besides free medical aid. The pension of the President is income-tax free.

Term of Office. The President holds office for five years and is eligible for re-election.³¹ He may resign before the expiration of his term of office and that "he might conceivably do so," writes Gledhill, "to resolve a conflict between himself and the Council of Ministers."³² The Constitution provides that such resignation should be addressed to the Vice-President who is required forthwith to communicate it to the Speaker of the Lok Sabha.³³ But the Constitution-makers had not provided for a situation arising from the resignation of the Acting President. V.V. Giri, who acted as President after the death of Dr. Zakir Husain, expressed his desire on July 16, 1969 to resign³⁴ in order to contest the Presidential election scheduled for August 16, 1969. Since the Constitution did not provide for a clear-cut direction in regard to a situation where the Vice-President was acting as President, V.V. Giri resigned from the office of the Vice-President, in accordance with the advice of the Attorney-General, and addressed his letter of resignation to the President of India. Copies of the letter sent to the President's Secretariat were forwarded to the Prime Minister and the Chief Justice of India.

The President is liable to impeachment for violating the Constitution,³⁵ the expression "violation of the Constitution" has not been defined. Under the American Constitution impeachment of the President lies for treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanours.³⁶ The Constitution of Eire provides for impeachment in case of stated misbehaviour.³⁷ According to the Burmese Constitution the President may be impeached for high treason, violation of the Constitution or gross misconduct.³⁸

The manner in which impeachment proceedings take place in India is covered by Article 61. Either House of Parliament may prefer the charge for impeaching the President by moving a resolution, provided fourteen days' notice has been given to that effect by not less than one-fourth of the total membership of that House. If the resolution passes by a majority of two-thirds of the total membership of the House initiating the charge of impeachment, then, the other House investigates the charge. But instead of making the investigation itself, the House may delegate the work of investigation to any court or tribunal appointed by the House for that purpose.³⁹ The President has the right to appear in person or be represented at such investigation. If the House investigating the charge passes a resolution by a two-thirds majority that the charge has been sustained, the impeachment succeeds and the President is removed from his office from the day on which such resolution is passed.

Under the American Constitution, which follows the British precedent, the power to initiate impeachment proceedings lies with the popular chamber, the House of Representatives. After the initiation of the proceedings, the House appoints a special committee out of its own members to investigate into the charges. This Committee may, then, recommend to the House that the charges be incorporated in Articles for Impeachment and transmitted to the Senate for action. When that is done, the Senate, presided over by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, hears the impeachment as a regular trial. A two-thirds vote of the Senators present at the impeachment is necessary for conviction.⁴⁰ In India either of the two Houses can initiate impeachment proceedings and if a resolution to that effect is passed by a two-thirds majority of the House, then, the other House investigates the charge and decides.

Eligibility for re-election. On the question of eligibility for re-election the Constitution of India does not impose any express restrictions to the number of terms, consecutive or otherwise, for which a person can be elected President. It simply provides that "A person who holds, or who has held, office as President shall, subject to the other provisions of this Constitution, be eligible for re-election to the office." The Union Constitution Committee had recommended that a retiring President would not seek election beyond the second term and the Constituent Assembly accepted this suggestion.⁴¹ But when the Draft Constitution came under discussion, the point was made that, if there was a capable and efficient man, there was no reason why he should not be allowed to serve the country beyond two terms and, accordingly, an amendment was moved for removing the restriction that the President would be eligible to hold office for two terms only.⁴² Dr. Ambedkar accepted the amendment and all restrictions on the eligibility for re-election were withdrawn.

Raghunath Singh, Congress Member of Parliament, sponsored a non-official Bill in the Lok Sabha on September 6, 1957, favouring restriction to two consecutive terms. The supporters of the Bill argued that if the same individual occupied the highest office in any country too long, there was a danger of dictatorship. The opponents of the Bill contended that the real power was vested in India in the Prime Minister and not in the President and hence the danger of any President ever becoming a dictator in this country was imaginary. Raghunath Singh withdrew his Bill after the Law Minister, Ashoka Sen, expressed the view that such matters should be left to convention and not decided by statute. "Why take away the power," the Law Minister said, "to meet a particular situation when really you can achieve the very same purpose by building up conventions suited to needs which you may feel from time to time?"⁴³ The Law Minister added that it was for the party in power to show the way towards the creation of healthy conventions. "If it is felt by the party in power or the House that conventions of this sort should be built up, I have no doubt that they will be built up."⁴⁴

Dr. Rajendra Prasad set a convention, as Washington did in the United States, for two terms tenure, that is, ten years in all, and thus, helped to offer a guide to the limitation and rotation of high offices of power and trust. Rajendra Prasad and George Washington were the first Presidents after the inauguration of the Constitutions of their countries. Good men are, indeed, hard to find, but they set virtuous precedents for the unworthy men who otherwise are harder to get rid of. In 1962, Dr. S. Radhakrishnan, who till then was the Vice-President of India, was elected in place of Dr. Rajendra Prasad. He did not contest for the second term and Dr. Zakir Hussain was elected President in 1967.

Succession to Presidency. The Constitution provides for succession to Presidency after the expiration of the term of office of the President, by reason of his death, resignation or removal. A new President must be elected before the expiration of the term of office of the incumbent for the time being. If the new President has not been elected, then, the incumbent of the office continues until his successor enters upon his office.⁴⁵ If the office of the President becomes vacant owing to the death of the incumbent or to any other cause before the expiry of his term of office, a new President must be elected within six months.⁴⁶ In the meantime, the Vice-President acts as President and performs the duties and functions attached to the office.⁴⁷ The newly elected President enjoys a full term of five years and not the remainder of the term of his predecessor.⁴⁸

But the Constitution does not provide for a situation in which the offices of both the President and the Vice-President become vacant. To remedy the omission Parliament passed in May 1969, the President (Discharge of Functions) Act providing for the discharge of Presidential duties in certain contingencies and putting the Chief Justice of India, or in his absence, the senior-most Judge of the Supreme Court, in the line of succession. On the resignation of the Acting President, V.V. Giri, the Chief Justice of India, M. Hidayatullah, succeeded Giri till the Presidential elections were held and the newly elected President assumed office. The Home Minister made it clear in Parliament that the Act in no way intended to determine succession to the Presidency. It was just to fill a vacuum if the Vice-President who can act as, or discharge the functions of, the President, is for any reason incapacitated or is not available.

Mode of Election. The process of election of the President is original and no other Constitution contains a similar procedure. The President is elected by the members of an Electoral College consisting of (a) the elected members of both Houses of Parliament, and (b) the elected members of the Legislative Assemblies of the States. The President is, thus, elected by the representatives of the people, and the citizens play no direct part in his election. The main reasons which influenced the deliberations of the Constituent Assembly for determining indirect Presidential elections were:

(1) The Constitution established the Parliamentary system of Government and the real authority under such a system resides in the Ministry and the Legislature whose members are chosen directly by the people. It is anomalous under such a system to have a President elected on adult franchise in as much as such a President can claim to derive his authority directly from the people and thereby come into conflict with the Ministry and Parliament. What the framers of the Constitution desired was to "emphasise the ministerial character of the government that power really resided in the Ministry and the Legislature." The best way to ensure it was to make the election of the President indirect and thereby avoid all apprehensions of conflict and political manipulation.

(2) Popular election of the President, it was feared, would intensify party rivalry extending its influence over the whole range of politics and produce a radical change in the character of public life. The President would become the standard bearer of a party or a combination of parties. He could hardly be expected to maintain, under the circumstances, the mediating attitude as head of the nation. If the President is popular and commanded the respect of the people, he may use his position and authority to the detriment of the party in power in case of disagreement between the two and even make a bid to become a hero. Dr. Ambedkar was so much afraid of the tradition of hero-worship in India that he made a particular reference to it on the third reading of the Constitution in the Constituent Assembly.⁴⁹

(3) The Electoral College, consisting of members of Parliament and State Legislatures for electing the President, it was claimed, would avoid a partisan choice and ensure really national election for the highest office in the State.

(4) India is almost a sub-continent with an electorate of more than seventeen crores. Direct Presidential elections, after every five years, by this staggering number of voters would have necessitated huge electoral machinery every time. This was considered far too much waste of time, effort and money over the election of the formal Head of the State.

Procedure for the election of the President. After providing in Article 54 that the President shall be elected by an Electoral College consisting of: (a) the elected members of both Houses of Parliament; and (b) the elected members of the Legislative Assemblies of the States (but not of the Union Territories), the Constitution proceeds in Article 55 to provide the procedure for election by the system of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote.⁵⁰ The Constitution also provides for weighing of votes⁵¹ for the purpose (a) of securing as far as possible, uniformity in the scale of representation of the different States, and (b) for securing parity between the States as a whole and the Union. For the purpose of securing such uniformity and parity the following method is laid down.⁵² This method makes the Presidential election complicated:

1. In order to secure uniformity in the scale of representation of the different States it is provided that every elected member of the Legislative Assembly of a State shall have as many votes as there are multiples of one thousand in the quotient obtained by dividing the population of the State by the total number of the elected members of the Assembly. To put it in simple words, each member of the Electoral College who is a member of a State Legislature has as many votes as are obtained by the formula:

49. Dr. Ambedkar said: "The second thing we must do to preserve democracy is to observe the caution which John Stuart Mill has given to all who are interested in the maintenance of democracy, namely, not to lay their liberties at the feet of even a great man or trust him with powers which enable to subvert their institutions. This caution is far more necessary in the case of India than in the case of any other country. For in India, Bhakti or what may be called the path of devotion or heroworship, plays a part in politics unequalled in magnitude by the part it plays in the politics of any other part of the world. Bhakti in religion may be an aid to the salvation of the soul. But in politics, Bhakti or heroworship is sure road to degradation and to eventful dictatorship."

Fractions exceeding one half being counted as one.

The following illustration was given in the Draft Constitution⁵³ in explanation of the method of calculation. Article 44 of the Draft Constitution corresponds to Article 55 of the Constitution of India.

"The population of Bombay is 20,849,840. Let us take the total number of elected members in the Legislative Assembly for Bombay to be 208 (i.e., one member representing one lakh of the population). To obtain the number of votes which each such elected member will be entitled to cast at the election of the President, we have first to divide 20,849,840 (which is the population) by 208 (which is the total number of elected members), and then to divide the quotient by 1000. In this case the quotient is 100,239. The number of votes which each such member will be entitled to cast would be 100,239/1,000, i.e., 100 (disregarding the remainder 239 which is less than five hundred).

(i) Again, the population of Bikaner is, 1,292,938. Let us take the total number of elected members of the Legislature of Bikaner to be 130 (i.e., one member representing roughly ten thousand of the population). Now applying the aforesaid process, if we divide 1,292,938 (i.e., the population) by 130 (i.e., the total number of elected members), the quotient is 9,945. Therefore, the number of votes which each member of the Bikaner Legislature would be entitled to cast is 9,945/1,000, that is, 10 (counting the remainder 945 which is greater than five hundred as equivalent to 1,000)."

2. For securing parity between the States as a whole and the Union, the votes of each member of Parliament will be according to this formula:

$$\frac{\text{Total number of votes assigned to elected members of the Legislative Assemblies of the States}}{\text{Total number of the elected members of both Houses of Parliament.}}$$

Fractions exceeding one half being counted as one.

Reverting to the illustration given in the Draft Constitution:

"If the total number of votes assigned to the members of the Legislatures of the States in accordance with the above calculation be 74,940 and the total number of elected members of both the Houses of Parliament be 750, then to obtain the number of votes which each member of either House of Parliament will be entitled to cast at the election of the President, we should have to divide 74,940 by 750. Thus, the number of votes which each such member will be entitled to cast in the case would be $\frac{74,940}{750} = 99\frac{23}{25}$, i.e., 100 (the fraction $\frac{23}{25}$ which exceeds one-half being counted as one)."

53. See Foot-note to Article 44 (2), p. 17.

The three important features of the Presidential election system and procedure, therefore, are:

- (1) proportional representation by means of single transferable vote;
- (2) parity of votes between the members of the State Assemblies on the one hand and elected members of both the Houses of Parliament; and
- (3) as far as practicable uniformity of representation of the various States according to their population ascertained at the last census.

The following table gives the actual number of votes a member of the Electoral College had in the 1967 Presidential election:

Parliament

	Total No. of MPs	"Value" of each Vote
Lok Sabha	520	576
Rajya Sabha	228	576

The total "value" of the votes of all members of the Electoral College was 8,61,696. Dr. Zakir Hussain polled 4,71,244 votes and his close rival, K. Suba Rao, the former Chief Justice of India, 3,63,971 votes.

The Chief Election Commissioner fixes the programme for election. The nomination papers are called to reach the Returning Officer by the appointed date. Members of Parliament and Members of State Assemblies only can propose a candidate for election. Nominations are then scrutinised and the names of the validly nominated candidates are published in the Gazette of India. The election is held on the fixed date in accordance with the system of proportional representation by means of a single transferable vote, the voting being done by a secret ballot. The candidate who secures votes more than or equal to the quota is declared elected. If at the first count no candidate is able to secure the requisite quota of votes, the candidate securing the least number of votes is eliminated and his votes are transferred among other candidates according to the second preferences on the ballot papers of the voters who gave him first preference. The process of elimination and transfer of votes continues, in accordance with Rule 6 of the Presidential Election Rules, till such a candidate is found who has obtained the requisite quota of votes. Disputes, if any, about the election of the President are heard and decided by the Supreme Court.⁵⁴

Oath or affirmation by the President. Every President and every person acting as President or discharging the functions of President is required, before entering upon his office, to make and subscribe in the presence of the Chief Justice of India, or in his absence, the seniormost Judge of the Supreme Court available, an oath or affirmation in the prescribed form.⁵⁵ The oath or affirmation which the President of India is required to take demands from him:

- (i) to faithfully execute the office of the President or discharge the functions of the President;
- (ii) to preserve, protect and defend to the best of his ability the Constitution and the law; and
- (iii) to devote himself to the service and well-being of the people of India.

The American President, too, has to take an oath or affirmation before entering on the execution of his office to "faithfully execute the office of the President," and to the best of his "ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."⁵⁶ Both India and the United States resemble to that extent and the language of the oath or affirmation prescribed in the Constitutions of both the countries is very much alike. The idea of devotion to the service and well-being of the people in the Indian Constitution has been borrowed from Eire Constitution.⁵⁷

The oath which the executive Head of the State is required to take before assuming the office does not, according to Willoughby, add to the legal liability nor his powers as provided for in the Constitution.⁵⁸ The object is simply to impose a moral obligation.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT

The Vice-Presidency. The Constitution provides for the Vice-President and the office is modelled partly on the similar institution in the United States. Like the American Vice-President, the Indian Vice-President is the ex-officio Chairman of the Federal Upper Chamber, the Rajya Sabha (Council of States). The similarity between the two offices ends here. In the United States the Vice-President must meet all the qualifications of a President and he is elected by the same popularly elected electoral college which elects the President. The reason is obvious. The American Vice-President succeeds to the Presidency in the event of the President's death, resignation or removal and continues in the office for the unexpired portion of his predecessor's term, as did Harry Truman on the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Lyndon Johnson on the assassination of President Kennedy. The Vice-President of India, on the other hand, only acts as President in any casual vacancy in the office of President until a new President is elected in accordance with the provisions made in the Constitution to fill such a vacancy.⁵⁹ The terms of office of the President and the Vice-President in the United States are identical and both are subject to earlier removal only by the process of impeachment. The Vice-President of India is elected for a term of five years by the two Houses of Parliament at a joint session and may be removed from office by a resolution of the Rajya Sabha (Council of States), agreed to by the Lok Sabha (House of the People).

But the most important dissimilarity between the two offices is relating to their respective duties and functions. The Indian Vice-President is only the ex-officio Chairman of the Rajya Sabha and he draws his salary as such. In between the sessions of the Rajya Sabha, he may even go abroad on goodwill mission, as Dr. Radhakrishnan and Dr. Zakir Hussain had gone so often, but he has no participation in the Government of the country either directly or indirectly. Nor does he speak on behalf of the Government of India. Even the framers of the American Constitution were not too-enthusiastic about the Vice-Presidency. Benjamin Franklin took the position so lightly that he liked to have its holder addressed as "His Superfluous Highness." John Adams, the first holder of the office of the Vice-President, described it as "the most insignificant that ever the invention of man contrived." Another Vice-President described the position of the occupant of that office like "a man in a cataleptic fit. He is conscious of all that goes on but has no part in it." During recent years, however, the possibilities of the office have been fully demonstrated. President Harding associated Vice-President Collidge with Cabinet work. Franklin Roosevelt entrusted many responsibilities to Henry. A. Wallace. Although less close to Roosevelt in outlook, Harry Truman, as Vice-President, was able to help the President with Congressional problems. Richard Nixon was the first Vice-President to take an active part in the formulation and explanation of policy and he had been an integral member of the President's team. President Eisenhower had personal knowledge of the chaos that ensued when Truman stepped, almost wholly unprepared, into Franklin Roosevelt's shoes. Since the Vice-President succeeds to the Presidency in the event of the President's death, resignation or removal, it is now felt a national necessity to associate the Vice-President with the administration of the country so that he may have a thorough grasp of the major national and international policies. President Eisenhower, accordingly, insisted from the very beginning of his Presidential term that Nixon should see every State paper, and preside in his absence over meetings of the 'Cabinet' and the National Security Council. Kennedy followed Eisenhower. But this is not possible in India. The Vice-President does need no training like his counterpart in the United States as he fills in only a casual vacancy and takes over the Rashtrapati Bhavan until the President resumes his duties or a new President is elected and in no case later than six months from the date of the occurrence of the vacancy. Dr. Radhakrishnan acted twice for Dr. Rajendra Prasad and then reverted to his own position of Vice-President and so did Dr. Zakir Hussain when Dr. Radhakrishnan fell ill. V.V. Giri became the Acting President on the death of Dr. Zakir Hussain on May 3, 1969. It may be of interest to note that the Constitutional Adviser, B.N. Rau, did not contemplate in his first draft the creation of the office of the Vice-President. In the event of the death of the President or his removal from office or incapacity to discharge his functions, the Constitutional Adviser proposed a Commission consisting of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and the Presiding Officers of the two Houses of Parliament to carry on the administration until the election of a new President.

Election of the Vice-President. The Vice-President is elected by the members of both Houses of Parliament assembled at a joint meeting in accordance with the system of proportional representation by means of single transferable vote. The voting is by secret ballot. A candidate for the office of the Vice-President must be: (1) a citizen of India; (2) not less than thirty-five years of age; (3) eligible for election as a member of the Rajya Sabha; (4) he must not hold any office of profit under any Government, Central, State or Local; and (5) he must not be a member of either House of Parliament or of a House of the Legislature of any State. If he is a member of any House of Parliament or a House of State Legislature, he must resign before he enters upon his office as Vice-President.

The term of office of the Vice-President is five years. But he may resign his office before the expiry of the normal term. The letter of resignation must be addressed to the President of India. When V.V. Giri resigned on July 20, 1969, he addressed his letter of resignation to the President of India, although he himself was the Acting President. This procedure was followed on the advice of the Attorney General.

The Vice-President may also be removed from his office by a resolution of the Rajya Sabha (Council of States) passed by a majority of all the then members of the Rajya Sabha and agreed to by the Lok Sabha. The Constitution does not fix any minimum number for the members of the Rajya Sabha to move such a resolution. But no resolution for the removal of the Vice-President can be moved unless fourteen days notice has been given to that effect. The Vice-President, however, continues to hold office, notwithstanding the expiration of his term, until his successor enters upon his office.⁶⁰ All doubts and disputes about the election of Vice-President, like that of the President, must be inquired into and decided by the Supreme Court whose decision on the matter is final.⁶¹ The Vice-President has, before entering upon his office, to make and subscribe before the President, or some other person appointed by him, an oath or affirmation in the prescribed form.⁶² He swears to bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of India and to faithfully discharge the duty of his office.

Duties of the Vice-President. The duties of the Vice-President are two-fold. He is the ex-officio Chairman of the Rajya Sabha, presides over its meetings, and draws his salary in that capacity.⁶³ The office of the Vice-President itself carries no salary. But for the time when the Vice-President acts as President of the Indian Republic or discharges the functions of the President, he ceases to perform the duties of the office of the Chairman of the Rajya Sabha and is, accordingly, neither entitled to salary nor allowances payable to that office.⁶⁴

Secondly, the Vice-President acts for the President in the event of a vacancy in the office of the President by reason of his death, resignation or removal by impeachment⁶⁵ until the election of a new President, which must take place within six months of the date of the occurrence of the vacancy.⁶⁶ When the President is unable to perform his functions owing to absence, illness or any other cause, the Vice-President discharges his functions until the President resumes duties of his office.⁶⁷ Whenever the Vice-President acts for or discharges the functions of the President he exercises all the powers, enjoys all immunities, and receives such emoluments, allowances and privileges to which the President is entitled to.⁶⁸

The Constitution does not authorise any one to determine whether the President is "unable to discharge his functions" or not. When the Constitution is silent, then, it is for the President himself to determine whether he is at any time unable to discharge his functions. But if the President is unable to determine that, say, owing to a sudden attack of serious illness, then, Parliament may determine it under Article 70. It reads: "Parliament may make such provision as it thinks fit for discharge of functions of the President in any contingency not provided for in this chapter." There is no identical provision in the Constitution of the United States. Article II, Section I(6) simply provides: "In case of the removal from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office the same shall devolve on the Vice-President." The Constitution, therefore, does not define what is meant by "inability", and none is authorised to determine whether the President is suffering from inability at any moment. During the entire course of the history of the United States there has never been an occasion on which the inability to discharge the powers and duties on the part of the President may have resulted into the moving up of the Vice-President.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF THE PRESIDENT

The powers of the President are summarised under the following hands:

Executive Powers. The President of the United States is the generalissimo of administration. There are some departments of government which are placed by law under his direct control. Others are under his direct supervision and direction. The President of India has no administrative functions to discharge and he has no power of control and supervision over the departments of government. The various departments of the Union Government are presided over by Ministers and all function under their direct control and responsibility. The President is only a necessary adjunct of the governmental machinery. His authority is formal, though all executive action of the Union Government must be expressed to be taken in the name of the President.⁶⁹ For that matter all contracts and assurances of property made on behalf of the Government of India are expressed to be made by the President and executed in such manner as the President may direct.⁷⁰ Moreover, all officers of the Union are his officers and consequently his subordinates,⁷¹ and he has the right to be informed of all the affairs of the Union.⁷² The President also makes rules for the convenient transaction of the business of the Government of India and for the allocation among Ministers of the said business.⁷³ He has the right to be kept informed by the Prime Minister of all decisions taken by the Council of Ministers and seek such other information regarding the affairs of the Government of India as he may consider necessary and expedient. The President may also ask the Prime Minister to submit for the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision had been taken by a Minister but which has not been considered by the Council.

All important appointments are made by him and they include the Prime Minister of India,⁷⁴ other Ministers of the Union,⁷⁵ the Attorney-General of the Union,⁷⁶ the Comptroller and Auditor General,⁷⁷ Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts⁷⁸ and the State Governors.⁷⁹ Before appointing Judges, the President is bound to consult serving Judges, and he will be bound to make these appointments on the advice of the Ministry. With regard to the appointment of the Prime Minister, the choice of the President is obvious when the Constitution enjoins that the Council of Ministers shall be collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha.⁸⁰ Collective responsibility can only be enforced when the Council of Ministers is a team which plays the game of politics under the captaincy of the leader of the party in majority in the Lok Sabha. The President may have some discretion in the selection, if no single party has a majority in the Lok Sabha. But even in that case it is the duty of the President to turn to a person who must be able to secure colleagues and with his colleagues he must be able to secure the collaboration of the Lok Sabha. The President's choice, therefore, in the event of such a contingency is limited by political conditions. Legally, too, he cannot do otherwise as the President is under the constitutional obligation to exercise the executive power of the Union in accordance with the Constitution and the Constitution establishes a Parliamentary form of Government.

Besides the appointments of the high dignitaries of the State, referred to above, the President has also the power to appoint the following administrative Commissions: An Inter-State Council,⁸¹ the Union Public Service Commission and a Joint Commission for a group of States,⁸² the Finance Commission,⁸³ the Election Commission,⁸⁴ a Commission to report on the administration of Scheduled Areas,⁸⁵ Special Officer for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes,⁸⁶ a Commission to investigate into conditions of backward classes,⁸⁷ and a Commission on Languages.⁸⁸ But all this he does on ministerial advice.

For appointments other than those specified in the Constitution the Indian President has not, as the American President has, the power to appoint a large number of public servants. The power to legislate on the recruitment and conditions of service of public officials lies with the appropriate Legislature.⁸⁹ The Constitution provides for the creation of Public Service Commissions, for the Union and the States⁹⁰ to advise the Government on matters of recruitment and the recommendations so made are generally accepted.

The President has the power to remove his Ministers,⁹¹ the Attorney-General of India,⁹² and the Governors of the States.⁹³ But ministerial dismissal by the Head of the State is not the essence of a Parliamentary system of Government. No Government in Britain has been dismissed by the Sovereign since 1783 and no Monarch may today venture it, whatever be the legal opinion, unless he or she is determined to gamble in the most dangerous manner. The role of the Indian President with relation to his Ministers is identical to that of the British Monarch. Dr. Ambedkar emphasised this point in the Constituent Assembly. He asserted, "Beyond the identity of names of the Heads of Governments of the Indian Union and the U.S.A., there is nothing in common between the form of government prevalent in America and that proposed in the Indian Constitution." He further added that the place of the President of India "in the administration is that of a ceremonial device on the seal by which the nation's decisions are made known. He will be generally bound by the advice of the Ministers. He can do nothing contrary to their advice; nor can he do anything without their advice. The President of the United States can dismiss any Secretary at any time. The President of the (Indian) Union has no power to do so, so long as his Ministers command a majority in Parliament." Even in case of floor-crossing—a situation which was not visualised by the Constitution-makers—the President shall not have the power to decide by extra-Parliamentary parleys that the Ministry has lost the majority. Parliament is the only forum where the loss of the majority should be demonstrated for it is impossible to predict that a Member or Members of Parliament who have decided to cross the floor, would not change their mind before the voting in Parliament. Moreover, it is Parliament's privilege to vote down a Ministry and the President will not prejudice it. Parliament meets at regular intervals and the defectors and their supporters could as well wait till the next session and move a no-confidence motion against the Ministry therein.

Administration of Union Territories and Tribal Areas. Besides the Seventeen States comprising the Indian Union there are ten "Territories": Delhi, Chandigarh, Himachal Pradesh, Manipur, Tripura, the Andaman and Nicobar Islands, the Laccadive, Minicoy and Amindivi Islands, Dadra and Nagar Haveli, Goa, Daman and Diu, and Pondicherry. These Union Territories are Centrally administered. Article 239 of the Constitution provides: (1) Save as otherwise provided by Parliament by law, every Union Territory shall be administered by the President acting to such extent as he thinks fit, through an administrator to be appointed by him with such designations as he may specify. (2) Notwithstanding anything contained in para VI, the President may appoint the Governor of a State as the administrator of an adjoining Union Territory, and where a Governor is so appointed, he shall exercise his functions as such administrator besides his Council of Ministers." Parliament has been empowered to make any other provision by appropriate legislation for these territories in respect of their administration. The President may make regulations for the peace, progress and good Government of the Union Territories of Andaman and Nicobar Islands, and the Laccadive, Minicoy, and Amindivi Islands and all such regulations made by the President have the same effect as an Act of Parliament. The President is also competent to repeal or amend, through such regulations, any existing Act dealing with the administration of these Islands.

The President is empowered to make regulations for the administration of Tribal areas mentioned in the Sixth Schedule of the Constitution.

The Military Powers. The military powers of the President of India are lesser than those of the President of the United States and even to those of the British Monarch. The Constitution of India, no doubt, vests in the President the Supreme Command of the Defence Forces, but he is expressly required to exercise this power in conformity with law.⁹⁴ Parliament has exclusive legislative power⁹⁵ relating to the defence forces, war and peace.⁹⁶ Declaration of war and peace, as under the British Constitution, is an executive function, but the Indian President will not declare war or employ the forces without or in anticipation of Parliamentary sanction. There is no provision in the Constitution of the United States that the exercise of the power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy shall be regulated by law. Though the power to declare war belongs to Congress, yet the President may through his conduct of the foreign affairs of the country bring about a situation when declaration of war becomes a virtual necessity.

Foreign Affairs and Diplomatic Powers. All matters affecting relations with foreign countries are within the exclusive legislative competence of Parliament⁹⁷ and, as such, executive power relating to foreign affairs is exercised by the Union⁹⁸ and the diplomatic business is conducted in the name of the President. Diplomatic envoys and consular agents are accredited in his name. All treaties and international agreements are negotiated and concluded in the name of the President, but they cannot be effective unless subsequently approved by Parliament. The American President has complete discretion to recognise or not new Governments or States. The treaties concluded by the President are, however, subject to the approval of two-thirds majority of the Senate. But there are many other methods by which the President may by-pass the Senate; the most important being executive agreements. Executive agreements are pledges of certain actions by executives of two countries and such agreements do not require the approval of the Senate. Emergence of such a form of agreements is not possible in India.

Legislative Powers. Like the British Monarch, the President of India is a component part of the Union Parliament. The Constitution provides that there "shall be a Parliament for the Union which shall consist of the President and two Houses."⁹⁹ The powers vested in the President in relation to legislation may be summarised as follows:

(1) The President has the power to summon and prorogue Parliament,¹⁰⁰ and dissolve the Lok Sabha.¹⁰¹ The power to summon Parliament is, however, subject to the conditions imposed by clause (1) of Article 85, i.e., the President must summon Parliament within six months from the last sitting of a session. If he fails to summon, there will be a breach of the Constitution. The President has also the power to summon a joint sitting of both Houses of Parliament in case of deadlock between them over a non-Money Bill.¹⁰² The President of America has no power of summoning ordinary sessions of Congress. The Constitution provides that Congress shall assemble at least once in every year and itself has fixed, January 3, as the opening date for Congressional session. But the President can convene extraordinary sessions of Congress for consideration of special matters of an urgent character. He has, however, neither the power to prorogue Congress nor to dissolve its Lower Chamber, the House of Representatives.

Power of dissolution is one of the most important features of a Parliamentary form of Government and it is vested in the Head of the State on Ministerial advice. Dissolution means the end of the life of the Lower Chamber of the Legislature and calls for a fresh election. During the last hundred years in Britain there is no instance of a refusal of a dissolution when advised by the Prime Minister. Nevertheless, the opinion has always prevailed in that country that the Monarch is free to disregard such an advice if he feels that the Prime Minister's right to ask for dissolution is being put to serious abuse. Sir Winston Churchill observed in the course of the debate on the Education Bill in March 1944, that the Prime Minister's advice to dissolve may, in exceptional circumstances, be disregarded. "This is one of the exceptional occasions when the prerogative of the Crown comes into play and when in doubtful circumstances would refer to other advisers. It has been done on several occasions." As recently as 1950, when Labour was returned to majority the question of dissolution assumed practical importance. A letter to The Times by Senex, widely understood to be a former Private Secretary to the King, expressed the view that the grant or refusal of a dissolution is a decision entirely personal to the Crown who is free to seek advice from anybody whom he thinks fit to consult. The Crown may advise dissolution even when the Prime Minister may not consider expedient to resort to it. There had been two definite occasions during the last sixty years when dissolutions took place at the express desire of the King. The first was over the Budget in 1910, at the desire of Edward VII, and the second over the power of the House of Lords in the same year at the desire of George V. On both these occasions the Prime Minister reluctantly acquiesced in the Sovereign's desire and the dissolutions were, as Laski said, "amply surrounded by the cloak of ministerial responsibility". In 1924, the Liberals withdrew their support from the Labour Government headed by Ramsay MacDonald. The Prime Minister advised the King to dissolve Parliament. George V consulted Lord Esher and accepted the Prime Minister's advice as neither the Conservatives nor the Liberals were in a position to form the Government. Referring to this case Sir Ivor Jennings remarked, "George V could have taken no other decision." Of course, His Majesty "could dispense with the advice of Ramsay MacDonald, but only if he could find in Baldwin or Asquith another Prime Minister to take the responsibility." The normal practice, however, is that the Sovereign should not refuse a request for dissolution for the first time if circumstances justified it.

In Canada, the Governor-General seems to possess a larger discretion and he would not grant a dissolution unless the chances of the formation of another Ministry have been fully explored. Referring to the practice obtainable in Canada, Ridell says, "The actions of the Governor-General in granting or refusing a general election are based on well-established constitutional rules. He must avoid becoming a party-man, he must not engage in party politics or political intrigue, he must hold the scales even in respect of all political parties, he must be guided by a fair and candid consideration of the welfare of the people at large, he must not grant a dissolution simply to enable a political party to continue in office when there is no real and important question at issue between the parties." It is important to note here that even Mackenzie King, who had complained of the Governor-General's refusal to grant him dissolution of the House of Commons in 1926, conceded the legitimacy of refusal if there was an alternative Prime Minister "who not only was willing, but who was able to demonstrate his ability when Parliament was in session to carry on its proceedings."

The issue of dissolution came for active consideration before the Constituent Assembly of India when Prof. K.T. Shah moved an amendment to Article 69 of the Draft Constitution, which corresponds to Article 85 of the Constitution, making it obligatory for the Prime Minister to give in writing the reasons for the dissolution of the House of the People. Dr. Ambedkar in reply observed, "If the object of Prof. K.T. Shah is that the Prime Minister should not arbitrarily ask for dissolution, I think that object would be served if the convention regarding dissolution was properly observed. So far as I have understood it, the King has a right to dissolve Parliament. He generally dissolves it on the advice of the Prime Minister, but at one time certainly at the time when Macaulay wrote English History, where he has propounded this doctrine of the dissolution of Parliament, the position was this: it was agreed by all politicians that, according to the convention then understood, the King was not necessarily bound to accept the advice of the Prime Minister who wanted a dissolution of Parliament. The King could, if he wanted to ask the leader of the Opposition if he was prepared to form a Government and the leader of the Opposition could take charge of the affairs of Government and carry on the work with the same Parliament without being dissolved. The King also had the right to find some other member from the House if he was prepared to take the responsibility of carrying on the administration without the dissolution of the House. If the King failed either to induce the leader of the Opposition or any other member of Parliament to accept responsibility for governing and carrying on the administration he was bound to dissolve the House."

"In the same way, the President of the Indian Union will test the feelings of the House whether the House agrees that there should be dissolution or whether the House agrees that the affairs should be carried on with some other leader without dissolution. If he finds that the feeling was there was no other alternative except dissolution, he would as a Constitutional President undoubtedly accept the advice of the Prime Minister to dissolve the House. Therefore, it seems to me that the insistence upon having a document in writing stating the reasons why the Prime Minister wanted a dissolution of the House seems to be useless and not worth the paper on which it is written. There are other ways for the President to test the feelings of the House and to find out whether the Prime Minister was asking for bona fide reasons or for purely party purposes. I think we would trust the President to make a correct decision between the party leaders and the House as a whole. Therefore I do not think that this amendment should be accepted."

Dr. Ambedkar's exposition of the President's power to dissolve Parliament is similar to the practice obtainable in Canada. The Canadian Governor-General would not grant a dissolution unless the chances of the formation of another Ministry have been fully explored. Just as Ridell points out that "the actions of the Governor-General in granting or refusing a general election are based on well-established constitutional rules", similarly, the President of India is constitutionally bound to dedicate himself to the service and well-being of the people of India. While considering the possibilities of the formation of an alternative Ministry it is of fundamental importance that the President keeps himself above party politics and all his efforts are guided by considerations of the stability of government and welfare of the people. Dr. Ambedkar admitted that under a Parliamentary system of Government, "there are only two prerogatives which the King or the Head of the State may exercise. One is the appointment of the Prime Minister and the other is the dissolution of Parliament," and President of India can refuse dissolution if he felt that circumstances justified such a refusal. It is instructive to note that Article 85 merely says that the President may dissolve the House of People (Lok Sabha). The contrast is significant in the use of the word may in this Article. Most of the other Articles dealing with the powers of the President use the mandatory expression shall, as when it lays down that there shall be a Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister at its head to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions.

(2) The President has the right to address and send messages to Parliament. He may address either House of Parliament or both Houses assembled together, and for that purpose require the attendance of members. Such an address is essential at the commencement of the first session after each general elections to the Lok Sabha, and at the first session of each year when the President informs Parliament of the causes of its summons. The King in Britain addresses Parliament now on ceremonial occasions, for example, for delivering a Speech from the Throne. The Speech from the Throne, which the King delivers either in person or by commission, at the beginning of each session of Parliament, outlines the legislative programme with which Parliament shall be concerned and expresses the views and opinion of the Government on various matters of national and international importance. It is usually written by the Prime Minister and put in the hands of the Monarch to be read. The Monarch can make no alterations in it or introduce new subject matter.

The President's address to Parliament in India corresponds to the Speech from the Throne in Britain and it is used for political purposes in making pronouncements of the policy of Government, both on domestic and foreign affairs. In the United States there is no specific provision authorising or making it obligatory for the President to address Congress at the opening session. At the same time, there is no prohibition for him to send or read a message at the opening session of Congress and declare his policies. The Constitution prescribes that the President "shall from time to time give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary or expedient...."¹⁰³ The information required to be furnished is communicated at the beginning of each session, and in special messages communicated from time to time during the session. The annual message is major in significance and it contains a review of the activities of Government during the preceding year, a declaration of party politics, and recommendations for such legislation as the President deems the interests of the country require. It may be delivered orally¹⁰⁴ in the presence of both Houses or sent to them in a document. The Annual message of the American President may roughly be compared to the Speech from the Throne in Britain or the Indian President's address, with the difference that in Britain and India it is the handiwork of the Prime Minister of the country concerned whereas President of the United States speaks with his own authority and the message is what he decides it should be.

Clause (2) of Article 86 empowers the President of India to send messages to either House of Parliament with respect to a Bill then pending in Parliament or otherwise, and a House to which any message is so sent shall with all the convenient despatch consider any matter required by the message to be taken into consideration. This power given to the President is, indeed, very wide as the message may relate to any pending Bill or to any other matter before Parliament. But such a power is incongruous in the context of a Parliamentary form of Government as established in India. It corresponds to the American President's power of sending messages to Congress covering a vast scale of problems indicating the needs of the government and the necessity of either amending the existing law or enacting new legislation. But the American Presidency is not a part of the legislature and the Presidential message is a gesture to friendly legislators by the President to support his policy and initiate the required measures. The President of India stands in no such need. His advisers are a part of Parliament, chosen from it and responsible to it. They are always in Parliament to initiate new legislation or to offer amendments, to explain policy and defend administration, and to participate in debates. If the President sends a message on a Bill which has ministerial support, it has no use and the President unnecessarily drags himself in politics. The real power of the President, like the British Monarch, depends upon "his willingness to keep off politics". If the President sends a message contrary to and without the ministerial advice, then, he ventures to interfere with the constitutional responsibility of the Council of Ministers to Parliament.¹⁰⁵ Parliamentary system of Government cannot withstand such an interference. The President cannot speak to Parliament as the Constitution does not make him responsible to it.

(3) The President is required to lay before Parliament the Budget,¹⁰⁶ and Supplementary Budget, if any;¹⁰⁷ the report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General of India relating to the accounts of the Government of India;¹⁰⁸ the recommendations of the Finance Commission and the explanatory memorandum, of action taken thereon;¹⁰⁹ reports of the Union Public Service Commission;¹¹⁰ and various other reports like the report of the special officer for Scheduled Castes and Tribes;¹¹¹ and the report of the Commission to investigate into the conditions of the backward classes.¹¹² He recommends measures to Parliament involving the expenditure of Union moneys.¹¹³ These functions the President clearly exercises on ministerial advice.

(4) The recommendations of the President are necessary before legislation can be introduced for the reorganisation of States or alteration of State boundaries.¹¹⁴ The views of the State Legislature or Legislatures must be ascertained before such a recommendation is made and the views so expressed are not binding on the President. As the President shall act on the advice of the Union Ministry, it, therefore, rests upon the decision of the latter whether the Bill should be introduced in opposition to the views of the State Legislatures or not.

(5) Similarly, sanction of the President is necessary before legislation can be introduced relating to Money Bills,¹¹⁵ Bills involving expenditure,¹¹⁶ Bills affecting taxation in which States are interested.¹¹⁷ No Bill imposing restrictions on freedom of trade can be introduced in the State Legislatures without the previous sanction of the President.¹¹⁸

(6) In Britain the assent of the Sovereign is necessary for a Bill to become law. But the Royal assent is now only a matter of formality. The Sovereign has even ceased to give assent to Bills personally. It is given by five Commissioners appointed by the Crown under the Royal Sign Manual and the whole procedure is a picturesque formality. Therefore, the question of vetoing a Bill does not arise and if a daring Monarch ever attempts to venture it he may invite his own abdication. Both the Eire and the Burmese Constitutions specifically deny the vetoing power to their Presidents.

When a Bill passed by two Houses of Parliament is presented to the President of India, he may take any of the following three steps as provided by the Constitution:

- (1) he may give his assent to the Bill;
- (2) he may withhold his assent;
- (3) he may return it, if it is not a Money Bill, for the reconsideration of the two Houses of Parliament with a message for (a) a total reconsideration of the Bill, or (b) a partial reconsideration of the Bill, or (c) he may propose amendments to the Bill.

Withholding assent to a Bill passed by Parliament is inconsistent with the principle of ministerial responsibility and the President is not likely to venture it. The President has been given the power of veto over legislation with the intent that like the Sovereign in Britain he, too, should never use it. So long as the Council of Ministers commands a majority in Parliament and as long as Parliament remains representative of the people, it carries with it the mandate of the political sovereign. If the President withholds his assent, he tampers with the will of the political sovereign expressed through their representatives.

If the President sends back a Bill for reconsideration and if such a Bill is passed again by both Houses of Parliament with or without amendments as contained in the Presidential message, the President must give his assent thereto. This is of the nature of a 'suspensive veto' and is more or less identical to the suspensive veto power of the American President. If in the United States the President disapproves any Bill passed by Congress, he may return it to the House in which it originated within ten days of its presentation to him for reconsideration. If Congress passes the Bill again by a two-thirds vote in each House, it becomes a law notwithstanding the President's signatures. If the Bill fails to secure the requisite majority of two-thirds votes in each House the veto stands. The Indian Constitution does not prescribe any time limit within which the Bill must be returned by the President for reconsideration. It simply says that "The President may as soon as possible return the Bill after it is presented to him." Can the President indefinitely keep the Bill pending? The principle of ministerial responsibility again intervenes with political consequences if the President tries to put it in cold storage.

In fact, the provision of returning Bills, after they are passed by Parliament, is opposed to the basic principles of a Parliament form of 118. Proviso to Article 304.

Government. It is tantamount to directing the Ministry to revise its policy. If the President objects to some provisions of the Bill or has to offer some suggestions thereto, the best opportunity for him was to communicate his views to the Cabinet before introduction of the proposed legislation in Parliament. The Constitution imposes a duty on the Prime Minister to communicate to the President all decisions of the Cabinet relating to the affairs of Union and proposals for legislation and to furnish such information regarding administration of the affairs of the Union and proposals for legislation as the President may call for. "If the President is fully convinced of the futility of the measures of his ministers", says Sri Ram Sharma, "he can dismiss them straightaway when they inform him of their intention of introducing it rather than put them under the indignity of being told by implication that they are incapable of leading the country and therefore the President has taken charge of the administration."¹¹⁹

The Constitution-makers perhaps did not foresee that by borrowing the instrument of 'suspensive veto' from the American Constitution they were not only creating legal complications but political confusion too. Dr. Rajendra Prasad, in spite of his unequivocal declaration on the nature of the Constitution in the Constituent Assembly as its President, attributed to his office of President of India enormously greater powers than those given by the Constitution. On September 15, 1951, he sent a note to the Prime Minister in which he expressed the desire to act solely in his own judgment, independently of the Council of Ministers, when giving assent to Bills, when sending messages to Parliament and when returning Bills to Parliament for reconsideration. This desire was inspired by the Hindu Code Bill which had just been introduced in the provisional Parliament.¹²⁰ Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru immediately wrote back to the President and reminded him that "These were serious matters of great constitutional importance. They might involve a conflict between the President on one side and the Government and Parliament on the other. They would inevitably raise the question of the President's authority and powers to challenge the decision of Government and of Parliament. The consequences would obviously be serious."¹²¹ The Prime Minister referred the President's letter to Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar and the Attorney-General, M.C. Setalvad, for their opinions. The Attorney-General communicated his opinion on September 24, 1951 and informed the Prime Minister that the functions of the President "cannot be exercised by him without the concurrence of his Ministers and that in exercising them he is bound to

The President wrote, "...I propose to watch the progress of the measure (Hindu Code Bill) in Parliament from day to day and, if I feel at any stage that I should inform the Parliament also of my viewpoint, I may send to it a message when I consider it appropriate to do so. My right to examine it on its merits when it is passed by Parliament before giving assent to it is there. But if I find that any action of mine at a later stage is likely to cause embarrassment to the Government, I may take such appropriate action as I may feel called upon to avoid such embarrassment consistently with the dictates of my conscience." act in accordance with the advice tendered by his Ministers." Alladi Krishnaswami wrote two letters to the Prime Minister. The first on September 20 wherein he expressed the opinion that it was "perfectly clear that our President's position was analogous to that of a constitutional Monarch in England. . . . and there is no sphere of his functions in respect of which he cannot act without reference to the advice of his Ministers."¹²² In his second letter, October 8, 1951, he wrote that the President's arguments if conceded "will upset the whole constitutional structure envisaged at the time when the Constitution was passed, make the President a kind of dictator. . . ." Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar further said that Dr. Prasad "seems to read every Article of the Constitution in which the expression 'President' occurs as conferring powers upon the President in his individual capacity without reference to the Cabinet." But Article 74, "is all-pervasive in its character and does not make any distinction between one kind of functions and another. It applies to every function and power vested in the President whether it relates to addressing the House or returning a Bill for re-consideration or assenting or withholding assent to the Bill. It will be constitutionally improper for the President not to seek to be guided by the advice of Ministers in exercising any of the functions legally or technically vested in the President."¹²³ The expression "aid and advise" in Article 74 cannot be construed so as to enable the President to act independently or against the advice of the Cabinet."¹²⁴

A.G. Noorani succinctly points out that "Dr. Prasad's demarche thus helped clarify the position once and for all, though with results he could have hardly liked".¹²⁵ Dr. Radhakrishnan, like a sensible President, overcame the defect of the Constitution and did not adopt his predecessor's stand. The principles and requirements of a Parliamentary form of Government cannot justly be mixed with the Presidential form of Government. Legislature in a Presidential system of Government is a co-ordinate branch of Government with the executive and there is no machinery provided for integrating their functions. Both act independently of each other and Presidential messages and returning Bills for re-consideration are the President's two formal contacts with the Legislature. In a Parliamentary system of Government, the real Executive is a part of the Legislature. This point was abundantly made clear by Prime Minister Nehru in his press conference on July 7, 1959. While reiterating that the system of Government in India was not Presidential, Nehru said, "The Cabinet is supposed to have the confidence of the majority in Parliament and is responsible to it. If it loses that confidence it ceases to function. People get mixed up a little here with what is called the Presidential system in the United States of America. Our system is not a Presidential system but the Cabinet system, the closest parallel being the system in the United Kingdom. So question does not arise."¹²⁶

Bills passed by State Legislatures, but reserved for his consideration by a Governor. Now that many States have non-Congress Governments, it is more than possible that some of them would undertake legislation within their legal competence to give shape to their economic and social ideologies and quite conceivably they would conflict with Congress Party's ideology. Should the Governor under the circumstances reserve such legislation for the consideration of the President and if he does should the Union Government advise the President how he should deal with the reference; whether he should return it to the State Legislature with a message for reconsideration, withhold his assent or keep the Bill pending indefinitely as no time limit is prescribed for the President's assent. It is, indeed, inconceivable that the Constitution had intended to vest the Union Government in a Federal State with such a sweeping power as to reduce the States to the subordinate position of mere administrative units as was the case before 1920. There is also a similar provision in the Constitution of Australia empowering the Governor of a State to reserve a Bill for the consideration of the Crown. But it is important to note that the provision in the Australian Constitution differs from the Indian Constitution in two important respects. Firstly, that in Australia a Bill is reserved for the consideration of the Crown and not of the Governor-General. Secondly, the Crown is advised by the State Cabinet and not by the Commonwealth of Australia Cabinet. It, thus, clearly establishes that the Australian Constitution does not tamper with the autonomy of the States. This precisely a federal polity demands. It is, accordingly, hoped that the President of India would exercise his judgment when confronted with such a situation after seeking the views of the State Cabinet and if need be, the advice of the Supreme Court as was done in the case of the Kerala Education Bill passed by the Communist Government when it was earlier in power. "This alone would place the President," says Asok Chanda, "in correct relationship with the States and conforming to the democratic principles of a federal State."¹²⁷

(8) The President has been given far-reaching powers in the sphere of legislation when Parliament is not in session. "In no country with a written Constitution and the parliamentary type of government is the chief of the State the repository of such prodigious legislative powers."¹²⁸ Clause (1) Article 123 provides: "If at any time, except when both Houses of Parliament are in session, the President is satisfied that circumstances exist which render it necessary for him to take immediate action, he may promulgate such ordinances as the circumstances appear to him to require." Clause (2) of the same Article provides that the ordinance has the same force as an Act passed by Parliament. The ordinance so promulgated must be laid before both Houses of Parliament immediately after it re-assembles. If Parliament disapproves the ordinance it lapses. If it is not disapproved, it will automatically cease to operate at the end of six weeks from the re-assembly of Parliament. Since the maximum period which can elapse between two sessions of Parliament is six months, the maximum duration of an ordinance, unless previously terminated by Parliament, can be six months¹²⁹ and six weeks. The President may withdraw the ordinance at any time.

This ordinance issuing power of the President is a relic of the Government of India Act of 1935. In Britain the Executive does not possess such an independent power of legislation. There is no precedent of such a power to exist in the Dominions. In the United States all legislative power is vested in Congress and it cannot delegate its authority of law-making to any other authority. But the President of India is empowered to issue ordinances when Parliament is not in session and these ordinances have the force of law as passed by Parliament. The courts cannot question the bona fides of the President's action in issuing an ordinance or whether there existed reasonable necessity for such an action. President is the sole judge of the necessity of issuing an ordinance and he is not to give reasons for promulgating it. What the Courts can do is to examine the ordinance issued and promulgated and see whether it has been issued within the scope of powers conferred by the Constitution.

It has been suggested that the words "is satisfied", and "as the circumstances appear to him" as contained in Article 123(1) authorising the President to issue ordinances require the President to apply his mind to the circumstances of the case before it can be said that he is "satisfied". It is argued that the initiation of an ordinance may no doubt be made by the Council of Ministers, but a stage comes when the President must be "satisfied" and the circumstances must "appear to him" to require its promulgation. The Council of Ministers' satisfaction cannot be a real substitute for the President's¹³⁰ satisfaction. The President, therefore, may act in his own judgment if he is satisfied that the circumstances do not justify the issuing of an ordinance. "Unthinking and supine acceptance of the advice tendered would not be in consonance with the Constitution."¹³¹ K.B. Subba Rao, former Chief Justice of India, maintains that the expression "satisfaction" is a mental process and it involves the pros and cons of the question. The President may take the advice of the Ministry but is not bound by it. "Even if", he says, "a contrary construction is possible, it is necessary to develop conventions to enable the President to exercise his discretion in such situations."¹³² But this is not exactly the essence of a Parliamentary system of government. The President has, no doubt, the right to resist the advice tendered to him if he is not satisfied with such advice, but he should not persist after, what Bagehot describes as "warning" has been given. The ultimate responsibility is that of the Council of Ministers. The President has no functions to discharge on his own authority and no discretion to exercise in his individual judgment. When the Constituent Assembly was debating the powers of the President, the Law Minister categorically affirmed that if the President acted except on the advice of his Council of Ministers it would be tantamount to a violation of the Constitution and would make him liable to impeachment. The Government of India Act, 1935 specifically provided for the exercise of individual judgment and discretion by the Governor-General in certain circumstances. This provision was deleted from the Constitution and it strengthens the view that discretionary powers were advisedly withdrawn as being inconsistent with the principles of Parliamentary democracy.

The ordinance-issuing power vested in the President may be described as an emergency power to meet the extraordinary situation in which it is not possible for the Government to obtain the necessary legislation enacted immediately by Parliament. But unfortunately, there has, of late, been a tendency on the part of the Government to resort to this ordinance-making power oftener than seems desirable. Ananthasayanam Ayyanger, the then Speaker of the Lok Sabha, who presided over a symposium on "Law and Democracy in India,"¹³³ deplored the arbitrary manner in which the executive was prone to use the ordinance-making power of the President. "At times one felt," he said, "that the promulgation of an ordinance was delayed until a Parliament session was prorogued." Such a procedure is highly objectionable, and in the words of Ananthasayanam Ayyanger, "a negation of parliamentary democracy." When the framers of the Constitution provided that any ordinance issued must receive legislative sanction within the specified period, they were anxious that, as far as possible, democratic procedures and processes should be enforced by the party in power in making laws. And, thus, emergency powers were to be exercised sparingly and only in case of real emergency. That the Executive has paid scant attention to the intentions of the Constitution-makers is reinforced by the promulgation of the ordinance nationalising fourteen major Banks on July 19, 1969 just two days before Parliament was to meet for its monsoon session.

(9) Finally, the President nominates 12 members of the Rajya Sabha from among persons having special knowledge or practical experience of Literature, Science, Art and Social Service. He can also nominate two Anglo-Indians to the Lok Sabha if no Anglo-Indians otherwise get themselves elected to that House.

Judicial Powers. The President may grant pardons and reprieves, and suspend, remit or commute sentences to persons convicted by Court Martial, and in all cases in which sentences to death have been passed. But the President's power of pardon does not affect the similar power of the Governors of the States and military officers with respect to Court Martial. The President's power of pardon covers offences against acts relating to matters on the Union List. It does not relate to offences committed against matters on the Concurrent List unless Parliament has expressly excluded the executive power of the State on such matters.

The President's power of pardon is exercised on the advice of Ministers. In Britain pardoning is a Royal prerogative. But it is primarily a matter for the Home Secretary and the Royal share is mainly formal. Ordinarily, the power is exercised after sentence, although pardon is available before conviction. In the United States the President can "grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States except in cases of impeachment." If he chooses he may grant pardon before as well as after conviction. The Indian President's power of pardon can only be exercised after conviction. Grant of amnesty requires parliamentary approval. In America the President's power of pardon is exclusive.

133. The Tribune, Ambala Cantt., February 9, 1959.

Miscellaneous Powers. There are many miscellaneous powers of the President: making of rules as to the manner in which orders and instruments made by the Government of India, in the name of the President, shall be authenticated, rules for the convenient transaction of the business of Government of India and for the allocation among ministers of the said business, rules, in consultation with the Chairman of the Rajya Sabha and the Speaker of the Lok Sabha, as to the procedure with regard to joint sittings of, and communications between the Houses. The President's approval is also necessary for rules made by the Supreme Court for regulating the practice and procedure of the Court. The President makes regulations determining the number of members of the Union Public Service Commission, their tenure and conditions of service, etc. He also makes regulations specifying the matters in which it shall not be necessary to consult the Union Public Service Commission in respect of services of the Union.

The Constitution also confers on the President the power of taking the opinion of the Supreme Court on questions of public importance involving a question of law as well as a question of facts. It means that the President can refer to the Supreme Court the question whether a proposed Bill will be ultra vires of the powers of the Legislature. The advisory opinion given by the Supreme Court is not binding on the President.

EMERGENCY POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT

✓ Different kinds of Emergency. Besides the powers enumerated above, the President of India has been vested with vast emergency powers which are divided under three distinct heads:

(1) An emergency arising out of a threat to the security of India or any part of it by war, external aggression or internal disturbance. A Proclamation of Emergency may be made by the President at any time if he is satisfied that the security of India is in danger or is likely to be in danger either due to war or external or internal aggression.¹³⁴

(2) Failure of constitutional machinery in a State. The President is empowered to make a Proclamation when he is satisfied that the Government of a State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution on the report of the Governor of the State or otherwise.¹³⁵

(3) Financial Emergency. The President is empowered to make a declaration of financial emergency whenever he is satisfied that the financial stability or credit of India or any part thereof is threatened.¹³⁶

134. Article 352.

135. Article 356 (a).

136. Article 360 (b).

The two kinds of Proclamations—Proclamation of Emergency and Proclamation of failure of constitutional machinery in a State—differ on the grounds leading to the proclamation as well as to the effects. The Proclamation of Emergency may be necessitated whenever the security of India is threatened or is deemed to be threatened either due to external aggression or internal disturbance, or whenever the financial stability or credit of India is threatened. The Proclamation of failure of constitutional machinery, on the other hand, is necessitated whenever the Government of a State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. A threat to the security of India or a threat to her financial stability may not lead to the Proclamation of the failure of the constitutional machinery in a State. The obvious ground in the latter case is either the failure of the constitutional machinery in a State, or the refusal of a State to discharge its constitutional obligations.

When a Proclamation of Emergency is in operation the Fundamental Rights to the Seven Freedoms—freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, freedom of association, freedom of movement, freedom to choose one's residence, freedom to deal with property, and freedom to follow an avocation, are automatically suspended,¹³⁷ and the President may also suspend the right to move the Courts for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights.¹³⁸ Nothing of this kind happens when a Proclamation of failure of constitutional machinery in a State is made. Neither the Fundamental Rights to Seven Freedoms stand automatically suspended nor the right to move the Courts for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights is liable to be suspended.

Secondly, the object of the Proclamation of Emergency is to confer wider powers, executive and legislative, upon the Union Government in order to meet the threat to the security of India or its financial stability. The State authorities do not cease to function. The organs of the State Governments continue to function as before under normal conditions, except (i) that the Government of India can give directions to the States as to the manner in which the executive power thereof is to be exercised,¹³⁹ (ii) the legislative competence of the Union Parliament is widened and it acquires the power to legislate on subjects included in the State List,¹⁴⁰ and (iii) the President is empowered to modify, by his own orders, the provisions of the Constitution with regard to financial matters. But in case of a proclamation of failure of constitutional machinery the Government of a State concerned is superseded by the Union, except the High Court. The State Legislature is suspended altogether and the State executive in whole or in part.

Emergency by External or Internal Aggression. A Proclamation of Emergency may be issued by the President if he is satisfied that a grave menace exists whereby the security of India or any part of its territory is threatened or is likely to be threatened either by war or external aggression or internal disturbance.¹⁴¹ The Constitution definitely provides that a Proclamation of Emergency can be made even before the actual occurrence of war, external aggression or internal disturbance if the President is satisfied that there is imminent danger thereof.¹⁴² It is the satisfaction of the President alone which may lead to the declaration of emergency. The Courts have no jurisdiction to question either the validity of such a Proclamation or its desirability. The President is the sole judge and his determination cannot be questioned. But the satisfaction of the President really means the satisfaction of his Council of Ministers and he acts on their advice while making a Proclamation of Emergency.

A Proclamation of Emergency may be revoked by a subsequent Proclamation¹⁴³ or it ceases to operate at the end of two months unless it has been approved within that period by resolutions of both Houses of Parliament.¹⁴⁴ If the Proclamation is issued at a time when the Lok Sabha (House of the People) has been dissolved or if its dissolution takes place during the period of two months, then the Proclamation must be approved by the Rajya Sabha (Council of States) within the specified period of two months and by the newly elected Lok Sabha within thirty days of its first sitting. If the newly elected Lok Sabha does not approve it, the emergency ceases to operate after the expiration of thirty days from the date when the Lok Sabha meets for its first sitting.¹⁴⁵

While the Proclamation of Emergency is in operation, it may have the following constitutional consequences:

1. (a) Parliament will have unrestricted power to make laws for the whole or any part of India with respect to any of the matters enumerated in the State List.¹⁴⁶ Laws so made by Parliament shall become inoperative six months after the Proclamation of Emergency has ceased to operate.¹⁴⁷
- (b) Any law made by the State Legislature which is inconsistent with such laws made by Parliament will be void to the extent of inconsistency.¹⁴⁸
- (c) During the operation of the Proclamation of Emergency the President may, when Parliament is not in session, promulgate ordinances in respect of matters included in the State List. The President's legislative power under Article 123 is enlarged accordingly.
- (d) Parliament has the power to make laws and confer powers and impose duties upon the Government of India and its officers in order to carry out the laws made by Parliament under its extended jurisdiction as a result of the Proclamation of Emergency.¹⁴⁹

- (e) Parliament has the power to extend its own life by law for a period not exceeding one year at a time. Such an extension in its term cannot last beyond six months after the proclamation has ceased to operate.¹⁵⁰
2. The executive power of the Union shall, during the operation of the Proclamation, extend to the giving of directions to any State as to the manner in which its executive power is to be exercised.
3. While the Proclamation of Emergency is in operation, the President may by his order modify the provisions relating to distribution of revenues between the Union and the States,¹⁵¹ with a view to securing adequate revenues for the Government of India to meet the situation created by the emergency. But such orders of the President must be laid before each House of Parliament immediately after they are made.¹⁵² In no case such orders shall be valid beyond the financial year in which the Proclamation of Emergency ceases to operate.¹⁵³
4. (a) While a Proclamation of Emergency is in operation, the Fundamental Rights to the Seven Freedoms, as contained in Article 19, are automatically suspended.¹⁵⁴ The Constitution does not make any distinction for purposes of suspension of the Rights to Seven Freedoms between times of war and times of peace. Whether it is due to war, internal disturbance, or a danger thereof operation of Article 19 is suspended as soon as the Proclamation of Emergency has been made.
- (b) When the Proclamation of Emergency is in operation, restrictions imposed by Article 19 on the executive and legislative authority of the Union, States, and local authorities are suspended and, accordingly, a law or an administrative action cannot be challenged in the Courts on the ground that it contravenes the provisions laid down therein.
5. The President is also empowered to suspend the right to move the Courts to enforce any other Fundamental Rights. Such a suspension shall be in force during the operation of the Proclamation of Emergency and it is required to be laid before each House of Parliament "as soon as may be after it is made." The President's order suspending the enforcement of Fundamental Rights is, thus, not final. Parliament by law can revoke or cancel the order of the President. But the President can, if he wishes, delay in giving Parliament the opportunity to take action.

upon it.¹⁵⁵ The Constitution does not fix any time-limit for the order to be laid before Parliament. It simply says that every order made by the President "shall, as soon as may be after it is made, be laid before each House of Parliament." It is, therefore, for the President to determine when the order shall be laid before Parliament.

Failure of Constitutional Machinery in a State. Article 355 of the Constitution imposes on the Union Government the duty to protect every State against external aggression or internal disturbance and to ensure that the Government of every State is carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. Article 356 further provides that if the President, on receipt of a report from the Governor of a State or otherwise, is satisfied that a situation has arisen in which a Government of a State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, the President may by Proclamation:

- (a) assume to himself all or any of the functions of the Government of the State including all or any of the powers vested in or exercisable by the Governor, or any other body or authority in the State;
- (b) declare that the powers of the State Legislature shall be exercisable by or under the authority of Parliament;¹⁵⁶
- (c) make such consequential provisions as may appear to him to be necessary for giving effect to the objects of the proclamation including provisions for suspending any part of the Constitution of the State.

If the proclamation has declared that the powers of the State Legislature shall be exercisable by or under the authority of Parliament it shall be competent: (i) for Parliament to confer on the President the power to make laws or to authorize the President to delegate such power to any other authority, and (ii) for the President, when the Lok Sabha is not in session, to authorise expenditure pending sanction of such expenditure by Parliament.

The President, however, cannot assume to himself any of the powers vested in or exercisable by the High Court. Nor can he suspend, either in whole or in part, the operation of any provision of the Constitution relating to High Courts.¹⁵⁷

The Proclamation may be revoked or varied by a subsequent proclamation.¹⁵⁸ Every Proclamation issued in connection with the failure of constitutional machinery in a State requires to be laid before each House of Parliament and it ceases to operate, except where it is a proclamation revoking a previous proclamation, after the expiry of two months unless before the expiration of that period it has been approved by resolutions of both Houses of Parliament. If approved by Parliament, the Proclamation remains in force for six months and may be extended to a maximum period of three years, but such extension must not exceed for more than six months at a time.

The expression in Article 356 that "the Government of the State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution" has a very wide scope. There is no necessary connection between the conditions of emergency due to war, external aggression or internal disturbance or a threat thereto and the failure of the State Government to work according to the Constitution. But a Proclamation of failure of the constitutional machinery in a State or States can be made, if the President is satisfied that the measures taken to meet the emergency created due to war or internal disturbance, under Articles 352 and 353, are not adequate or are not likely to be adequate. The President can also make the proclamation of the failure of constitutional machinery, if he is satisfied that there is a political breakdown and there is no stable majority in the State Legislature to form the Ministry or the party wrangles within the majority party itself do not satisfy the conditions of a stable government. It happened in the four States of Punjab, Travancore-Cochin, Patiala and East Punjab States Union, and Andhra of the pre-reorganisation period and is now a common feature of the United Fronts wherever they came into power. United Fronts were set up in several non-Congress States after the 1967 General Elections, but they could not form an effective alliance with one another. There is no common goal, no common approach. The only concern of the components of the United Fronts is to get into power, to outwit the other partners and to create a constitutional crisis wherever and whenever possible. Finally, failure to comply with the directions of the Union Government may also lead to the proclamation of failure of the constitutional machinery.¹⁵⁹ It is important to note, once again, that in order to issue a proclamation of failure of constitutional machinery in a State the President need not wait for the report of the Governor. The President is empowered to take action on his own initiative and it is all a matter of his satisfaction.

The constitutional consequences of failure of the constitutional machinery are:

- (1) the assumption by the President of all functions of the Government of the State, and all powers vested in or exercisable by the Governor;
- (2) the Legislature of the State concerned is suspended and all powers thereunder are exercised by or under the authority of Parliament;
- (3) the President may make any necessary, incidental and consequential, changes in the provisions of the Constitution relating to any State authority so as to give desirable effect to the objects of the Proclamation;
- (4) Parliament may confer, during the operation of the Proclamation, on President legislative powers exercisable by the State Legislature. Parliament may do this to relieve itself of extra burden of work. But such a delegation of legislative authority is made subject to the ultimate authority of Parliament. The President in his own turn may delegate such powers to subordinate officers;

- (5) Parliament, President, and other authorities vested with the power to make laws for the State during the operation of the proclamation may confer powers and impose duties upon the Union, its officers and authorities.
- (6) When the Lok Sabha is not in session the President may authorise, by his executive order, expenditure out of the Consolidated Fund of the State subject to the sanction of Parliament.

The powers of the President to supersede the Government of a State are very wide and even drastic. Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar, a member of the Drafting Committee, supporting the provisions of this Article maintained that if the Constitution of a State was worked efficiently ensuring the proper functioning of a Responsible Government, the Union would not and could not interfere. "Far from being an impediment to State autonomy, they were a bulwark in favour of State autonomy, because the primary obligation was cast upon the Union to see that the Constitution was maintained." He further said that the "President" meant the Union Cabinet responsible to Parliament, a representative body of the Union and the component parts. He had no doubt that not merely the State conscience of the representatives of the particular State concerned but also conscience of the representatives of all other units would be quickened and they would see to it that the provisions in these Articles were properly worked. Pandit Hriday Nath Kunzru opposed the Article. His contention was that if real Responsible Government was to be established in the States, "the electors must be made to feel that the power to apply proper remedy, if any mismanagement occurred, rested with them. It depended upon them to choose their representatives who would be capable of working in accordance with their best interest. If the Central Government or Parliament were given power to interfere, there was a danger that whenever there was a dissatisfaction in a State, appeals would be made to the Central Government to come to their rescue. The State electors would throw their responsibility on the shoulders of the Central Government. It was not right to encourage this tendency."

Dr. Ambedkar, the Chairman of the Drafting Committee, while defending these provisions maintained that no departure from the established principles had been made by providing powers to the Centre to take over the administration of a State if its constitutional machinery failed. He cited the Constitution of the United States which made an obligation on the part of the National Government to see that the State maintained the Republican form of Government. Replying to the criticism that these Articles were liable to be abused, Dr. Ambedkar said, "I may say that I do not altogether deny that. There is a possibility of these Articles being abused and being employed for political purposes. That objection applies to every part of the Constitution, wherever the Centre has been given power to override the States. I share the sentiments expressed by Gupta that the proper thing we ought to expect with regard to this Article is that they will never be brought into operation and they will remain as a dead letter. If at all they are brought into operation, I hope the President who is endowed with powers will take proper precaution before actually suspending the Constitution." C.L. Anand analysing Dr. Ambedkar's speech says, "Ambedkar thought that the President would issue a warning to the State concerned that things were not happening the way they should, and if the warning failed to have any effect, he would then order an election to allow the people of the State to settle the matter themselves. Only when the two remedies failed he would resort to the provisions of Article 356."¹⁰⁰

But what Ambedkar had thought did not actually happen. Provision of Article 356 had been employed for political purposes, and not one single uniform method governed the suspension of the constitutional machinery in the pre-reorganised States of Punjab, PEPSU, Andhra and Travancore-Cochin. The President's rule based on Article 356 was established in the Punjab State, when after the dramatic resignation of Dr. Gopi Chand Bhargava, "no alternative Ministry could be formed," although the Congress Party, whose leader Dr. Bhargava was, still commanded an overwhelming majority in the State Legislative Assembly. The President proclaimed the emergency on a report received from the State Governor. The Governor became the delegate of the Centre and the agency of local executive power. The legislative powers of the State were transferred to Parliament. Another case was of the PEPSU, a Part B State. The Congress Ministry lost its majority in the State Assembly in 1952 and was replaced by a coalition led by the Akalis and given the name of the United Democratic Front. It soon became evident that the Front was a strange combination and it could remain united only by interpreting democracy in eccentric ways. It felt shy in meeting the Assembly and dubious methods were employed after November 1952 not to call its meetings. In the meanwhile, the Election Tribunal was examining the unusually heavy crop of election petitions, 23 out of a total of 60 members. Of 17 petitions decided upon by early 1952, as many as 9 were upheld and out of the 6 members of the Council of Ministers three had been unseated, while a petition was still pending against another. This had an aggravating effect on the tottering Front Ministry necessitating the Presidential Proclamation under Article 356 issued in March 1953, originally for six months and later extended by Parliament for further six months. The Rajpramukh, assisted by an Adviser, appointed by the Centre, became the agency of local executive power. The legislative power of the State was transferred to Parliament.

The position in Travancore-Cochin after the elections of 1952 was not comfortable for any single party. In an Assembly of 109, Congress secured only 45 seats. A Congress Government was, however, formed with the support of the 8 members of the Travancore Tamil Nad Congress, really a section of Congressmen who differed with the parent party on the separation of Tamil-speaking districts from the Malayalam-speaking remainder of the State and their merger with Madras, and a sufficient number of Independents. In September 1953, the leader of the T.T.N.C., who had been given a place in the State Cabinet, resigned from the Government and a few days later his party voted with the Opposition to defeat the Government. The Chief Minister advised the Rajpramukh to dissolve the Assembly and he continued in office till the new elections were held. There were loud protests by the parties of the Left who argued that the Government could have been formed by the Opposition groups and the Rajpramukh would have, therefore, sent for the leader of the Opposition. The Praja Socialist Party even insisted on the Proclamation of the President's rule under Article 356. New elections were held and the Congress failed to command a majority when it resigned. The Praja Socialist Party, with its 19 members, agreed to form the Government with the support of the Congress Party which commanded 45 members. The P.S.P. Government did not last long. The Congress Party in the State had become restive and asked the Party's Central Parliamentary Board to permit them to withdraw support from the Government. The permission was given and the Congress Party was able to form a Government in February 1955, with 46 Congress votes, 12 of the unreliable T.T.N.C. and two or three former P.S.P. members (including the Speaker) who resigned from their party. The Government fell in March 1956, because of the defection of six discontented members of the Congress Party. Consequently the President proclaimed suspension of the constitutional machinery in the State under Article 356.

In the newly created State of Andhra the Congress had 46 seats out of a total of 140. There were 45 Communists. A Congress Coalition Ministry was formed with Prakasam as Chief Minister, who had resigned from the P.S.P. Prakasam Ministry was defeated on the issue of prohibition and it resigned. Prakasam was unwilling to carry on as a caretaker government until the end of the elections and the President took over the administration of the State, by proclamation of emergency under Article 356 on November 15, 1954. When the President's proclamation was approved in the Lok Sabha, an amendment was accepted by the House declaring that the action of the Centre was "the only proper constitutional remedy for the crisis that arose on the resignation of the Prakasam Ministry." In the debate in the House, on November 20, 1954, the Communists claimed that they could have formed a stable ministry and should have been invited to do so. The P.S.P. also said that an attempt ought to have been made to find alternative government. The spokesman of the Union Government was of the opinion that no stable government could have been formed, although he admitted that it would be a normal parliamentary practice for a defeated ministry to carry on until a new one was appointed.

But what happened in Kerala on July 31, 1959 shall go deep in history. This was the first time since Independence that considerations other than ministerial instability, due to internal party wrangles or the shifting allegiance of the members of the Legislature, had led to the drastic action taken by the President under Article 356 of the Constitution. The Presidential proclamation issued on July 31, 1959 simply said, "...that a situation has arisen in which the Government of that State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of India."

But the facts were familiar to the public all over India. The Communist Party emerged the largest single party in the State of Kerala in the last General Elections and with the help of five Independent members of the Assembly assumed office on April 5, 1957. During twenty-eight months of its tenure the Opposition parties, including the Congress, were unable to overthrow it by purely constitutional means. The combined Opposition resorted to direct action on June 12, like picketing of schools, buses and Government offices and violation of lawfully promulgated orders.¹⁶¹ Prime Minister Nehru visited Kerala, in response to the appeal of the Kerala Chief Minister, and remained there for three days studying the situation and meeting all the parties, groups and interests. At the end of his visit Nehru, inter alia, suggested mid-term General Elections. The Prime Minister characterised the movement in Kerala as "a vast mass upsurge" the like of which had not been seen by him before.

NambooDiripad, the Kerala Chief Minister, did not agree to the proposal of mid-term General Elections.¹⁶² The Opposition thereupon prepared for an intensification of the agitation which was to culminate on August 9 in a major demonstration threatening grave disorder. Dr. B. Ramakrishna Rao, Governor of Kerala, sent his report to the President wherein he described that the agitation against the Government was reaching a stage where orderly administration would have become impossible. The Constitution was accordingly suspended by the President on July 31, as stated above. While justifying the intervention of the Union, the Prime Minister told the Lok Sabha on August 19, 1959 that a stage had been reached in Kerala, when there was no other way out except the President's Proclamation, and the alternative was a disaster on a big scale in that State.

Some lawyers from Kerala and a few from outside, such as K.M. Munshi, suggested that the Centre had a duty under the Constitution to intervene in Kerala, dismiss the Ministry and order fresh elections. In their opinion, "If the party having a majority in a State Legislature is wedded to a doctrine or in fact carries on administration persistently in a manner, which denies all the citizens of the State, equality of status and opportunity and the State administration is carried on in the aforesaid way with the majority vote of the Legislature, and which evokes overwhelming resentment and situation, a situation must...be regarded as having arisen in which the Government of the State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution...To say that such a Government can still be carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution merely because the ruling party has the major-

162. Gadgil also said that the Communist Government in Kerala was fully entitled to continue in office for five years unless it was voted out or it resigned of its own accord. He further added that the Party in power must have stability to implement its assurances held out to the electorate during elections.

ity vote is to ignore altogether the other provisions of our Constitution.¹⁶³

But this is not the correct constitutional position. Under the Constitution as long as a State Ministry has the confidence of the people, as expressed through their representatives in the State Legislature, it has a right to govern and aid and advise the Governor for their full term of office. The democratic right of the people of each State to manage their affairs through their representatives is enshrined in the Constitution and it insists that the confidence of the State Legislature in the Government of the day is the only expression of the will of the people. The Centre can intervene only in two contingencies: (1) either a grave emergency where the security of India or any part thereof is threatened by external aggression or internal disturbance, or (2) where there is a breakdown of the constitutional machinery in a State.

The imposition of President's Rule in the States of Rajasthan and Haryana after the 1967 General Elections presents a revealing study. In Rajasthan no single Party succeeded in securing absolute majority in the State Assembly. The Governor called upon Mohan Lal Sukhadia, leader of the Congress Party which was the largest single Party in the State Assembly, to form a Government. Sukhadia accepted the invitation. The non-Congress Parties joined forces as the Samyukta Dal and claimed that they collectively commanded absolute majority in the Assembly and their leader should have been summoned by the Governor to form a Government. They publicly demonstrated their strength by launching an agitation which quite predictably turned violent. At almost the last moment Sukhadia declined to form a Government on the ground that the Opposition was creating a situation endangering law and order. On the report of the Governor and within a few hours of the new Congress Ministry assuming office at the Centre, the President's Rule was imposed. The Governor's view was that by threatening mass march to the Assembly at its inauguration, the Opposition tried to force upon him a minority Government. How did the Governor evaluate it before allowing the Assembly to meet to find out is inexplicable? The Proclamation of the President's Rule merely suspended the newly elected Assembly; it was not dissolved. When the President's Rule was lifted Mohanlal Sukhadia formed the Ministry with a comfortable majority as many members belonging to the Opposition parties by then had defected to the Congress. The manner in which the President's Rule was proclaimed created an impression that the Governor acted as partisan and the Congress Government at the Centre wished to come to the aid of the Congress Party in Rajasthan. There is no denying the fact that imposition of the President's Rule helped Sukhadia in forming a Congress Government.

The Haryana non-Congress Government headed by Rao Birendra Singh fell on November 21, 1967 a prey to the latest sickness in Indian politics—opportunistic politicians who oscillate across the floor unaided by any principles. The General Elections in February 1967 had tilted in favour of the Congress Party and Bhagwat Dyal Sharma formed the Government. Internal dissensions and group rivalries tore asunder the Party and many legislators led by Rao Birendra Singh defected from the Congress. Bhagwat Dyal Ministry having been reduced to minority in the State Assembly, it resigned. Rao Birendra Singh thereupon formed a Coalition Government and it included all the non-Congress Parties in the State Legislature. Thirty-seven members of the Assembly crossed the floor at one time or the other during the eight months of Rao's Chief Ministership, and four of them did four times each. Almost every defector from the Opposition was promptly rewarded with ministerial office. Then, the Opposition had its turn which beat the Rao's Government at his own game of trading in turncoats. Devi Lal Group and a few others defected to the Opposition and although Rao Birendra Singh's United Front commanded 40 members in an effective House of 78, the Governor dismissed the Ministry and the President's Rule was imposed. In his report to the President, the Governor said, "majority today can be a minority tomorrow and cannot be relied upon." Punjab, Bihar, Uttar Pradesh and West Bengal have their own tales to tell. All these States went again to the polls just two years after the Fourth General Elections. The United Front in Punjab, comprising the Akalis and the Jan Sangh, formed the Government. The Akalis now command an absolute majority in the State Assembly which is sure to become a comfortable majority with a few more defections from the Congress and these are on the cards. The Akali leader, Sant Fateh Singh, talking to newsmen at Chandigarh on September 12, 1969, said that legislators defecting from the Congress to the Akali Dal would be welcome and the party had placed no ban on their joining the State Cabinet. But amongst the Akalis themselves there is a deep rift and Darshan Singh Pheruman's fast unto death on the Chandigarh issue brought it into the open. Jan Sangh directed its two Ministers in the Cabinet to resign on September 16, 1969, if the language issue was not decided to their satisfaction by September 15.¹⁶⁴ Bihar is again under President's Rule after experimenting with two Coalition Governments within a brief period of four months. In Uttar Pradesh the Congress could secure a comfortable majority in the mid-term elections in February 1969 and formed the Government. Now the two warring groups of the Congress are on each other's throat as a result of split in the Indian National Congress. In West Bengal open and violent clashes between the workers of the component parties of the United Front Government are a daily feature of the Bengal politics. Even the Chief Minister of Bengal went on three-days fast as a protest against the prevailing lawlessness in the State. Kerala United Front disintegrated and Namboodiripad Government had to quit office.

Financial Emergency. If the President is satisfied that a situation has arisen whereby the financial stability or credit of India or of any part thereof is threatened, he may by Proclamation make declaration of Financial Emergency.¹⁶⁵ The Proclamation of Financial Emergency, like the Proclamation of Emergency due to war, external aggression or internal disturbance, remains in operation for two months unless before the expiration of that period it has been approved by a resolution of both Houses of Parliament. If the Proclamation is made at a time when the Lok

Sabha is dissolved or its dissolution takes place within two months of the Proclamation, it must be approved by the Rajya Sabha within the specified period of two months and by the newly elected Lok Sabha within thirty days of its first sitting. If the Lok Sabha does not approve it, the Emergency ceases to operate after the expiration of thirty days from the date when the Lok Sabha meets for its sitting.¹⁶⁶

During the period the Proclamation relating to Financial Emergency is in operation, the executive authority of the Union extends to the giving of directions to any State to observe such canons of financial propriety as may be specified in the directions and such other directions as may be deemed necessary and adequate by the President for maintaining financial stability and credit of India.¹⁶⁷ Notwithstanding anything contained in the Constitution such directions may:

1. (a) ask a State to reduce salaries and allowances of all or any class of public servants connected with the affairs of a State;
- (b) reserve all Money Bills for the consideration of the President after they have been passed by the State Legislature.
2. While the Proclamation of Financial Emergency is in operation, the President is competent to issue directions for the reduction of salaries and allowances of all or any class of persons including the judges of the Supreme Court and High Courts.

Emergency powers evaluated. Emergencies must arise in the life of every nation and there must be adequate provisions to meet them. "Self-preservation," as one writer has said, "is the first law of every nation and there must necessarily exist the competence to meet exigencies when they arise. The capacity for protection and self-defence is a necessary concomitant of sovereignty and nationality." The Central Government, therefore, in every State is constitutionally made responsible for protecting the country from external aggression and securing it from internal disturbances and violence.

The Constitution of the United States does not specifically provide for any kind of emergency. The Supreme Court, too, has held that "emergency does not create power"; nor does it increase power already given in the Constitution.¹⁶⁸ The Constitution simply provides that, "the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a Republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence."¹⁶⁹ In pursuance of this provision, the National Government had exercised tremendous powers. Invasion of the country must be met with all the might at the disposal of the Government. Congress had always faced the situation by enacting blanket legislation giving the President discretionary authority in matters of vital importance, domestic and foreign. In World War I President Wilson was given power to control production, purchase and sale of various kinds of material for war purposes and food supplies for troops. He had a vast reservoir of power in planning broad strategy, raising military and industrial manpower, and mobilising the nation's economy for war. In World War II, Roosevelt became a sort of a constitutional dictator. It, no doubt, meant abridgement in the liberties of the people, but there is no provision in the American Constitution whereby Fundamental Rights except the writ of habeas corpus,¹⁷⁰ can be suspended either during war or any other kind of emergency. The writ of habeas corpus can only be suspended when there is actual invasion of the country or an open rebellion in the country.

There has been no occasion in the United States when the Central Government might have suspended or interfered with the State Government on the ground that it has been recalcitrant in the performance of its constitutional obligations. If there is domestic violence which renders the smooth working of the State Government impossible, the Federal Government comes to the aid of the State authorities with its military forces. But federal intervention is occasioned only if the State desires that assistance and the State authorities are unable to control the internal disorders. The normal course is that the request for aid and assistance is made to the President either by the State Legislature or by the State Governor, if the Legislature is not in session. The President intervenes on his own initiative when it is felt that enforcement of the federal law or treaties would encounter violent resistance or federal property is in danger. In 1894, President Cleveland, despite the protests of the Governor of Illinois, sent soldiers to Chicago where a great railway strike, affecting the movement of commerce and mails, had taken place. President Woodrow Wilson, too, resorted to the same action on the occasion of the labour dispute among the steel workers at Gary, Indiana. President Harding ordered the troops to stand by in 1922, when the strike threatened to tie up the railways. Troops were sent to take over the plant of the North American Airplane Corporation in 1944, when strikers refused to heed the repeated appeals of the President. But examples of such intervention by the President on his own initiative are not common and whenever the President takes the initiative it is not due to the failure of the State authorities to meet the situation and maintain peace, but because of the right of the National Government to enforce in any part of the land the full and free exercise of all national powers and the security of all rights entrusted by the Constitution to its care. The State Constitution operates as before and the machinery of the State Government functions according to its laws.

In Britain there is no prerogative of the Crown to make a Proclamation of Emergency. The Emergency powers are given to the Executive, both during war and in the exigencies of internal disorder, under the authority of Parliament. The Acts of Parliament empower the Crown to declare a state of emergency and issue regulations thereunder by Orders-in-Council for the safety of the realm. Since these Regulations are made under statutory authority, they must be in conformity with the conditions prescribed in the Statute itself. If they are not, their validity can be questioned in Courts.

Article 48 of the Weimar Constitution provided: "Where public security and order are seriously disturbed or endangered within the Reich, the President of the Reich may take the measures necessary for their restoration, intervening in case of need with the help of armed forces. For this purpose, he is permitted, for the time being, to abrogate either wholly or partially the fundamental rights laid down in Articles.... The President of the Reich must, without delay, inform the Reichstag of any measures taken in accordance with.... this Article. Such measures shall be abrogated upon the demand of the Reichstag." This provision empowered the President to take any measures which he deemed necessary including the abrogation of Fundamental Rights, either partially or wholly, whenever it appeared to him that public security and order were seriously disturbed and endangered within the Reich. President Von Hindenburg, in pursuance of this constitutional provision, placed the City of Berlin in 1920 and the whole State of Germany in 1924-25 under Martial Law. The emergency powers of the President were, therefore, drastic both in case of external or internal aggression or disorder.

The Constitution of Switzerland, too, provides for emergency powers. The Federal Council must ensure due observance of the Constitution, the laws and decrees of the Confederation, and Federal Treaties. The Federal Council is, accordingly, empowered to intervene and take necessary action, either on its own initiative or in response to an appeal against a grievance, if the Cantonal Governments do not co-operate in the proper execution of Federal laws, decrees and international treaties. The action taken by the Federal Government may amount to withholding the subsidies given to the Canton and even troops may be sent for enforcement. In 1914 and especially in 1939 the Federal Assembly granted the Government exceptional and unlimited powers to protect the security, integrity and neutrality of the country, and to safeguard its credit, economic interest and food supply.

The Constitutions of the Cantons must comply with the provisions of the Federal Constitution. The National Government guarantees the Cantonal Constitutions provided they: (a) do not contain anything contrary to the provisions of the Federal Constitution; (b) provide for the exercise of political rights in conformity with the Republican or democratic forms of government, and (c) have been accepted by the people and may be amended on the demand of the absolute majority of the citizens. But there is no instance when the Federal Government had taken steps to suspend or interfere with a Cantonal Government on the ground that the latter had not fulfilled its constitutional obligations.

These instances abundantly make it clear that the Constitutions of every country adequately provide for emergency powers to meet aggression, external or internal, and other national emergencies, and during periods of emergency the rights and other constitutional guarantees are so modified as not to impede the Executive in taking such action as it may deem expedient and necessary. In Britain the maxim is Inter arma silent leges, when there is an armed conflict the laws remain silent and the Courts have tolerated it in the interests of the country. But almost in every country Executive assumes emergency powers under Legislative authority. In Britain, Parliament itself endows the Executive with authority to arrest without trial suspected persons by passing such Acts as the Defence of the Realm Act, 1914, and Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939. And a distinction is always made between an emergency due to war and an emergency due to internal disorder. Whatever be the nature and extent of emergency, the Rule of Law is always kept unimpaired. The Constitution of the United States ordains that "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."¹⁷¹ It will be clear from this provision that only actual invasion or rebellion justifies the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Internal disturbance, such as strike or any other similar cause, does not justify it. It has been, further, held that the power to suspend the writ is the exclusive right of Congress,¹⁷² and it is for the Courts to determine whether the conditions justify or not the exercise of this right by Congress.¹⁷³ There is no provision in the Constitution which empowers either the Executive or the Legislature to suspend any of the Fundamental Rights either during war or any other emergency. In a recent case it was held¹⁷⁴ that "Even war does not remove constitutional limitations safeguarding essential liberties." Every restriction on the rights and liberties of the people as a result of the "police power" of the State "must be weighed by the balance of justice."

Under the Constitution of Eire, the Executive has no emergency powers independent of the Legislature,¹⁷⁵ except the immediate steps which may become necessary to take for the protection of the State in the event of actual invasion. But the Constitution also prescribes that if Dail Eireann is not sitting it "shall be summoned to meet at the earliest practicable date."¹⁷⁶ In Switzerland the Federal Council is the servant of the National Assembly. It has no initiative of its own, and when it exercises the prerogatives relating to foreign affairs, to the armed forces, or to the ordinary conduct of public administration, there must be either previous authority of the Assembly for all those acts or subsequent ratification. The Federal Council cannot dominate the National Assembly.

India is the only country which follows the Weimar Constitution and vests Emergency Powers in the President. It is true that the President of India acts on the advice of his Council of Ministers in declaring Emergency, and on the assumption of Emergency Powers he is guided by his Ministers who derive their authority from and are responsible to Parliament. It is, again, true that the Proclamation of Emergency is laid before each House of Parliament and it ceases to operate at the expiration of two months unless before the expiration of that period it has been approved by a resolution of both Houses of Parliament. Moreover, the power of the President, under Article 359, to suspend the right to move the Courts for enforcement of any of the Fundamental Rights included in Part III of the Constitution is only an ad interim power, for every order issued by the President is required, as soon as may be after it is made, to be laid before Parliament. It is Parliament, under the circumstances, which may be said to be an ultimate authority with regard to the exercise and continuance of the Proclamation of Emergency.

But this is not sufficient to evaluate the exercise of Emergency Powers precisely. We must take cognisance of the following important facts:

(1) The Proclamation of Emergency remains valid for two months without its reference to Parliament. If its continuance is desired, it is only then that approval of Parliament becomes necessary and the approval is required to be obtained before the expiration of two months. The right of the Executive to issue the Proclamation of Emergency is, therefore, unfettered for two months.

(2) The President is the sole judge to determine whether conditions exist for the Proclamation of Emergency, and his decision or the justification of such a decision cannot be questioned in Courts.

(3) No distinction is made between an emergency due to war and an emergency in times of peace, that is, due to internal disturbances. Any kind of internal disturbance or a threat thereto, such as even a general strike, may lead to the Proclamation of Emergency and with same consequences as in the event of actual invasion of the country or a rebellion.

(4) The Proclamation of Emergency automatically suspends the right to seven freedoms guaranteed in Article 19.

(5) In normal circumstances the Fundamental Rights of citizens as contained in Chapter III of the Constitution, cannot be taken away by any law of Parliament or of the State Legislatures. But during the operation of the Proclamation of Emergency restrictions so imposed on the Legislative and Executive authorities of the Union and States are suspended and action taken by them as such cannot be challenged in a Court of law.

(6) The President may, during the operation of the Proclamation of Emergency, suspend the enforcement of Fundamental Rights. It is, however, not obligatory that he must suspend the enforcement of all the Fundamental Rights. He determines by an order the Rights the enforcement of which he deems necessary to remain suspended. But there is no bar on his power if he suspends the enforcement of all the Fundamental Rights.

(7) The order of the President suspending the enforcement of Rights is required to be laid before each House of Parliament. But when that order is to be laid before Parliament, it is for the President to decide and determine. The Constitution simply provides that the order shall, as soon as may be after it is made, be laid before each House of Parliament.

(8) It is rather unprecedented that a federal polity should go to the extent of superseding the Governments of the constituent States and abrogate their constitutions so long as the Presidential Proclamation remains in operation. The failure of the Constitutional machinery in a State can be declared, as it was done in the Punjab, PEPSU, Travancore-Cochin, and Andhra, Haryana, West Bengal, Bihar and Uttar Pradesh when there is a "political breakdown," or if the ruling party at the Centre so determines even if the State Ministry enjoys a stable majority and confidence of the Legislature, as it happened in Kerala in 1959. But what happened immediately after the 1967 General Elections shall, perhaps, remain unprecedented in the Constitutional History of India. Within a few hours of assuming office, the new Ministry at the Centre, on the advice of Governor Sampurnanand, whose conduct had been widely regarded as of very questionable democratic propriety, recommended to the President to impose his Rule. And all this happened on the very date the State Legislature was due to meet. Even failure to comply with the directions of the Union Government on the part of a State may lead to the issuing of Proclamation of the failure of the constitutional machinery in that State.

The Emergency Powers, as provided in the Indian Constitution, have been variously discussed. Article 359, empowering the President to suspend the right to enforce Fundamental Rights, had been the subject of a scathing criticism in the Constituent Assembly. Some members characterised it as the "grand finale and crowning glory of the most reactionary Chapter of the Constitution." Others called it an "arch of autocratic reaction," and a "plagiarised version of the British Emergency Powers Act, 1920." It was further asserted that in no other country the Executive exercised such a drastic power as the Union Executive in India. Even Dr. Ambedkar himself claimed in the Constituent Assembly that India was a federation during times of peace and a unitary State during times of war. While summing up the position of the Centre, Professor Bodh Raj Sharma writes, "Hence also the framers of the Indian Constitution have acted very wisely in making the Centre strong and in giving it powers to interfere in the affairs of the units in emergencies."¹⁷⁷

But it may be repeated that though Britain is a unitary State, yet the Crown has no prerogative to make a proclamation of emergency. The Crown derives emergency powers from Parliament and every individual has an unrestricted right to go to Courts of law and get it determined whether infringement of his liberties is in due conformity with the law enacted by Parliament. The principles of Sovereignty of Parliament and Rule of Law remain unimpaired during emergencies created by war or internal disorders.

Emergencies do require concentration of authority in the national Government. This is at least the verdict of history in every country. In India, the task of the Constitution-makers was pre-conditioned by inescapable factors of the previous regime and politico-economic set up of the country. It is, therefore, not surprising if the Emergency powers are drastic in many respects. But the exercise of such powers should be "constitutionally sanctioned." It has been argued that the Constitution provides sufficient safeguards against the misuse of power by the Union Executive. The responsibility of the Union Executive to Parliament, it is contended, is itself an adequate safeguard, and the Proclamation remains in operation so long as Parliament wills it. This is, indeed, true, but the snag still remains there. The President can issue the Proclamation of Emergency for a period of two months without going to Parliament for its ratification. And Proclamation of Emergency means automatic suspension of the essential freedoms of citizens and depriving them of their inalienable right to get redress from Courts. Article 359 leaves no opportunity to a citizen to have the excess of authority weighed by the balance of justice. This is rather unprecedented, if not atrocious in the context of a democratic set up. Neither the British nor the American Constitution contains anything corresponding to these provisions of the Indian Constitution.¹⁷⁸ It may not be relishing, but there is a perennial truth in the pronouncement of the American Supreme Court in the famous case Ex-parte Miligan. The Court observed, "No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man, than that any of its (Bill of Rights) provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of the Government."

177. "Position of the Centre in the New Indian Constitution". The Indian Journal of Political Science, July-Sept. 1951, p. 62.

THE ROLE OF THE PRESIDENT

The role which the President of India can play in the body politic of the country has been the subject of wide speculation. "Time alone will show", remarks Gledhill, "the extent to which the personal views of the President will prevail in the exercise of his functions." The Canadian and Australian Constitutions, he argues, draw distinctions between functions which their Governors-General are to exercise in their individual judgment, and those which they are to exercise on the advice of the ministers, but conventions have made this distinction obsolete and they exercise their functions now almost invariably on ministerial advice. "Though there may be a similar development in India," Gledhill adds, "it cannot have been the intention of the Founding Fathers that it shall follow as a matter of course."¹⁷⁹ Then, he says, "It is possible to contend that the Constitution does not sufficiently guard against the President becoming a dictator." His apprehensions are that an inordinately ambitious and unscrupulous President may not observe the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution and yet without violating the Constitution he can achieve his ambition by establishing an authoritarian system of government. Dr. B.M. Sharma maintains that the Constitution of India "has given very large powers to the President and does not make any definite provisions in regard to the manner in which he is to exercise his powers. It is all left to the arising of conventions how the President will carry out his duties, whether he will remain a constitutional head of the State or will be also head of the executive."¹⁸⁰ Professor Mrityunjay Banerjee uses rather severe language. He says, "It is very difficult to foresee the correct position which only future experience can show... still one cannot minimise the serious error committed by the founding fathers in India enacting a vague and ambiguous Constitution in laying down one provision and meaning another. A written Constitution is devised to prescribe in clear, unambiguous language the powers and functions of different bodies so as to reduce to the minimum the chances of friction between them. But the Indian Constitution-makers miserably overlooked this point in framing the Constitution, for which they may have one day to account to posterity. After all, nothing would have been lost and their prestige would not have been lowered in any way if a specific provision were enacted in the Constitution that the President in the exercise of his functions shall be guided by the advice of his Council of Ministers."¹⁸¹

Even in the deliberations of the Constituent Assembly provisions relating to the powers of the President were vehemently criticised. It was argued that the powers vested in the President to make for the convenient transaction of business of the Government;¹⁸² to refer decisions of individual Ministers to the Council of Ministers;¹⁸³ to send messages to Parliament whether with respect to a Bill then pending in Parliament or otherwise;¹⁸⁴ to veto bills or refer them back for reconsideration by Parliament¹⁸⁵ were all inconsistent with the system of Cabinet Government. These powers of the President of India, it was maintained, were more or less similar to the powers of the American President and, consequently, likely to create conflicts between the President and Parliament, as also constant interference by the President in the smooth working of the Cabinet. It was also contended that the absence of a specific provision in the Constitution that the President must always act on the advice of his Council of Ministers, might prompt the President to disregard the advice tendered by his Ministers and act independently of that advice. In support of their argument Dr. Rajendra Prasad was freely quoted. Referring to Article 74(1) of the Constitution Dr. Prasad had observed in the Constituent Assembly, "I have my doubts that these words will bind the President. The Article does not say that the President shall be bound to accept that advice. Is there any difficulty in making a specific provision that the President is bound to accept the advice?"

It has been further argued that conventions which bind the King of Britain to always act on the advice of his Ministers cannot be developed to that extent in India. A Constitution, it is asserted, like a tree is peculiar to a country and does not thrive on foreign soil. Britain is a country with an unwritten Constitution whereas India possesses a written Constitution and a written Constitution must be clear, definite and precise. A written Constitution is always supreme. It means, inter alia, that nothing may be done or enacted which conflicts with the provisions of the Constitution. Then, there is a sharp difference in the nature and political habits of the people in both the countries. Conventions, which are the sine qua non of the British Parliamentary system of Government, may not constitute a moral code for the guidance of Indian public men in the field of practical politics. The Presidents may, accordingly, find inspiration and legal backing in the provisions of the Constitution to establish themselves in the position of the real heads of the Executive. The Weimar Constitution provided an abiding lesson.

A spade of controversy was created by Dr. Rajendra Prasad, then President of India, when, in the course of his speech, November 28, 1960, on the occasion of the laying of the foundation stone of the Indian Law Institute, he said that "a close study should be made of the powers of the President of India under the Constitution"; that "in equating the powers of the President with those of the British Monarch, the Constitution was being wrongly interpreted"; that "there is no provision in the Constitution which in so many words lays down that the President shall be bound to act in accordance with the advice of the Council of Ministers"; that "the Indian Constitution was often being wrongly interpreted on the lines of the British Constitution"; and that "it was a pity that people in this country had got used to relying on precedents of England to such an extent that it seemed 'almost sacrilegious' to have a different interpretation even if conditions and circumstances in India might seem to require a different interpretation".

It is true that the Indian Constitution differs materially from the British Constitution not only being a written instrument but also in its contents. The Head of the State in the latter country is a hereditary Monarch and it is the accident of birth that determines the occupant of the Throne. In India, the Head of the State is an elected President who is eligible for re-election. He is, accordingly, answerable to his constituents for his official acts, which implies that he must have freedom to act as he thinks right and be in a position to justify his actions if the provision of re-election can have any substance. "He should not, therefore, be held to be bound by any convention to act upon the advice of others even when he considers such advice unsound." Then, Parliament in Britain is Sovereign and as Bagehot said, "The Queen of England must sign her death warrant, if the two Houses of Parliament unanimously sent it up to her." In India, the Constitution is supreme and Parliament exercises powers assigned to it by the Constitution. Its authority is limited and it has no jurisdiction to deprive the President of the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution. Furthermore, the British Constitution has nothing corresponding to the Directive Principles of State Policy as contained in the Indian Constitution. These Directive Principles are expressly stated to be fundamental in the governance of the country "and it shall be the duty of the State to apply these principles in making laws."¹⁸⁶ Suppose a Bill is passed by both Houses of Parliament which, in the opinion of the President, violates one of these Principles and suppose the Council of Ministers advise the President to assent to it. If he acts on that advice he will be doing something which in his view will be a violation of the Con-stitution¹⁸⁷ and may even make him liable to impeachment.¹⁸⁸ It follows that the President must be free to exercise his own free and unfettered judgment in such matters notwithstanding the well-established conventions observed in Britain and other parts of the world. "We cannot borrow a convention from Great Britain or any other country without examining the reasons which have led to its adoption in that country or the differing circumstances that prevail in our own."¹⁸⁹

But all this is too legalistic a view. The points raised by Dr. Rajendra Prasad in his statement, referred to above, had been anticipated by him and he himself gave their answer as President of the Constituent Assembly on November 26, 1949. He unequivocally stated that "We have had to reconcile the position of an elected President with an elected legislature, and in doing so, we have adopted more or less, the position of the British Monarch for the President. . . . His position is that of a constitutional President. Then we come to Ministers. They are, of course, responsible to the Legislature and tender advice to the President who is bound to act according to that advice. Although there is no specific provision in the Constitution itself making it binding on the President to accept the advice of his Ministers, it is hoped that the convention under which in England the sovereign always acted on the advice of his Ministers would be established in this country also and that the President, not so much on account of the written word in the Constitution but as a result of this very healthy convention, would become a constitutional President in all matters."¹⁹⁰ Dr. Prasad was really unfolding the system of Government as established by the Constitution and reiterated the categorical statements made by Dr. Ambedkar and other members of the Drafting Committee in the Constituent Assembly. Dr. Ambedkar, introducing the Draft Constitution on November 4, 1948, said, "In the Draft Constitution there is placed at the head of the Indian Union a functionary who is called the President of India. The title of this functionary reminds one of the President of the United States. But beyond identity of names there is nothing in common between the form of Government prevalent in America and the form of Government proposed under the Draft Constitution. The two are fundamentally different. Under the Presidential system of America, the President is the chief head of the Executive. The administration is vested in him. Under the Draft Constitution the President occupies the same position as the King under the English Constitution. He is the head of the State but not of the Executive. He represents the nation but does not rule the nation. He is the symbol of the nation. His place in the administration is that of a ceremonial device on a seal by which the nation's decisions are made known. He will be generally bound by the advice of his Ministers. He can do nothing contrary to their advice nor can he do anything without their advice."¹⁹¹

During the general discussion on the Constitution T.T. Krishnamachari said, "It has been mentioned that one of the chief defects of this Constitution is that we have not anywhere mentioned that the President is a constitutional head and the future of the President's powers is, therefore, doubtful. . . . This is a matter which has been examined by the Drafting Committee to some extent. The position of the President in a responsible government is not the same as the position of a President under a representative Government like America and this is a mistake that a number of people in the House have been making, when they said that the President will be an autocrat, and no one appears to realise that the President has to act on the advice of the Prime Minister. . . . So far as the relationship of the President with the Cabinet is concerned, I must say that we have, so to say, completely copied the system of responsible government that is functioning in Britain today; we have made no deviation from it and the deviations we have made are only such as are necessary because our Constitution is federal in structure."¹⁹² The Parliamentary form of Government has nowhere proved a workable system without the presence of a constitutional Head of the State whether he be the King or Queen as in Britain or an elected President as in India.

The controversial provisions of the Constitution¹⁹³ must be read in the light of the debates in the Constituent Assembly, for they reveal unmistakably the intention of the Constitution-framers. The Presidential form of Government was expressly rejected from the very start. A joint meeting of the Union and Provincial Committees held on June 7, 1947, opted, in Sardar Patel's words, for "the parliamentary system of Constitution, the British type of Constitution." B.N. Rau, the Constitutional Adviser to the Constituent Assembly, had suggested that the President should have powers to exercise in discretion but his suggestion was rejected. Moving for the consideration of the Report of the Committee on the Principles of the Union Constitution, Jawaharlal Nehru said (July 21, 1947), "Many members possibly at first might object to this indirect election and may prefer an election by adult suffrage. We have given anxious thought to this matter and we came to the very definite conclusion that it would not be desirable, first because we want to emphasise the ministerial character of the government, that power really resided in the ministry and in the legislature and not in the President as such. At the same time we did not want to make the President a mere figure-head like the French President. We did not give him any real power but we have made his position one of great authority and dignity. You will notice that he is also to be the Commander-in-Chief of the Defence Forces as the American President is."

As said earlier, the Draft of the Indian Constitution originally contained¹⁹⁴ a schedule of instructions to the President, and an Article one of whose clauses provided that in the exercise of his functions under the Constitution, he must be generally guided by these instructions. These instructions provided, inter alia, that the President must act on ministerial advice. The relevant instruction read: "In all matters, within the scope of the executive power of the Union, the President shall in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him be guided by the advice of his ministers." After a lengthy discussion ultimately the instructions as well as the clause were omitted as unnecessary. Quite a good number of members objected to the omission as they thought it was not all clear how far the conventions of the British Constitution would be binding under the Indian Constitution. But Dr. Ambedkar emphatically ruled out such objections and asserted that the conventions of the British Constitution, which had now become classical for the smooth running of the Parliamentary system of Government, were as much binding in India as they were in Britain. B.N. Rau summed up the issue thus: "That the convention about acting on ministerial advice ought to be the same in India as in England no one appears to have doubted; the only doubt voiced was whether this was sufficiently clear in the Indian Constitution. The Constituent Assembly on the assurance of the Law Minister that the point admitted of no doubt, agreed to omit the schedule and the clause."¹⁹⁵ H.V. Kamath reverted to the point again and on October 14, 1949, he bluntly asked Dr. Ambedkar, "If in any particular case the President does not act upon the advice of his Council of Ministers, will that be tantamount to the violation of the Constitution and will he be liable to impeachment?" Dr. Ambedkar's categorical reply was "that there is not the slightest doubt about it."¹⁹⁶ Alladi Krishnaswamy Ayyar, another member of the Drafting Committee, too, thought "that the point as to the necessity of provision is entirely without substance." Article 61 of the Draft Constitution, [the present Article 74(1)] was "merely a euphemistic way of saying that the President shall be guided by the advice of his Ministers in the exercise of his functions."

The first essential principle of a Parliamentary democracy is that the Head of the State is not the head of the administration. He is the symbol of the nation and not the ruler of the nation. The ruling power lies with the Council of Ministers appointed by the President, but they must be the members of Parliament. Though legally the Ministers hold office during the pleasure of the President, yet the pleasure of the President is really the pleasure of Parliament. The Constitution definitely prescribes that the Council of Ministers shall be collectively responsible to the House of the People. Responsibility to the Lok Sabha (House of the People) is tantamount to its confidence and the President who ventures to dismiss his Council of Ministers holding the confidence of the Lok Sabha will be acting unconstitutionally and, thus, risking his own existence as Head of the State. Unlike the Governor of a State, the Constitution does not vest the President with the exercise of discretionary powers. A specific amendment was moved in the Constituent Assembly which sought to lay down that the President shall not be bound to accept the Ministerial advice where he has discretionary powers to perform and the amendment was rejected. Opposing the amendment the Law Minister said, "there is no case which can arise where the President would be called upon to discharge his functions without the advice of the Prime Minister." He added, however, that "under a parliamentary system of Government, there are only two prerogatives which the King or the Head of the State may exercise. One is the appointment of the Prime Minister and the other is the dissolution of Parliament." But the exercise of both these prerogatives is subject to well-recognised conventions. Neither of these he can exercise in his unfettered discretion.

195. Rau, B.N., India's Constitution in the Making, pp. 378-79.

196. Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. X, pp. 268-71.

If a Party has a clear majority in Parliament, the President has no choice in the appointment of the Prime Minister. He must summon the leader of the majority party to form a Government. But he has a choice when no Party in Parliament gains a majority. In such a case, the President will select a person who will be able to command a majority either by coalition or some compromise with other parties. When Jawaharlal Nehru died Gulzari Lal Nanda, the seniormost Minister, was immediately sworn in as the acting Prime Minister till the Congress Party had elected its leader. The Party elected Lal Bahadur Shastri as its leader and he, ipso facto, became the Prime Minister replacing Nanda. In his Republic Day Message the President referred to the "dignified and orderly transition" to the new leadership. Lal Bahadur Shastri died on January 11, 1965, the interim arrangement again made Gulzari Lal Nanda as the Prime Minister. The Congress Party elected Mrs. Indira Gandhi as its leader and she was appointed Prime Minister. This time there were two contestants for leadership, Mrs. Indira Gandhi and Mr. Morarji Desai. The President again referred to the election of the leader and the appointment of the Prime Minister in his Republic Day Message to the nation and said, "The election (between Mrs. Gandhi and Mr. Desai) was a contested one and its conduct proved a victory for sheer decency in public life. The two candidates were free from traces of bitterness or rancour. They both love the country and the ideals we cherish and our people will stand together as one in facing the tremendous task that awaits us." The Fourth General Elections gave the Congress Party, once again, a clear majority in the Lok Sabha and the Party elected Mrs. Indira Gandhi its leader and she was appointed Prime Minister for the second time.

As said earlier, authorities are divided on whether the Monarch in Britain can refuse to accept the advice of the Prime Minister to dissolve Parliament. There has never been a case during the last more than hundred years when dissolution might have been refused. The better view, however, is that while the power to refuse dissolution exists, it will be exercised only in "exceptional circumstances." Precisely the same role the President of India is to play.

It has been suggested that the power of the President under Article 78 which imposes a duty on the Prime Minister to submit, if the President so required, for the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister but which has not been considered by the Council, prima facie, is intended to be used by him in his discretion. Accordingly, the President, in appropriate cases, has the power to refer back to the Council of Ministers for its consideration and decision a matter on which the Council of Ministers has earlier taken no decision. The use of the word 'decision' here is of significant importance as it rebuts the argument that the President possesses discretion in this respect. The logical interpretation is that the Constitution demands from the Ministers and the Council of Ministers that they should make decisions. It is not the function of the President. The decisions made by the Ministers and the Council of Ministers are enforced in the name of the President and for all such decisions the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to Parliament. But all matters relating to Government and its different Departments are not discussed and decided in the meetings of the Cabinet. There are certain matters which are left to the individual responsibility of the Ministers in charge of different Departments and they take decisions thereupon. If the President feels that a decision taken by a Minister is of such importance that it ought to have been considered by the Council of Ministers he may direct the Prime Minister accordingly. But the ultimate decision will be that of the Council of Ministers. In Britain, too, the Monarch can suggest to the Prime Minister to consider the decision taken by a Minister if he so feels. The final decision is that of the Prime Minister. In India reference is made to the Council of Ministers for final decision and it is binding on the President in the same way and to the same extent as the final decision taken by the British Prime Minister is binding on the Monarch.

The provision in Article 78 is really intended to be a safeguard to ensure collective responsibility and solidarity of the Council of Ministers and it followed the practice as it existed on the eve of the commencement of the Constitution. As explained by Dr. Ambedkar, while this provision was being discussed in the Constituent Assembly, the practice was to send weekly summaries prepared by each Ministry containing decisions taken by it to the Cabinet and the Governor-General. If on perusal of these summaries the Governor-General thought that a particular decision taken by a Minister was not good, he would place that matter for re-consideration of the Cabinet. The President does not preside over the Cabinet meetings and, accordingly, the Constitution has imposed a duty on the Prime Minister to submit it for the consideration of the Council of Ministers if it has not already taken a decision thereupon.

The Supreme Court of India has given an unequivocal judicial recognition, in its unanimous judgment in Rai Sahib Ram Jiwaya Kapur and others v. The State of Punjab, to the well established principles of the Parliamentary Government vis-a-vis of the relationship between the President of India and the Council of Ministers. The judgment, inter alia, declared. "...The limits within which the Executive Government can function under the Indian Constitution can be ascertained without much difficulty by reference to the form of the executive which our Constitution has set up. Our Constitution though federal in its structure is modelled on the British Parliamentary system where the executive is deemed to have the primary responsibility for the formulation of government policy and its transmission into law though the condition precedent to the exercise of this responsibility is its retaining the confidence of the legislative branch of the State. The executive function comprises both the determination of the policy as well as carrying it into execution. This evidently includes the initiation of legislation, the maintenance of order, the promotion of social and economic welfare, the direction of foreign policy, in fact, the carrying on or supervision of the general administration of the State.

"In India as in England, the Executive has to act subject to the control of the Legislature, but in what way is this control exercised by the Legislature? Under Article 53(1) of our Constitution, the Executive power of the Union is vested in the President, but under Article 75 there is to be a Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister at the head to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions. The President has thus been made a formal or constitutional head of the executive and the real executive powers are vested in the Ministers or the Cabinet. In the Indian Constitution, therefore, we have the same system of parliamentary executive as in England and the Council of Ministers consisting, as it does, of the members of the legislature is, like the British Cabinet, 'a hyphen that joins, a buckle which fastens the legislative part of the State to the executive part.' The Cabinet enjoying, as it does, a majority in the legislature concentrates in itself the virtual control of both legislative and executive functions; and as the Ministers constituting the Cabinet are presumably agreed on fundamentals and act on the principle of collective responsibility, the most important questions of policy are all formulated by them."

When the President is to be entirely guided by the advice of his Ministers, the provision that the President makes rules for the conduct of government business and its allocation among Ministers has no constitutional importance. Even if it has, the President has no constitutional right to preside over the meetings of the Cabinet and it is always in the meetings of the Cabinet that matters of policy and administration are decided. Ministers preside over the Departments of Government and in the administration of their Departments they follow the directions of the Cabinet and enforce its decisions and policies. Any deviation therefrom is against the solidarity of the Government and the principle of collective responsibility enshrined in the Constitution.

The assumptions made by Gledhill¹⁰⁷ to prove that the President can without violating the Constitution establish an authoritarian system of government have no substance. Professor Gledhill invited the reader to imagine a situation in which notice having been given under Article 61 of the Constitution to impeach the President for the violation of the Constitution, but before a resolution can be moved, after the expiry of fourteen days, he dissolves Parliament, dismisses the Ministers and appoints others of his own choice, as for six months it is not necessary that they should be members of Parliament. The President may issue Ordinances, which will be as valid as Acts of Parliament for six months. Then, he makes a Proclamation of Emergency, reduces the federation to a practically unitary State and suspends Fundamental Rights. As Commander-in-Chief he may use the armed forces in support of his policy and authority. "This may seem a nightmare," remarks Gledhill, "but it is not dissimilar to the way in which the Weimar Constitution was destroyed."

Gledhill makes much too much of the fact that the President is the Supreme Commander of the Defence Forces. There is no warrant for such a role by the President in the Constitution. Article 53(1) which vests the executive power of the Union in the President also "provides that it shall be exercised by him either directly or through officers subordinate to him in accordance with the Constitution. Clause (2) of the same Article which confers on the President the Supreme Command of the Defence Forces also lays down that "the exercise thereof shall be regulated by law."¹⁹⁸ Supreme Command of the Defence Forces, therefore, is no more than an adjunct to his office and is subject to those limitations that bind him in the primary role as Head of the State.

197. The Republic of India, op. cit., p. 108.

The major issue is, then, what are the Constitutional limitations on the exercise by the President of his all-embracing powers. The issue has been dealt quite at length in the preceding pages, but never-ending controversy still rivets on the issue and it gains added importance when a living-member of the Drafting Committee, which drafted the Constitution, enters into the controversy and revises his former decision expressed on the Draft Constitution, in 1948, and perhaps the best in defence of Parliamentary form of Government as established in India. K.M. Munshi in his Article, "Thoughts on the Constitution" says, "The history of the relevant constitutional provisions, however, shows that the Constituent Assembly chose neither the British Cabinet form of Government, nor the American Presidential form, but a composite form in which the Parliamentary Executive and the President are to exercise their executive powers and functions within the framework of the express provisions of the Constitution." He further says that the provisions of the Constitution were the outcome of a definite decision that "the President should not be the creature of Parliament nor the nominee of the Party in power at the Centre, nor a figurehead as the President in the French Constitution of 1875, but an independent organ of the State representing the whole Union and exercising independent powers." Munshi, accordingly, justifies the President assuming all the rights that the law allowed him.¹⁹⁹ Earlier Munshi had said, "The President was expected to be a political force representing national unity, and as will be seen from the express provisions of the Constitution, was invested as such with authority, dignity and residual power, so that, when political parties develop inflexible attitudes, he being above party, could restrain their excesses and defend the Constitution. His principal role was 'to prevent a parliamentary government from becoming parliamentary anarchy', or a majority government from indulging in constitutional excess."²⁰⁰ He further said, "The importation of English conventions to supplant the trust reposed in the President or the powers and functions with which he is invested with the express provisions of the Constitution, is tantamount to an amendment of the Constitution by convention, that is, without undergoing the formalities prescribed by the Constitution in respect of matters which are organic to the constitutional structure."²⁰¹ This is in sharp contrast to his views expressed in the Constituent Assembly. Munshi then had said, "Today the Dominion Government of India is functioning as a full-fledged parliamentary government. After this experience why should we go back upon the tradition that has been built over a hundred years and try a novel experiment." Munshi had also said that the strongest government and the most elastic executive has been found in Britain "and that is because, the executive powers vest in the Cabinet supported by a majority in the Lower House . . . , it is the rule of the majority in the legislature, for it supports its leader in the Cabinet, which advises the head of the State, namely the King. The King is thus placed above party. He is really made the symbol of the impartial dignity of the Constitution."²⁰² The Constitution, accordingly, established a Parliamentary form of Government under a President and not a composite form wherein the President exercises independent powers and his office is an independent organ of the State. There can be either a Parliamentary form of Government or Presidential but not a mixture of the two as both essentially conflict with each other in their basic principles.

At the International Legal Conference held in Delhi in 1953, Patanjali Sastri, a former Chief Justice of India, propounded the view that the exercise of Presidential authority is limited only to the extent specifically mentioned in the Constitution and that it cannot be further restrained by the application of precedents from other Constitutions. The contrary view was expressed by M.C. Setalvad, the former Attorney-General and supported by B.N. Rau, Constitutional Adviser to the Constituent Assembly, that the President has no functions to discharge of his own authority. Like the British Crown he has merely "the right to be consulted, the right to encourage and the right to warn." The Constitution of a country is not to be found in its laws alone. No Constitution can ever be complete by itself. Nor can it be ever in the minds of the Constitution-makers to work in all details a complete and final scheme of Government operative for generations to come. They always seek merely a starting point and, thus, provide a skeleton to be clothed by what Maitland has called "rules of constitutional morality", or the customs or the conventions and they always and everywhere constitute the essential parts of the basic framework of the fundamental rules of the government. Even a jurist like Sir John Salmond admitted that "The Constitution as seen in the eyes of law may not agree in all points with the objective reality. Much constitutional doctrine may be true in law but not in fact, or true in fact but not in law. Power may exist de jure but not de facto or de facto but not de jure . . . Nowhere is this discordance between the Constitution in fact and in law more serious and obvious than in England. A statement of the strict legal theory of the British Constitution would differ curiously from a statement of the actual facts. Similar discrepancies exist, however, in most other States. A complete account of a Constitution, therefore, involves a statement of constitutional custom as well as of constitutional law."²⁰³

In a Parliamentary form of Government a legal truth cannot always be a political truth as the real problem is not what is legally permissible but what is politically wise. The political wisdom demands from the President that "he should be more and more like the Monarch in England, eschewing legal power, standing outside the clash of parties and gaining in moral authority.¹⁹⁰⁴ If the President differs in his views from those of his Ministers, but ultimately accepts their advice in deference to a well-understood convention, and even if such acceptance of advice should result in a breach of some "fundamental right" or the "Directive Principles" enunciated in the Constitution, the responsibility will be that of the Ministers and not of the President. At one time it was felt that the President by virtue of his powers vested in him under Articles 53, 77 and 111, and more especially under Article 111, should prevent legislation prejudicial to the Directive Principles, but the Law Minister ruled it out on the ground that the Constitution does not warrant it as "ours is a parliamentary system of Government wherein the President functions only with the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers."¹⁹⁰⁵

To sum up, both the laws and conventions of the Parliamentary Government require a "dignified and detached figure" at the head of the State. That is the President of India. The provisions of the Constitution and debates of the Constituent Assembly copiously authenticate it supported by the well-understood conventions. Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru had times out of number reiterated it and so have other Ministers. At a Press Conference on July 7, 1959 Nehru, once again, reminded the correspondents that the system of Government in India was not a Presidential but a Cabinet system. "I saw some kind of discussion," he said, "about the constitutional aspect and powers, etc. I do not think there is any room for discussion on the subject; that is quite clear according to our Constitution. Our Constitution makes the President constitutionally rather like the King or Queen of England. If this were not so, you can see the whole question of responsibility of the Cabinet and of Parliament would suffer. Parliament is supreme."¹⁹⁰⁶ Replying to the debate in the Lok Sabha on the non-official Bill restricting the tenure of office of the President to two terms, Ashoka Sen, the Law Minister, said that members should remember that "the President acted only on the advice of the Cabinet and to be more specific on the advice of the Prime Minister."¹⁹⁰⁷

205. Refer to K.C. Markandan's Directive Principles in the Indian Constitution, pp. 1-2. V. Shanker, a former Secretary of the Government of India, writes, "There is one other important power which the President has and which does not appear to be covered by the article 'aid and advice'. The President is the Supreme Commander of the Defence Forces of the Union. Under Article 53 this power can be regulated by an act of Parliament but it does not appear that there is any specific legislation on the subject. This power is particularly relevant in the context of the extra-constitutional rule of Martial Law in respect of which there is no specific constitutional provision but there is only an oblique reference in Article 34 of the Constitution. The Article enables Parliament to pass an Act of Indemnity after the Martial Law regime has come to an end. It is true that the Article refers to 'act done in connection with the maintenance or restoration of order in any area within the territory of India' and as such it might be construed that a declaration of Martial Law can only refer to a situation of general disorder which a civil administration is unable to deal with even with the aid of Armed Forces of the Union. It has been conceded, however, that the Article does contemplate the proclamation of Martial Law without any prior legislative sanction." *The President's Powers. The Law Minister, therefore, disagreed with the mover's contention that a third term for the President for the same person might lead to dictatorship. The Law Minister, P. Govinda Menon, maintained, in the "Meet-The-Press" National Programme of the All-India Radio,²⁰⁸ that the President could not carry on the administration without the advice of a Council of Ministers and that the Constitution does not envisage any take over of the Union administration by the President. The Law Minister told a questioner that the President's position as the Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces was "symbolic and notional" and it did not give him any special powers to govern the country with the help of the Armed Forces. Making further clarifications, he asserted that the convention, as obtainable in Britain, under which the Monarch could not function without the aid and advice of the Cabinet, would apply to the Centre but not the States. There was a definite provision for President's rule in the Constitution about States under certain circumstances. Sanjiva Reddy, a candidate for Presidency in the 1969 election, in his appeal to members of Parliament and State Legislatures to vote for him significantly assured them that the President of India "is the constitutional Head who has no policy and no programme of his own." It was the Government of the day which decided these within the framework of the Constitution.²⁰⁹

President as Adviser. It does not, however, mean that the President is just a mere figurehead or "a magnificent cipher." This according to K. Suba Rao, former Chief Justice of India, is a cynical view.²¹⁰ His office is of great dignity and he exercises great influence over the policies and administration of the government. Jagjiwan Ram, who has been a Minister for about two decades now, has said, "The President of India exercises his moderating influence and inspires or moulds policies and actions so silently and unabtrusively that many are prone to think that, unlike any other Head of a State, he neither reigns nor rules."²¹¹ If the Parliamentary system of government divests the President of powers, it does not mean that he exercises no influence. There is a good deal of difference between power and influence. Jennings, while dealing with the power and position of the British King, says, "A function to be exercised on advice is not formal or automatic."²¹² The King must be persuaded on many occasions and on occasions the King may do the persuading. Prime Minister Asquith wrote, in his Memorandum on the rights and obligations of the King: "he is entitled and bound to give his ministers all relevant information that comes to him; to point out objections which seem to him valid against the course which they advise; to suggest (if he thinks fit) an alternative policy. Such intimations are always received with utmost respect and considered with more respect and deference than if they proceeded from any other quarter."²¹³ To put it in the oft-quoted words of Bagehot, the Sovereign has "three rights—the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, the right to warn." And "a King of great sense and sagacity," he further adds, "would want no others." Exactly the same role the Constitution assigns to the President. B.N. Rau has aptly said that "acting on ministerial advice does not necessarily mean the immediate acceptance of the Ministry's first thoughts. The President can state all his objections to any proposed course of action and ask his ministers in Council, if necessary, to reconsider the matter. It is only in the last resort that he should accept their final advice."

Although the President does not attend and preside over the Cabinet meetings, yet he must keep himself abreast of what the Cabinet does and what the public feels. The President maintains his own Secretariat manned by two Secretaries, Secretary to the President and the Military Secretary to the President. Each Secretary has his separate establishment. The Secretary to the President is usually a very senior member of the Civil Service and he provides the liaison between the President and various Ministries of the Union Government. The Prime Minister is required to keep the President informed of all decisions of the Council of Ministers and the proposals for legislation, to furnish him all the information he may call for relating to the administration of the affairs of the Union and proposals for legislation, and to submit, if the President so requires, for the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister but which has not been considered by the Council. This he may do, to enable the decisions of individual Ministers articulate through the channel of collective responsibility of the Ministry.

The President often writes to the Prime Minister and gives expression to his views on various important matters confronting the country. Prime Minister Nehru said at a Press Conference: "I see the President frequently and we discuss naturally current matters and developments and sometimes he writes to me, sometimes I write to him. It is a practice that has gone for years and years. . . . Sometimes when he writes to me I circulate the letters to members of the Cabinet. That is the normal practice." There was a question from a correspondent that "Will the President come in the way of the economic reforms now being proposed?" The Prime Minister replied, "Please do not bring the President into this. The President does not come in the way. He is a constitutional President. Naturally, as a senior veteran in the struggle we ourselves go to him for advice but the responsibility for decisions is that of the Cabinet: and nothing is going to be postponed in the way you suggest."²¹⁴ The whole issue related to the publication of the President's letter to the Prime Minister in the press wherein it was reported that the President in his letter expressed differences of opinion on the Government's policy on certain matters like co-operative farming and State trading.

Differences also arose between Dr. Rajendra Prasad and Prime Minister Nehru in 1950 on the Hindu Code Bill and the Government had to postpone the consideration of the Bill for sometime. In 1959, Dr. C.D. Deshmukh, former Finance Minister, had suggested in a speech in Madras the need for the appointment of a high-powered tribunal to examine the charges of corruption against Ministers and other influential persons. Dr. Deshmukh also maintained that he had concrete evidence with him to substantiate and prove the allegation and that he would produce it only before an independent tribunal. The President thereupon wrote to the Prime Minister to seriously consider Dr. Deshmukh's suggestion and take prompt and effective measures to root out corruption. The Prime Minister did not agree to the appointment of a tribunal, although he fully shared the President's anxiety to root out corruption. Another important issue on which the President and the Prime Minister differed was the introduction of Hindi for official purposes. The President advised the Prime Minister to speedily and vigorously encourage the use of Hindi so that it might become the sole official language as early as possible. Nehru, on the other hand, argued that the pace of Hindi in Government offices should not be forced because of practical difficulties in using it at all levels, and, secondly, it would meet stiff opposition from non-Hindi areas, especially from the South. Dr. Rajendra Prasad, therefore, did not act as a mere figurehead during his tenure of office. He tried to influence the decisions of the Cabinet by his advice and warning and ultimately yielded to the decision of the Cabinet. When Dr. Rajendra Prasad retired from his office as President, the Prime Minister and Parliament paid warm tributes for the ability and tact with which he had conducted himself as the Constitutional Head of the State. The address presented to him on May 8, 1962, inter alia, said, "By your qualities of unostentatious grace, your utter simplicity, clarity of outlook, deep humility and broad humanity, you invested a special meaning and significance in your choice as President. As the first President of India, you have enriched and embellished the office and are leaving behind inspiring traditions."

Dr. Radhakrishnan during his tenure of office had been exceptionally frank in publicly giving expression to his views. In his Republic Day broadcast on January 25, 1963, he said: "our credulity and negligence are responsible for our reverses" in NEFA. In a speech in Bombay the President declared India's reverses as "a matter of sorrow, shame and humiliation." In November 1963, in his Convocation address delivered at the Uttar Pradesh Agricultural University, the President attributed stagnation of agriculture to "lack of true, wise leadership and administrative inefficiency." In a broadcast message on January 25, 1964, Dr. Radhakrishnan cautioned the nation against complacency towards corruption and said, "It would be well to recognise that the tolerance of our society for weak, inefficient and unclean administration is not unlimited." But his broadcast message to the nation on January 25, 1967, came from an anguished heart. He warned the nation that the "prospect of a revolution" was "inescapable," if unruly behaviour, fasts and violence in the country did not end. Describing 1966 as the worst since Independence, full of natural calamities and human failures, the President said that even after making allowance for all difficulties of the situation, "we cannot forgive widespread incompetence and the gross mismanagement of our resources."

In spite of this open criticism of the Government's policy, Nehru, Shastri and Mrs. Gandhi got on well with Dr. Radhakrishnan. Unlike Dr. Rajendra Prasad, Dr. Radhakrishnan did not claim larger powers than commonly allowed to the President. Philosophers in public authority are rare. Marcus Aurelius was the philosopher King, Radhakrishnan was the philosopher President and as an upholder of the Constitution, he was a wise Head of the State who advised, warned and encouraged as the occasion demanded. On the death of Prime Minister Nehru, the President in a broadcast to the nation said, "Nehru held the office of the Prime Minister of our country since the dawn of independence; and in the long years of his Premiership tried to put our country on a progressive, scientific, dynamic and non-communal basis. His steadfast loyalty to certain fundamental principles of liberalism gave direction to our thought and life. . . . He used the existing social and political institutions and breathed in them a new spirit, a new vitality." Dr. Radhakrishnan congratulated the Prime Minister and the Government and the Chiefs of the Staff "on the hard and excellent work which they and those working under their leadership" did during the Indo-Pakistan conflict in 1965.

The President's role, in brief, is that of a critic, adviser and friend of his Ministers. Acting on Ministerial advice does not mean acceptance of the Ministry's first thought. As an adviser he may press his opinions as forcefully as he likes. He may state all his objections to any proposed course of action and ask his Council of Ministers, if necessary, to reconsider the matter. It has been rightly said that "the voice of reason is more readily heard when it can persuade but no longer coerce." With wide political knowledge and wide experience at his command, he may influence the decisions of his Ministers and help even moulding the policy of the Government. But the final decision is that of the Council of Ministers. He may resist, but he must not persist and in the last resort give way and accept their final advice if the Council of Ministers refuse to accept his advice. As a friend of Ministers the President must not carry his point so far as to threaten the stability of the Government.

In the final analysis the Presidency is what its occupant makes of it. The President must have a dynamic personality, political wisdom and independence of mind and intellect. His influence will be strictly in proportion to the quality of his personality and character. It depends also on the President's relations with his Council of Ministers. The history of Presidency under Dr. Rajendra Prasad and Dr. Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan, in spite of the former's controversial statement of November 28, 1960, and the latter's public criticism of the Government, is resplendent with what a sagacious occupant of that august office can do in dispelling all doubts, real or imaginary, regarding the possible abuse or misuse of the President's powers. Both have set precedents which help to fulfil the objectives of the Father-framers of the Constitution. So did Dr. Zakir Hussain during the brief period of his Presidency. The new President, V.V. Giri, on the assumption of his office on August 14, 1969, rededicated himself "to the service and well-being of India." The Fourth President of India, in his speech after he was sworn in, said, "Rightly India has been described as the world's largest democracy. In a system of parliamentary democracy which we have deliberately fashioned for ourselves, it is essential that we achieve our desired results by the collective effort of the people. We must remind ourselves constantly of the ever present danger that democracy, when it becomes merely formal, would collapse. . . . A deep concern for national welfare alone can make our democracy meaningful and lasting."

New era. But the sudden death of Dr. Zakir Hussain has brought into focus certain new dimensions of the Indian Presidency. The country has now passed into a new era of politics which has few of the features characteristic of the last two decades. The first three Presidents were the unanimous choice of the Indian National Congress. The fourth Presidential election has wrecked the Indian National Congress. There was an open revolt and, in spite of the Party Whip, the official candidate, N. Sanjiva Reddy, was defeated. Quite a sizeable number of Congress Members of Parliament and the State Legislatures pleaded to vote according to their "conscience" and they did. The split, thus, created in the Congress was averted by the latest decision of the Working Committee, but truce did not halt innuendoes. Leading figures of the two Congress factions continued to make harsh comments which were hardly conducive to amity and the Indian National Congress is finally divided into two working groups.

Besides this disquieting feature of the party politics of the Indian National Congress, there is the threat from the Communist Party of India (Marxist) leaders, of the destruction of the Constitution, "lock, stock and barrel" to use the language of A.K. Gopalan and Jyoti Basu, the Deputy Chief Minister of West Bengal. There are also persistent claims from several quarters for a fresh examination of Centre-State relations. There is, again, a demand for the assertion of Parliament's supreme right to modify or revise any part of the Constitution, including the Chapter on Fundamental Rights. The utility of the Second Chambers has been denied in more than one State and legislation has been undertaken by Parliament to abolish them in two States. Men like Jaya Prakash Narayan enthusiastically champion the creation of small States and keenly advocate a devolution of considerable authority and power to local bodies.

V.V. Giri, too, took an extraordinary step by announcing his decision to enter the Presidential contest on his own without being sponsored by any one of the political parties. Understandably, he was disappointed that the Indian National Congress did not observe the convention of supporting the Vice-President for election as President, though he himself did not consider this convention important when he decided to contest the election. His contention was that the call to duty and the "dictates of his conscience" compelled him to seek election. But his statement was an election manifesto listing his sacrifices in the past and his various contributions to national causes which entitled him to seek public support. When, however, he sought to imply that the Congress Party's selection did not do justice to the country and was unfair to the Congress organization, that the candidate chosen did not enjoy the confidence of other groups and therefore the choice tended to lower the moral authority of the august office of the President, Giri entered the arena of party politics. Whether it is for the Acting President to say that the Congress Parliamentary Board had "failed to give a correct lead to the country" may be questioned, even if the statement is entirely well founded.

Hitherto a General Election has meant elections not only to the Lok Sabha (House of People) and to most if not all of the State Legislatures but also election to the office of President. There will be no such simultaneity in future. The Fourth President's tenure will, thus, extend well beyond the 1972 General Election. It is quite on the cards now that no Party will be able to command a majority in the Lok Sabha after the 1972

Election and be in a position to form the Government. Even if the Indian National Congress were to set its House in order, it is unlikely to obtain even a tenuous majority. There might, then, be a larger conglomeration of parties and groups with differing ideologies and loyalties and power hungry individuals, all inclined to align themselves to whichever combination holds out hopes of gaining political office and power. There might also be a spate of defections and counter defections reproducing conditions which brought parliamentary democracy in many States into disrepute.

It is this gloomy prospect that gives a magnitude of importance to the role of the President. It may give the President the leverage to make himself not merely the Head of the State but the virtual head of the Government, and to combine what Bagehot called the "efficient" with the "dignified" function of the Presidency. Gledhill's hypothetical situation might prove to be a matter of reality because it will be in accordance with the letter of the law. The President can destroy the Constitution with the instruments placed in his hands by the Constitution itself. It is, therefore, only the sagacity and judgment of the President that can save the Parliamentary democracy in India. As a safeguard against the uncertainty ahead, some well-meaning persons²¹⁵ have suggested that some of the proposals made by the Constitutional Adviser, B.N. Rau, in his original draft of the Constitution²¹⁶ should be reconsidered in order to avoid possible conflicts in future between the President and the Cabinet.

THE COUNCIL OF MINISTERS

The Council of Ministers. If the President is the Constitutional Head of the State, the real executive is the Council of Ministers. Article 74 provides that there shall be a Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister at the Head to aid and advise the President in the exercise of his functions. The President appoints the Prime Minister and other Ministers are appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister.¹ The Ministers hold office during the pleasure of the President² while the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha.³ Before a Minister enters upon his office, the President shall administer to him the Oaths of Office and Secrecy according to the prescribed form in the third Schedule.⁴ A Minister must be a member of either House of Parliament. If he is not, he ceases to be a Minister after the expiration of six months.⁵ The salaries and allowances of Ministers are to be such as Parliament may from time to time by law determine.⁶

The question whether any, and if so what, advice was tendered by Ministers to the President cannot be enquired into in any court.⁷ Article 361 further provides that the President shall not be answerable to any Court for any act done by him in the performance of the duties of his office. The question of ministerial advice, therefore, cannot be brought before Courts and personal immunity from legal action, whether during office or thereafter, is given to the President. It also establishes that the relations between the President and his Ministers are confidential. The principle involved in these provisions is similar to the doctrine of the British Constitution that "the King can do no wrong." In the literal sense, it means that the King is above law and he cannot be called to account for his private conduct in any Court of Law or by any legal process; not even, as Dicey humorously observed, if he were to shoot his own Prime Minister. The President of India, too, enjoys immunity from criminal proceedings during his term of office, though there is no bar to prosecute him after he has been removed from office by impeachment.⁸

II

The form of oath of Secrecy reads:

But the real meaning of the phrase that "the King can do no wrong" is that the Sovereign may not perform any public act involving the exercise of discretionary powers except on advice of the Ministers. And for every act performed in the name of the Sovereign the Ministers are responsible to Parliament. To put all this in a matter of fact language, the King can do nothing, right or wrong, of a discretionary nature and having legal effect. His name cannot be referred to in connection with any public act anywhere in Courts or within or without Parliament. Nor can any Minister plead the orders of the King in defence of a wrongful act or for any error of omission and commission. The Constitution of India makes the setting up of a Council of Ministers obligatory and the President must govern with the aid and advice of the Ministers. The relations between the President and the Council of Ministers are confidential and are constitutionally safeguarded by the provision that the nature of advice tendered by Ministers cannot be enquired into the Courts. The advice given by the Ministers is binding on the President as the Constitution empowers them to make decisions.⁹ It follows, then, that the President of India, like the King in Britain, cannot perform any public act involving the exercise of discretionary powers except on the advice of his Ministers. The Ministers must be members of Parliament and collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha. The Constitution also prescribes that the salaries and allowances of Ministers are to be such as Parliament may from time to time by law determine.¹⁰ The logical conclusion is that for every act performed in the name of the President, the Ministers are, as in Britain, responsible to Parliament. As the relations between the President and the Ministers are confidential, the Ministers cannot plead the orders of the President to justify an illegal and unconstitutional act and thereby shield themselves behind the legal immunities of the occupant of the Presidential office.

The Constitution of India, therefore, incorporates the essentials of the Cabinet System of Government. In Britain the Cabinet is the child of chance and the system of Government which it establishes is the result of the exigencies of time. The whole machinery of the Cabinet System is, thus, based upon conventions, unwritten but always recognised and stated with almost as much precision as the rules of law. In the Dominions, too, the Cabinet system of Government is essentially, though their Constitutions are written, based upon usages and practices in force in Britain. The Constitution of France, under the Third Republic, recognised certain principles of responsible government and gave a constitutional sanction to certain functions of the Cabinet, though it left many matters vague. The Constitution of Eire,¹¹ France,¹² under the Fourth Republic, and Italy give constitutional sanction to Cabinet Government and contain positive provisions regarding its functions. The Constitution of Ceylon, which draws inspiration direct from Sir Ivor Jennings, is the most realistic effort to reduce the "conventions of the Cabinet government into the terms of a written Constitution."¹³

8. Article 361 (2) (3).

10. Article 75 (6).

✓ The Council of Ministers and the Cabinet. The final development of the Cabinet system in Britain has led to a distinction between the 'Ministry' and the 'Cabinet'. When a Prime Minister is commissioned to form a Ministry, he has to fill about hundred posts, major and minor, which together make up the Ministry. About twenty of the most important out of the Ministry are the members of the Cabinet. These members of the Cabinet meet collectively, decide upon policy and in general "head up" the Government. Then, there are certain Ministers who are designated as of "Cabinet rank."¹⁴ The "ministers of the Cabinet rank" are the heads of the administrative departments, and although they are formally of Cabinet status yet they are not members of the Cabinet itself. They attend the meetings of the Cabinet when specially invited by the Prime Minister to deal with matters concerning their Departments. Finally, come Parliamentary Secretaries or "Junior Ministers" as they are sometimes called, and the five "Political" officials of the Royal Household. All these categories of Ministers, who make the Ministry, are the members of Parliament, belong to the majority party in the House of Commons

11. Article 13 (9)—(ii) requires the President to act on the advice of ministers on all matters, except in the matter of refusing dissolution to a defeated Prime Minister. Here the President enjoys "absolute discretion." This is contrary to the practice followed in England. The President of Ireland is even freer in the exercise of his power of dissolution than the Dominion Governors-General.

12. Though the President presided over the Council of Ministers (Art. 32), but Article 38 definitely prescribed that "Every act of the President of the Republic must be countersigned by the President of the Council of Ministers and by a Minister." Under the Third Republic each act of the President was required to be countersigned by a Minister only.

13. Sec. 4 (2) of the Ceylon (Constitution) Order in Council, 1946, says, "All powers, authorities and functions vested in His Majesty or the Governor-General shall, subject to the provisions of this Order and of any other law for the time being in force, be exercised as far as may be in accordance with constitutional conventions applicable to the exercise of the similar powers, authorities and functions in the United Kingdom by His Majesty.

Provided that no act or omission on the part of the Governor-General shall be called in question in any Court of Law or otherwise on the ground that the foregoing provisions of this sub-section have not been complied with."

Section 46 (1), again, provides: "(1) There shall be a Cabinet of Ministers who shall be appointed by the Governor-General and who shall be charged with the general direction and control of the government of the Island...."

14. Attlee's Labour Government formed in 1949 had fifteen Ministers of Cabinet rank whereas Churchill's Ministry formed in 1951 had eighteen.

are individually and collectively responsible to it and continue to remain in office so long as they can retain its confidence. But the Ministry has no collective functions. It is the function of the Cabinet. The Cabinet Ministers meet in a body, deliberate, formulate policy and see that it is carried through. The Ministry as a whole never meets and it never deliberates on matters of policy.

Immediately after the transfer of power in August 1947, there was no distinction in line between the Cabinet and the Ministry. Both were used as synonymous to each other. All members of the Ministry or the Cabinet, except the Prime Minister, enjoyed the same status and powers. But the Prime Minister and the members of the Cabinet were seized of the confusion so caused and were keen to remedy the same. Gopalaswami Ayyangar, a senior member of the Cabinet, was entrusted with the task of studying the problem of Cabinet organisation and to make recommendations thereto. The Ayyangar Report was submitted in November 1949, which, inter alia, recommended the categorization of Ministers defining the powers and responsibilities of each category of Ministers.

The Constitution of India, inaugurated in January 1950, nowhere mentioned the word "Cabinet." It provided for a Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister. But the Council of Ministers formed by Prime Ministers ever since the inauguration of the Constitution, took due cognisance of the categorisation of Ministers and the powers and responsibilities attached to each category as recommended in the Ayyangar Report and similar to the prevailing British practice. The first Council of Ministers consisted of 14 Cabinet Minister and 5 Ministers of State. After the General Elections of 1952, Prime Minister Nehru named 14 Ministers besides himself as "Members of the Cabinet", 4 as "Ministers of Cabinet rank" and 2 as "Deputy Ministers". The composition of the Council of Ministers on June 15, 1962 was: 18 Ministers including the Prime Minister as Members of the Cabinet, 12 Ministers of State, who were not members of the Cabinet but held cabinet rank, 22 Deputy Ministers and 7 Parliamentary Secretaries. The Council of Ministers formed by Lal Bahadur Shastri consisted of sixteen Cabinet Ministers, 15 Ministers of State and 20 Deputy Ministers. Mrs. Indira Gandhi's first Council of Ministers in 1966 consisted of 16 Cabinet Ministers, 18 Ministers of State and 17 Deputy Ministers. Parliamentary Secretaries in Shastri's and Mrs. Gandhi's Council of Ministers being apart. The Council of Ministers, headed by Mrs. Indira Gandhi, as on March 4, 1968, consisted of 18 Cabinet Ministers,¹⁵ 17 Ministers of State and 20 Deputy Ministers.

There are, thus, three categories of Ministers besides Parliamentary Secretaries. The Ministers who are members of the Cabinet meet collectively in Cabinet meetings, decide upon policy and in general "head up" the government. Ministers of the Cabinet rank are, as in Britain, formally of Cabinet status and are paid the same salary as the Cabinet Ministers. They are heads of the administrative Departments or sub-Departments of the Government. But they do not attend meetings of the Cabinet unless.

15. Asoka Mehta resigned on April 27, 1968 and M. Chenna Reddy on August 22, 1968. With the split in the Congress Party in November 1969, three Cabinet Ministers, Jaisukhlal Hathi, C.M. Poonacha and Ram Subhag Singh resigned. The Deputy Prime Minister, Morarji R. Desai had resigned earlier. There had been no replacements.

specially invited to attend when something concerning their particular Departments has to be decided by the Cabinet. Next in rank are the Deputy Ministers. They receive lesser salary than the Ministers of the Cabinet rank and have no separate charge of a Department. Their task is to assist the Ministers with whom they are associated in their administrative and parliamentary duties. The Deputy Ministers in India may be compared to the Parliamentary Secretaries or Under-Secretaries ("Junior Ministers") in Britain who are the young members of the party in power and whose ability is being tested in preparation for higher posts. The Parliamentary Secretaries are neither ministers nor do they exercise any powers. They assist Ministers in the discharge of their parliamentary functions. Not all the Ministries have Parliamentary Secretaries. Only a number of them have. On June 15, 1962, two of them were attached to the External Affairs Ministry, one each to the Ministries of Food and Agriculture, Irrigation and Power, Mines and Fuel, Education, and Labour and Employment; 7 in all.

The Cabinet is, thus, an extra-constitutional growth. As in Britain the Ministers of the Crown Act, 1937, and the Ministerial salaries and Members' Pensions Act, 1965 provide for the salaries of the Cabinet Ministers so does the Salaries and Allowances of Ministers Act, 1952, provide in India. But neither the Ministers of the Crown Act and the 1965 Act in Britain nor the Salaries and Allowances of Ministers Act in India validate or legalise the conventional nature of the Cabinet in both the countries. What both the Acts do is that they recognise the existence of the Cabinet Ministers and other categories of Ministers. It is, however, important to note that once the existence of conventions is recognised by legislation they do not really remain different from laws.

Though the Cabinet is not known to the Constitution, yet it is the core of the Indian constitutional system. It is the supreme directing authority, the magnet of policy, which co-ordinates and controls the whole of the executive government, and integrates and guides the work of Parliament. The Cabinet Ministers meet in a body, deliberate, formulate policy and it is their business to see that it is properly executed. The Council of Ministers, like the Ministry in Britain, has no collective functions. It never meets as a whole and it never deliberates on matters of policy. It is the function of the Cabinet.

Size of the Council of Ministers. The Constitution does not fix the size of the Council of Ministers. It is for the Prime Minister to determine its size and he does so as the requirements of the occasion may demand. During the past ten years the number of Cabinet Ministers has varied between 12 and 16. The number increased to 19 in 1963. It is in accordance with the practice now established in Britain. Between the two World Wars the membership of the British Cabinet was seldom less than twenty-two and there were constant complaints against the ever-increasing size of the Cabinet. It was rightly maintained that a Cabinet of twenty-one or two members was too large for an effective deliberative body. Attlee in 1949 reduced the number of Cabinet Ministers to 17 and created a separate category of 15 "Ministers not in the Cabinet." Churchill in 1951, reduced the number of Cabinet Ministers to 16 and had 18 Ministers of the Cabinet rank. Anthony Eden and Macmillan continued with the same number in both the categories. Prime Minister Nehru having followed the British precedent for the division of Ministers into those with and those without membership of the Cabinet, also adhered to the practice of limiting the maximum number of Cabinet Ministers to less than twenty and his successors have followed the same. The Administrative Reforms Commission, in its Report on the "Machinery of the Government of India and its procedure of work", has recommended that the strength of the Central Council of Ministers should be normally 40, but under special circumstances could go up to 45 but, in any case, not more than this number. It is proposed that the three tier system in the Ministerial set up, comprising Cabinet Ministers, Ministers of State and Deputy Ministers, be continued. It is recommended that a compact Union Cabinet consisting of not more than 16 Cabinet Ministers "to ensure homogeneity, speed and purposeful functioning," should constitute the norm.

PRINCIPLES OF THE CABINET GOVERNMENT

Cabinet, the driving and the steering force. The Cabinet is, thus, a "wheel within the wheel." Its outside ring consists of a party that has a majority in the Lok Sabha, the next ring being the Council of Ministers which contains the men who are most active within the party, and the smallest of all being the Cabinet containing the real leaders and chiefs. By this means is secured that "unity of party action which depends upon placing the directing power in the hands of a body small enough to agree and influential enough to control." The Cabinet is, in brief, the driving and the steering force.

The Cabinet system of Government as obtainable in Britain hinges upon some well established customs, traditions and precedents. The principles involved therein have now received universal recognition and have been, as stated before, incorporated in the Constitutions of many democratic countries. Articles 74-75 of the Constitution of India cover the principles of responsible government. But the provisions in the Constitution are neither full nor positive and many important points have been left to be determined by conventions and usages. There is one supreme virtue in it. The conventional element in the working of Cabinet system of Government in India will make the whole system flexible and, thus, easily adjustable to meet emergencies or any other special circumstances as recent Cabinet developments in Britain disclose. It is instructive to examine the principles which govern the working of the Cabinet system of Government in relation to the provisions of the Indian Constitution.

A Constitutional Executive head of the State. In the first place, Cabinet Government means that the executive Head of the State, King or President, should not be the directing and deciding factor responsible before the nation of the measures taken. The whole executive power is exercised in the name of the Head of the State by political men who belong to the majority party in the Legislature and are responsible to it for all their public acts individually as well as collectively. As the Head of the State takes no part in the politics of the country, he does not participate in the confidential discussions in which his Ministers decide the advice they will give him.

The object of the framers of the Indian Constitution was to make the President, like the Monarch in Britain, a constitutional executive Head of the State and that he should act on the advice of his Council of Ministers. The Constitution, no doubt, uses the traditional language of the Canadian and South African Constitutions that the Council of Ministers will "aid and advise" the President in the exercise of his functions, but the advice so given by the Ministers is binding on the President. In explaining the form of government under the Constitution, Dr. Ambedkar clearly stated in the Constituent Assembly, that the "President of the Indian Union will be generally bound by the advice of his Ministers. He can do nothing contrary to their advice nor can he do anything without their advice."¹⁶ Even the language of the Constitution determines so. The mere fact that the Constitution makes no specific provision that the President must act as advised by the Council of Ministers does not nullify the basic principle of the Parliamentary Government that the President must act on the advice of his Ministers. The Constitution nowhere vests him with any "discretionary or individual" judgment powers. The expression "aid and advice", as principal C.L. Anand observes, "is a stereotyped phrase of English constitutional law and practice. It is not used in the ordinary dictionary sense but is a term of art which has historically acquired a special meaning well understood by constitutional lawyers. According to that meaning it is implied in the use of these expressions, in relation to cabinet system of government of the British model, that the constitutional head of the State can only act on the advice of his responsible ministers."¹⁷ The function of the Council of Ministers is, accordingly, under the Constitution not purely advisory. It is, in fact, just the reverse and the legal duty of the President is to advise and it is for the Ministers to decide.

In the Republic Day Supplement to the Times of India, January 26, 1963, Dr. K.M. Munshi, in his article under the caption: Powers and Functions of President under India's Constitution, maintained, "Judged by the well-accepted canons of interpretations a person on whom duty is cast or in whom a trust is vested, is bound to exercise his own discretion in relation to the duty or the trust and cannot be deemed to have been deprived of it by implication." He further says that the "plea that like the British Crown the President is bound by the Cabinet's advice is irrelevant being based on a false major premise." The syllogism runs as follows: "The President's status is the same as the Crown's (Major Premise). The Crown is bound; therefore, the President is bound."¹⁸ Dr. Munshi contradicts himself when he concludes as such. As a member of the Drafting Committee he had stoutly defended the Parliamentary system of Government which the Draft Constitution had envisaged. He unequivocally maintained in the Constituent Assembly that "Most of us have looked up to the British model as the best... Our constitutional traditions have become parliamentary and we have now all our Provinces functioning more or less on the British model."¹⁹ The British model is a Parliamentary system of Government wherein 'the King can do no wrong.' The real functionaries are his responsible Ministers on whose advice he always acts. The practices of such a system of Government leave no discretion to him. If India has deliberately adopted "The Cabinet system on the British model as it provided a continual assessment and control of the activities of the Government by the Parliament and thereby eliminated friction between the Executive and Legislative organs, making for a more effective government,"²⁰ there can be no deviation from its well-accepted principles. Even a slight deviation therefrom will unhinge its entire existence.²¹ What happened in France is likely to happen in India, if even the architects of the Constitution repudiate the result of their own labours.

There are some provisions in the Indian Constitution which go against the British principles of responsible Government. Article 77(2) provides that the President shall make rules as to the mode in which his orders and instruments shall be authenticated. As under the Government of India Act, 1935, the orders of the President, under the Constitution, are authenticated by the Secretary of a Department of the Government. In Britain it is done by a Minister. The Constitution of France, under the Fourth Republic, provided that "Every act of the President of the Republic must be countersigned by the President of the Council of Ministers." Secondly, the Prime Minister in Britain selects his colleagues and assigns work to them. He reviews from time to time the allocation of offices among his various colleagues and considers whether that allocation still remains the best that can be effected. Article 77(3) of the Constitution of India provides that the President shall make rules for the more convenient transaction of the business of the Government of India, and for the allocation among Ministers of the said business. But this provision does not, in any way, take away the right of the Prime Minister to the distribution of portfolios amongst his colleagues once the principles of responsible Government are accepted.

Ministers chosen from Parliamentary majority. Secondly, under the Cabinet system of Government Ministers must be members of the Legislature and they must be chosen from that party which has a majority in the representative House. These two facts taken together are of fundamental importance. The membership of the Legislature gives to Ministers a representative and responsible character. It also binds the executive and legislative authorities together and there can be, as such, no working at cross purposes between these two organs of government. The harmonious collaboration so brought about ensures a stable and responsive government. Moreover, it gives an effective opportunity to the executive to present, to advocate, and to defend its views and proposals to the Legislature.

In Britain, it is now a well-settled convention that Ministers should either be peers or members of the House of Commons though there had been exceptional occasions when Ministers held office out of Parliament. But Ministers remain out of Parliament only when they are trying to find seats. If they cannot get in, and are unwilling to be created peers, they resign from their offices. In Canada there is no statutory prohibition against a non-member becoming a Minister. But by convention he must, within a reasonable time, become a member of either House of Parliament, or resign. The Constitution of Australia provides that "...no Minister of State shall hold office for a longer period than three months unless he is or becomes a Senator or a member of the House of Representatives."²² The Constitution of South Africa makes a provision exactly similar²³ to that in the Australian Constitution. The Ceylon (Constitution) Order in Council says: "A Minister...who for any period of four consecutive months is not a member of either Chamber shall, at the expiration of the period, cease to be a Minister...as the case may be."²⁴

20. Republic Day Supplement, op. cit., p. VII.

In India there is no bar to a person who is not a member of Parliament to become a Minister, and there are many instances when ministers were appointed without having seats in Parliament, for example, Dr. John Mathai, C. Rajagopalachari, Sri Prakasa, C.D. Deshmukh, S. Swaran Singh, Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant, Y.B. Chavan and Sanjiva Reddy. But Article 75 (5) provides that a Minister shall cease to hold office if for any period of six consecutive months he is not a member of either House of Parliament. This means that every Minister must become member, if he is already not, within a period of six months of either House of Parliament.

Cabinet Government means party government and the virtue of the party government in Britain had been to provide a stable government under a unified command of the homogeneous and disciplined leaders. Britain does not love coalition governments, because "it contradicts the fundamental principle that a Cabinet represents a party united in principle." It is only in times of emergencies and grave crises, like the two World Wars, and the Economic Depression of 1931, that there were Coalition Ministries.²⁵ The Constitution of India does not provide that the Prime Minister must necessarily be the leader of the majority party in Parliament.²⁶ Nor does it prescribe how the Prime Minister is to select

24. Section 49 (2).

25. But it so happened that between 1918 and 1945 only six years were occupied by governments of normal type when there was one single party government with just a working majority. The May 1955 elections had once again given to the Conservatives a comfortable majority. In 1924 and 1929 there were Minority Governments under Ramsay MacDonald.

26. The Union Constitution Committee decided that, as suggested by Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar and N. Gopalaswami Ayyangar, a provision on the following lines be made in the Constitution on the manner of appointment of Ministers:

The President shall appoint the Prime Minister from among the members of the Federal House of Representatives (the lower chamber of the Central Legislature) and in doing so will ordinarily invite the person who in his judgment is likely to command the largest following in that House to accept the office. The other Ministers of the Cabinet will be appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister.

his team of Ministers. But as the Constitution prescribes collective responsibility of the Council of Ministers to the Lok Sabha, it is natural that the Ministers constituting the Council of Ministers must belong to the same party with avowed faith in the same policy. The Cabinet is by nature a unity and collective responsibility is the method by which this unity is secured. There is no other condition upon which that team work, which is the sine qua non of Cabinet system of government, can be ensured. Prime Minister Nehru included in his Cabinet formed in January 1950, Ministers belonging to other parties in Parliament, including the Independents.²⁷ The first Cabinet was a national Government for all intents and purposes. Here, again, Nehru followed the British practice. India at that stage of her career needed a unified effort of all parties and groups to tide over her difficulties immediately after her independence and partition of the country and to devise means for national reconstruction. Since 1952, the Council of Ministers has been homogeneous; a one-party Government. Even during the critical days of Chinese aggression in October-November 1962, the Prime Minister did not consider feasible the suggestion for broad-based Ministry.

But one unhealthy practice has developed in India. Frequently, Union Ministers are appointed Governors and from the Raj Bhavan they are again commanded to adorn the ministerial chairs. Rajagopalachari became the Union Home Minister after his retirement as Governor of West Bengal. Sri Prakasa, Kailashnath Katju and Harikishen Mehtab are other familiar names who had moved from one end to the other. Even retiring Speakers are not spared. Ananthasayanam Ayyangar was appointed Governor of Bihar, although he had been re-elected to the Lok Sabha in the General Elections of 1962. Hukam Singh succeeded Sampurnanand as the Governor of Rajasthan.

Leadership of the Prime Minister. The Cabinet is a team which plays the game of politics under the captaincy of the Prime Minister. "The Prime Minister", according to Morley, "is the keystone of the arch." Although in the Cabinet all its members stand on an equal footing, speak with equal voice and act in unison, yet the Chairman of the Cabinet is the first among equals and occupies a position of exceptional and peculiar authority. He is the leader of the parliamentary majority and ministers work under his accepted leadership. The ministers are, no doubt, appointed by the Head of the State, but in actual practice they are the nominees of the Prime Minister and the head of the State simply endorses the list prepared and presented to him by the Premier. If the Prime Minister has the power to make his ministers, it is also his constitutional right to unmake them. The identity of the ministers under a Cabinet system of Government is unknown without the Prime Minister. A party, in brief, lives on party spirit and as an instrument of government it preserves its continuous corporate identity on the leadership of the Prime Minister. All this secures unity and close association between ministers on the one side, and the Cabinet and the parliamentary majority on the other.

The Constitution of India recognises the pre-eminent position of the Prime Minister when it says that "there shall be a Council of Ministers with the Prime Minister at the head."²⁸ The Constitution further provides that the Prime Minister shall be appointed by the President and the other Ministers shall be appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister.²⁹ In Britain, it is from the time of Walpole that the Prime Minister selects his own ministers. This convention finds expression in the Indian Constitution. Though the Constitution provides that the President appoints Ministers on the advice of the Prime Minister, but his advice is binding and the President, like the British King, simply endorses the selection of the Prime Minister. When the Draft Article³⁰ relating to the Council of Ministers came up for the consideration of the Constituent Assembly³¹ Prof. K.T. Shah moved a number of amendments, inter alia, suggesting that there should be no formal creation of the office of the Prime Minister, that every minister on his appointment should seek the confidence of the House of the People, and that not less than two-thirds of the members of the Council of Ministers should be the members of the House of People. The Law Minister did not accept any of these amendments. Referring to the amendment that there should be no formal office of the Prime Minister, Dr. Ambedkar maintained that the only sanction through which collective responsibility could be enforced was through the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister, he said, was really the key-stone of the Cabinet arch and "unless and until we create that office and endow that office with statutory authority to nominate and dismiss Ministers there can be no collective responsibility."³²

Ministerial Responsibility. Ministerial responsibility is the essence of the Cabinet system of government and collective responsibility is "Britain's principal contribution to modern political practice." Ministerial responsibility means two things. First, a Cabinet Minister presides over an administrative Department of the Government and for that Department he is individually responsible. In addition to this responsibility, each minister largely shares a collective responsibility with other members of the government for anything of high importance that is done in every branch of public business besides his own. The Ministry is a unit. It comes into office as a unit and it must go out of office as a unit. All Ministers belong to the same party under the leadership of a person whom the party acclaims and, as such, they swim and sink together. The essence of the Cabinet is its solidarity, a "common front." It is, accordingly, binding on every member of the Cabinet, and on every political officer outside the Cabinet, no matter what his rank is, to pursue an agreed policy for which all accept responsibility and on which they stand or fall together. A minister who is not prepared to defend a Cabinet decision must resign. V.V. Giri resigned because he did not agree to modification of the award given by Labour Appellate Tribunal. C.D. Deshmukh resigned as he did not agree with the decision of the Government to make Bombay city a separate city state. Asoka Mehta resigned on the issue of the Government of India's disinclination to take a firm line against USSR's aggression against Czechoslovakia. If a Minister does not resign, then, the decision of the Cabinet is as much his decision as that of his colleagues even if he might have protested against such a decision in the Cabinet. The duty of a minister is, therefore, not merely to support the Government in the Legislature, but also to refrain from making any speech or reference outside the Legislature which is contrary to the Cabinet policy or make a declaration of a policy in a speech upon which there is no Cabinet decision.

The Indian Constitution expressly provides for the collective responsibility of the Council of Ministers to the Lok Sabha. This provision gives a constitutional expression to Britain's principal contribution to modern political practice. The Constitution of France, under the Fourth Republic, provided that "the Ministers shall be collectively responsible to the National Assembly for the general policy of the Cabinet and individually responsible for their personal actions. They shall not be responsible to the Council of the Republic."³³ The Constitution of Eire provides that "(1) the Government shall be responsible to Dail Eireann. (2) The Government shall meet and act as a collective authority, and shall be collectively responsible for the Departments of State administered by the members of the Government."³⁴ The Constitution of Ceylon says that, "There shall be a Cabinet of Ministers...who shall be collectively responsible to Parliament."³⁵ The framers of the Indian Constitution adopted the recent practice of incorporating in the Constitution the British convention of collective responsibility of ministers to the Chamber representative of the people. It means that the Council of Ministers remains in office so long as they can retain the confidence of the Lok Sabha (House of the People) and the confidence of the Lok Sabha remains as long as the Government retains the majority in the Lok Sabha to support its policy and administration.

There is no provision for individual responsibility to Lok Sabha under the Indian Constitution. The Constitution does not provide for it. On the other hand, it provides that Ministers hold office during the pleasure of the President.³⁶ It means that the President can dismiss the Ministers, although he has no right to dismiss the Council of Ministers as a body.

The Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business in Parliament, 1950, also, provide for motion of no confidence in the Council of Ministers and not in an individual Minister. Rule 127 says, inter alia, "(1) A motion expressing want of confidence in the Council of Ministers may be made subject to the following restrictions...." Dr. Ambedkar, while dealing with this issue, said in the Constituent Assembly, "All members of the House are very keen that the Cabinet should work on the basis of collective responsibility and all agree that this is a very sound principle. But I do not know how many members of the House realise what exactly is the machinery by which collective responsibility is enforced. Obviously, there cannot be statutory authority. Supposing a Minister differed from other Members of the Cabinet and gave expression of his views which were opposed to the views of the Cabinet, it would be hardly possible for the law to come in and to prosecute him for having committed a breach of what might be called collective responsibility. Obviously, there cannot be legal sanction for collective responsibility. The only sanction through which collective responsibility can be enforced is through the Prime Minister. In my judgment collective responsibility is enforced by the enforcement of two principles. One principle is that no person shall be nominated to the Cabinet except on the advice of the Prime Minister. Secondly, no person shall be retained as a member of the Cabinet if the Prime Minister says that he shall be dismissed. It is only when members of the Cabinet both in the matter of their appointment as well as in the matter of their dismissal are placed under the Prime Minister, that it would be possible to realise our ideal of collective responsibility. I do not see any other means or any other way of giving effect to that principle."³⁷

But will the Prime Minister advise the dismissal of a colleague who does not agree with the policy of the Cabinet or does anything else which compromises the solidarity of the Cabinet or its integrity? It is doubtful if ever a Prime Minister would advise dismissal except in very extreme cases, and it is hoped that even such a crisis would never come. In Britain "there is a tradition—a kind of public school fiction—that no minister desires office, but that he is prepared to carry on for the public good."³⁸ This tradition implies a duty to resign when a hint is given by the Prime Minister. It is hoped that this tradition in India, too, will be scrupulously adhered to and the spirit of public good will impregnate public life. A hint from the Prime Minister will be sufficient for a Minister to resign or he will do so on his own initiative as did Shanmukham Chetty, John Mathai, Shyama Prasad Mukerjee, K.C. Neyogi, H.C. Bhabha, Mohan Lal Saxena, V.V. Giri, Ajit Prasad Jain, Krishna Menon, and Asoka Mehta.

Secrecy. If collective responsibility is to be really effective, it is necessary that the Cabinet should deliberate in secret and its proceedings should remain highly confidential. "There must be," as Lord Salisbury said, "irresponsible licence in discussion,"³⁹ if mature, rational and independent contribution to the process of policy making is desired from men who are engaged in a common cause and who come together for the purpose of reaching an agreement. Publicity reduces the independence of mind of ministers in relation to each other and harmony of views becomes impossible. The practical utility of secrecy of Cabinet proceedings, therefore, is "the necessity of securing free discussion by which a compromise can be reached, without the risk of publicity for every statement made and every point given away."⁴⁰ Moreover, a knowledge of difference of opinion among the ministers makes difficult the unflinching support of the whole party to the policy finally adopted. It also offers vulnerable points to the attacks of the Opposition which is ever vigilant to plague the government.

Secrecy is, thus, an essential part of the parliamentary system. Secrecy helps to produce political unanimity and political unanimity is a very important condition of secrecy. In Britain the secrecy of Cabinet proceedings is safeguarded by law and convention. The only exception is that a Minister who resigns as a result of serious Cabinet division is allowed to make a personal explanation to the House without raising a debate. But it is necessary that the resigning Minister must secure the permission of the King through the Prime Minister,⁴¹ and it is always given. The Minister's right to explain is, however, confined to that occasion only and does not give him licence to make further disclosures.

The Cabinet in India, too, is a secret body collectively responsible for its decisions. The Oath of Secrecy which every Minister is required to take before entering upon his office imposes a constitutional obligation not to disclose any Cabinet secret.⁴² Moreover, a Cabinet decision is an advice to the President and the President's sanction is, accordingly, necessary before publicity may be given to any advice given as such. When a Minister resigns as a result of difference of opinion, Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business in Parliament permit him to make a personal explanation to the House without raising a debate.⁴³ The British convention is, thus, embodied in the Rules of Parliament in India.

There are other means, too, by which more or less reliable information regarding views expressed and decisions taken often get out. "There are few Cabinet meetings," observes Professor Laski, "in which the modern press is not a semi-participant."⁴⁴ In every country either the Prime Minister or some other Minister, on his behalf, gives to the press a guarded statement on the Cabinet decisions in order to promote opinion about the policy the government intends to pursue. Referring to the alleged leakages of Cabinet decisions, Professor Laski made a bold statement when he said, "and there have been fewer Cabinets still in which some member has not been in fairly confidential relations with one eminent journalist or another."⁴⁵ In India, too, sometimes important Cabinet decisions leak out to the Press. Inder Malhotra, Political Correspondent of the Statesman, New Delhi, reported in his paper on December 25, 1964, "During seventeen years of freedom, the Cabinet has found time to devote thought to external publicity precisely twice; first in 1948 and then exactly ten years later in 1958."

Prime Minister Lal Bahadur Shastri established the system of public relations and Cabinet decisions, which were not of a confidential nature, were released to the press by the Cabinet Secretary at the end of every meeting. The advisability of such public relations was proposed to Jawaharlal Nehru on several occasions, but he did not favour it. Mrs. Indira Gandhi has continued with the change introduced by Lal Bahadur Shastri.

India has adopted the British example of setting up a Cabinet Secretariat. The Viceroy's Executive Council had set up a sort of Secretariat and since 1935, the Private Secretary to the Viceroy was also designated as the Secretary to the Executive Council. In August 1947, he was designated as Cabinet Secretary and since then the Cabinet Secretariat is headed by the seniormost member of the Civil Service. The Secretariat organization now comprises of the Main Secretariat, the Organisation and Management Division (created in 1954), the Military Wing and the Economic Wing. The main functions of the Cabinet Secretariat are to co-ordinate the work of all its wings, to prepare the agenda under the direction of the Prime Minister for the Cabinet meetings, to record its decisions and that of Cabinet Committees and to communicate them to the Departments concerned, and to collect the relevant material necessary for the deliberations of the Cabinet. Cabinet proceedings and its minutes are secret and due care is taken to ensure their secrecy. In Britain the Secretary to the Cabinet has instructions that while drafting minutes he should avoid references to opinions expressed by any individual member and "to limit the minutes as narrowly as possible to the actual decision agreed." N.V. Gadgil, who was a Cabinet Minister from 1947-1952, detailed the working of the government from inside. While dealing with the secrecy of the Cabinet proceedings, he writes, "After gauging the opinion of all his colleagues, he (the Prime Minister) sums up the consensus of the meeting. Individual Ministers are free to add to the summation or suggest amendments. The Cabinet Secretary records all this, but a verbatim report of the discussions is never recorded. Only the most salient points are noted and the decision of the cabinet recorded on each item. A copy of the proceedings of the cabinet is sent to each Minister within twenty-four hours. Any corrections and amendments have to be conveyed within twenty-four hours of the receipt of the report. The Prime Minister is the final authority as to whether the suggested corrections are to be accepted or not."⁴⁶ On occasions when the matter was so secret, the notes given to the Ministers for discussion were "taken back after the meeting. Even the scribbles on note papers are taken away by the Cabinet Secretary."⁴⁷

How the Cabinet works. Cabinet, as said earlier, is an extra-constitutional growth. The Constitution only provides for the Council of Ministers and all its members do not participate in the deliberations of the Cabinet. Ministers in the Cabinet alone meet together, discuss and decide all political actions. They "form a steering body for the ship of the State, steering its course and determining its speed."⁴⁸ The Cabinet meets regularly once in a week at Rashtrapati Bhavan where the office of the Cabinet Secretariat is also situated. But when Parliament is in session or when a matter urgently requiring discussion should arise, it may hold more than one meeting. Lal Bahadur Shastri introduced the innovation of holding informal Cabinet meetings at the residence of each Cabinet Minister by rotation, the Prime Minister presiding. This was, however, abandoned by Mrs. Indira Gandhi.

The Prime Minister presides over the meetings of the Cabinet and in his/her absence the Deputy Prime Minister. When the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister both are absent, or there is no Deputy Prime Minister, the practice is for the seniormost Minister to preside. The office of the Deputy Prime Minister was abolished in 1950, after the death of Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel. Mrs. Indira Gandhi revived the office in 1967 and Morarji Desai became the second Deputy Prime Minister of India. On the resignation of Morarji Desai in July 1969,⁴⁹ no substitute was appointed. When asked by the press correspondents if she contemplated to elevate Jagjivan Ram to that position Mrs. Gandhi declared that the Constitution does not provide for that office. The Administrative Reforms Commission has suggested that the office of the Deputy Prime Minister should be regularised as the Prime Minister needs institutional support for ensuring efficient and effective functioning of the governmental machinery.

Ministers of State do not attend Cabinet meetings, but they may be asked to attend when subjects concerning their Departments, if they happens to hold independent charge of such Departments, or a Cabinet Minister is unable to attend and his Department has a Minister of State, are discussed and their presence is deemed necessary. A peculiar practice of inviting Chief Ministers, when problems concerning their States come up for discussion, has also existed. P.C. Sen, Chief Minister West Bengal, and Biju Patnaik, Chief Minister Orissa, attended the Cabinet meeting on June 6, 1963, to help the Cabinet solve the food problem in the Eastern region. The Orissa Chief Minister B. Patnaik was also consulted on defence problems immediately after the Chinese aggression in October 1962, and was given a room in the Ministry of External Affairs.⁵⁰ Experts on matters of technical nature may also be invited to explain personally the issues involved in such matters. The Deputy Chairman of the Planning Commission and its other members attend when problems relating to their respective charge are on the agenda.

The agenda is prepared by the Cabinet Secretariat in consultation with the Prime Minister. There are no definite rules determining the subjects for discussion in the Cabinet. Matters of routine nature are decided by the Departments themselves. Sometimes even important matters may be decided by the relevant Minister in consultation with the Prime Minister or these may be referred to the appropriate Cabinet Committee and subsequently confirmed by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister himself may take the decision and later inform the Cabinet. H.M. Patel, who had been the Cabinet Secretary, says that Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru himself had repeatedly taken decision on his own in respect of matters relating to the External Affairs Ministry without the Committee of the Cabinet for Foreign Affairs being aware of them. He further says that the Cabinet itself had been ignored by the Prime Minister even more frequently and that "several senior ministers have also tended to take a leaf out of the Prime Minister's book and to by-pass the Cabinet. They do not do so on their own. They obtain the Prime Minister's concurrence to a line of policy which they advocate and then without waiting for the approval of the Cabinet, go forward, treating the Prime Minister's approval as the approval of the Cabinet."⁵¹ This is supported by N.V. Gadgil, who had been Cabinet Minister from 1947 to 1952.⁵²

Every matter that comes for Cabinet discussion is accompanied by an explanatory memorandum. If the matter concerns more than one Department, all the concerned Departments submit their own explanatory memoranda, which are circulated amongst all Cabinet Ministers well in advance of the scheduled meeting. Discussion ensues on each item on the agenda and it is frank and often blunt. Differences are resolved by mutual discussion and discussion continues until agreement is reached. Votes are not taken.⁵³ An item not on the agenda can be raised with the permission of the Prime Minister, provided the matter is of urgent importance. The decisions taken are forwarded to the Ministries for necessary administrative action.

Cabinet Committees. The burden of the Cabinet is "titanic". It

50. Association of Patnaik with defence problems was both unconstitutional and politically improper. He was deputed by the Prime Minister in March 1963, with the approval of the Emergency Committee of the Cabinet, to hold exploratory talks with the Government of the United States of America on certain aspects of defence. There he made certain statements, detailing India's military preparations and her requirements, to the Press which caused considerable embarrassment to the Prime Minister and the Defence Minister.

cannot adequately meet its huge task when it usually meets once a week and that, too, for a short duration. Its longest session ever held was on October 14, 1964, when the Cabinet is reported to have sat for four hours without a break. Then it has too many members for effective discussion and all of them, except for the Minister without Portfolio, if there is one, are heads of Departments of the Government and they are too pre-occupied in their departmental duties. The Cabinet neither desires nor is able to tackle all the numerous details of Government. The result is the emergence of Cabinet Committees. These Committees help the Cabinet to discharge its responsibilities. Some of the Cabinet Committees are continuous and, thus, permanent; others are ad hoc, that is, created for single time-limited-matter. Ad hoc Committees are set up to deal with a special problem or critical situation and are composed of the Ministers primarily concerned with the problems at issue. They deliberate, report and disband. For instance, a special Committee of the Cabinet was constituted in November 1964, to examine the charges of corruption against the Chief Minister of Orissa and some other members of his Council of Ministers. Recently a Cabinet Committee was appointed to report on the re-organisation of Assam. In 1962, the Emergency Committee, consisting of Jawaharlal Nehru, Krishna Menon, Morarji Desai, Krishnamachari, and Lal Bahadur Shastri, was set up soon after the Chinese invasion.

The Standing or permanent Committees of the Cabinet are: Foreign Affairs Committee, Economic Affairs Committee, Internal Affairs Committee, Defence Committee, and Parliamentary Affairs Committee. The number and composition of Standing Committees are largely determined by the Prime Minister. Cabinet Committees provide a means whereby certain problems and issues can be studied and discussed by Ministers most concerned and some kind of compromise reached before they are brought before the whole Cabinet. It makes the work of the Cabinet easy if the principal issues involved have been identified and thrashed out by a small ministerial group and agreed recommendations submitted. Cabinet Committees are also useful to co-ordinate policy and administration. Moreover, Committees can be employed to keep a critical problem under continuous review. Finally, by including non-Cabinet Ministers, whenever deemed appropriate, the Committee System can extend the Cabinet's co-ordinating activity to wider areas of governmental affairs. It is also possible for the senior members of the permanent services to attend Cabinet Committee meetings as advisers to their Ministers.

The Cabinet Committees, thus, combine two functions: co-ordinating the various Ministries and decentralising the policy. The Committees report to the whole Cabinet and seek to submit agreed reports and recommendations. But a Minister who is not satisfied with the recommendations of a Committee can appeal to the Cabinet, where under the Chairmanship of the Prime Minister, differences are tried to be resolved. If the Minister does not reconcile to the decision of the Cabinet, the only course left for him is to resign.

FUNCTIONS OF THE CABINET

The Cabinet in Britain, according to the Report of the Machinery of Government Committee (1918), has three main functions:

- “(a) the final determination of policy to be submitted to Parliament;
- (b) the supreme control of the national executive in accordance with the policy prescribed by Parliament; and
- (c) the continuous co-ordination and delimitation of the interests of several Departments.”

This is the most authoritative statement hitherto made about the functions of the Cabinet. Since Parliamentary system of Government on the British model is operative in India, the functions of the Cabinet here may also be examined in the context of the functions stated by the Machinery of Government Committee. But it must be noted that the Cabinet in India performs certain functions “which the British Cabinet dare not assume”. For instance, Article 123 of the Constitution empowers the President to promulgate ordinances when Parliament is not in session and these ordinances have the same force as an Act of Parliament. Such ordinances are really issued and promulgated on the advice of the Cabinet but under the authority of the President. Similarly, Fundamental Rights can be suspended by declaring the state of emergency. Decisions relating to the re-organization of States and alterations in their boundaries are taken by the Cabinet. All this is subject to the approval of Parliament, but the decision is that of the Cabinet and approval of Parliament is ipso facto so long as it commands majority.

Policy determining functions. The Cabinet, as said before, is a deliberative and policy formulating body. It discusses and decides all sorts of national and international problems confronting the country and thereby an attempt is made to reach unanimous agreements embodying Government's policy. It must present to Parliament and to the world a unified policy of action if collective responsibility, which the Constitution ordains, is to be fully realised. If an individual Minister finds it impossible to agree with the policy determined by the Cabinet, the only course for him is to resign. As a policy determining body, the Cabinet meets regularly once a week and takes decisions on all vital matters and other matters emerging from various Ministries and earmarked for Cabinet discussion. The Cabinet, thus, supplies leadership, initiative and resourcefulness.

When the Cabinet has determined on a policy, the appropriate Department carries it out either by administrative action within the framework of the existing law or by submitting a new Bill to Parliament. Legislation is the handmaid of administration and Cabinet is the instrument which links the executive department of government to the legislative. In this way, the Cabinet directs Parliament for action and so long as it can command a majority in Parliament it gets the approval of its policy.

These are essentially the legislative functions of the Cabinet. But in the modern State, as Jennings says, “most legislation is directed towards the creation or modification of administrative powers”, and no vivid distinction can, therefore, be made between legislation and administration. The Cabinet plans the legislative programme at the beginning of each session of Parliament and Government measures are introduced either by a Cabinet Minister or by some other Minister acting on Cabinet's approval.

No Minister can introduce a Bill on his own initiative. It is for the Cabinet to determine what Bill shall be promoted in a session. In legislation, therefore, the control of the Cabinet over the Council of Ministers is complete. While summing up the policy determining functions of the Cabinet in Britain, Ogg has aptly said that the Cabinet Ministers "formulate policies, make decisions, and draft bills on all significant matters which in their judgment require legislative attention, asking of Parliament only that it gives sanction to such decisions and policies by considering them and taking the necessary votes." It will be no exaggeration to say that the Cabinet really legislates with the advice and consent of Parliament. The time of summoning and prorogation of Parliament are decided in the Cabinet. Dissolution of Parliament is really the decision of the Cabinet in Britain, though the Prime Minister now exercises that power as a matter of right. In India, Britain has stood the model and the right of the Prime Minister to ask for dissolution is well-recognised.

Supreme Control of the National Executive. The Cabinet in India is not an executive instrument in the sense that it possesses any legal powers. The Constitution vests the executive authority in the President exercisable by him either directly or through officers subordinate to him. The real functionaries are the Ministers. The Ministers preside over the Departments (Ministries) of Government, and carry out the policy determined by the Cabinet and approved by Parliament. In carrying out the work of their Ministries, the Ministers, whether in the Cabinet or not, must faithfully follow the directions of the Cabinet in enforcing its decisions and policies. Any deviation therefrom is against the rigid discipline of party government and consequently may lead to the removal of a Minister who defies the principle of party unity. The Cabinet is, thus, the supreme national executive. It superintends, supervises and directs the work that Civil Servants do all over the Union. All questions and problems which are likely to focus attention of Parliament are considered in the Cabinet and decisions taken thereupon to prevent multiplicity of voices in important debates.

The power of delegated legislation has still more enhanced the executive authority of the Cabinet and the Ministers. Legislation during recent times has become more voluminous and more technical and Parliament very often passes laws in skeleton form leaving it to the Council of Ministers or Ministers incharge of the appropriate Departments to fill in the details and make Rules and Regulations in order to give effect to such laws.

The Cabinet as a Co-ordinator. The essential function of the Cabinet is to co-ordinate and guide the functions of the several Ministries or Departments of Government. Administration cannot be rigidly divided into twenty-two or more departments. The actions of one Ministry may effect the work of another Ministry. In fact, every important problem cuts across departmental boundaries, and the Cabinet does the vital task of co-ordinating policy. On purely inter-departmental matters endeavour is made by the Ministries to resolve their differences and reach agreement. If no agreement can be reached, then, the Prime Minister acts as arbitrator and co-ordinator. In the last resort the appeal is to the Cabinet. The Minister who does not agree to the Cabinet decision must resign. This means not only the linking of specific administrative decisions by reference to a general policy, but the expression of the same general policy in legislation.

The emergence of the Cabinet Committees and the increased problem of co-ordination in the context of the Welfare State and implementation of Five-Year Plans have brought about a significant expansion in the work of the Cabinet Secretariat. The Cabinet Secretariat takes down and circulates the decisions of the Cabinet, its committees and sub-committees. It circulates the agenda and the background papers to Cabinet Ministers. The Prime Minister and the Chairmen of the Cabinet Committees now primarily rely upon the corps of their expert assistants in the Cabinet Secretariat to supply them with the requisite information and advice in integrating the work of the different Ministries.

Control over Finance. Two more functions may be added to those enumerated above. The first is that the Cabinet is responsible for the whole expenditure of the State and for raising necessary revenues to meet it. In Britain the annual Budget statement is excluded from the scope of the Cabinet decisions. But being a matter of political importance, it is always brought before the Cabinet and the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes an oral statement about it a few days before his Budget speech. On the estimates the control of the Cabinet is complete. If there are new proposals of taxation involving any major change in the taxation policy, they must be considered at length by the Cabinet before the Budget is produced. In India, too, the Cabinet does not discuss the Budget. But the Finance Ministers generally keep their colleagues in the picture so far as a proposal of theirs was likely to affect matters which came within their purview.⁵⁴ The final decision, however, is that of the Finance Minister and the Prime Minister. The proposals are divulged to the Cabinet only on the day when the Finance Minister is scheduled to make his Budget speech in Parliament. Although the Cabinet does not discuss the Budget before presentation to Parliament, it does examine it after it has been presented and can always insist on modifications. It can also overthrow it altogether in deference to parliamentary or public opinion, but this may be done only at the risk of the resignation of the Finance Minister. If secrecy of the Budget is to be ensured, then, the Finance Minister, as Anthony Eden said, "is wise if he shares his burdens to some extent with the Prime Minister," but, "clearly he cannot share them with the whole Cabinet."

Control over appointments. Appointments do not normally come before the Cabinet for discussion. But all major appointments, as those of Governors and Ambassadors, and other appointments to key positions must be mentioned in the Cabinet before they are made public. This is tantamount to seeking the approval of the Cabinet and consequently its control on appointments ranking major.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Prime Minister: a creation of the Constitution. The office of the Prime Minister in Britain is the result of accident of circumstances and growth whereas in India it has been created by the Constitution. The Prime Minister heads the Council of Ministers which he forms. The Ministers are technically appointed by the President,⁵⁵ but in actual practice and consistent with the principle of Cabinet system of Government, they are the nominees of the Prime Minister and the President simply endorses his or her choice. The Council of Ministers, as a body, are responsible to the House of the People (Lok Sabha)⁵⁶ but individual Ministers are liable to dismissal by the President.⁵⁷ Theory, however, is not practice. Under a Cabinet system of Government the right of dismissing an individual Minister really belongs to the Prime Minister. "The only sanction," observed Dr. Ambedkar, "through which collective responsibility can be enforced is through the Prime Minister." He further said, "no person shall be retained as a member of the Cabinet if the Prime Minister says that he shall be dismissed. It is only when members of the Cabinet both in the matter of their appointment as well as in the matter of their dismissal are placed under the Prime Minister, that it would be possible to realise our ideal of collective responsibility." The Prime Minister of India like his prototype in Britain is, as Laski has said with regard to the latter, "central to the formation of the Government, central to its life and central to its death." The Prime Minister forms it, he can alter it or destroy it." There is no positive provision in the Indian Constitution which may vest the Prime Minister with such a power. But the Prime Minister is the pivot on which the entire mechanism of the Cabinet system of Government revolves. If the Constitution does not specifically provide for such a pivotal position of the Prime Minister, the spirit of the Constitution is as cogent a source of authority as a specific provision in the Constitution.

54. Gadgil, N.V., Government from Inside, pp. 161-62. Also refer to H.M. Patel's "Cabinet Government in India," op cit., p. 209.

The appointment of the Prime Minister. It is the fundamental principle of the Cabinet Government that the Cabinet must have the support of the majority in the representative Chamber of the Legislature. The choice of the Prime Minister is consequently automatic and the Chief Executive Head of the State summons the leader of the majority party and commands him to form the Ministry. In Britain, the Monarch has no personal choice when a party secures a clear majority and it has a leader. But the King has a choice when the party has a majority and no leader or when no single party has a majority. The King may, again, have a really effective choice when a Prime Minister in office offers a personal resignation or dies and there is no accepted second in command to step into his shoes. The King has always, under such circumstances, exercised his choice of selecting a Prime Minister in a most impartial manner. When a Ministry is defeated and it resigns as a consequence thereof, the practice is to summon the Leader of the Opposition and he is commissioned to form the Ministry.

The Constitution of India is silent how the President shall choose the Prime Minister. It does not, also, say whether he must necessarily belong to the Lok Sabha or may be a member of either House of Parliament. If the letter of law is to be strictly adhered to, then, a Prime Minister may be appointed without his being a member of Parliament for a period of six months. But this is not the practice of the Cabinet system of Government. The accepted convention is that the Head of the State summons the leader of the parliamentary majority, if there is one, or a person capable of commanding a majority in the Legislature, if there is not one single party with clear majority, appoint him as a Prime Minister and commission him to form the Ministry. A person who is not a member of the Legislature may be appointed a Minister, but it cannot be possible in the case of a Prime Minister. This is the position in Britain and it is precisely applicable in India. Moreover, the constitutional provision of collective responsibility and that, too, expressly to the House of the People (Lok Sabha), leaves no margin for speculation that the Prime Minister may be appointed without his being a member of Parliament for a period of six months. The President must, therefore, summon a leader of the majority party in Parliament or a combination of parties agreeing to work in a coalition. He has no choice and if the President summons any one else other than the leader of the majority party or a combination of parties to form the Government, he violates the Constitution which establishes the Parliamentary form of Government.

But the President will be able to exercise effective discretion if there is not one single party to command a clear majority. The possibilities of such a contingency are there and it may even become a matter of frequent occurrence. Besides the Congress there are at present twelve distinct political parties and groups in the Lok Sabha and the apprehension is that the number may still increase and reach the limits of France. Such a development is really alarming, but it is hoped that when there is not one single party commanding a majority in the Lok Sabha and the President is confronted with the most difficult task of exercising his discretion in the selection of the Prime Minister, he will always act impartially in his choice.⁵⁸ The main anxiety of the President under such circumstances should be to select a person who must be able to secure colleagues, and with his colleagues he must be able to secure the collaboration of the Lok Sabha. The President stands above party considerations. As Head of the State, he must act for all the people and not for the benefit of a single party or any class of people. The President is under the constitutional obligation to faithfully discharge the functions of the President and preserve, protect and defend the Constitution and the law to the best of his ability. It should not matter for him which party or parties form the Government. The President may have his prejudices, and even Monarchs have, as Queen Victoria had against Gladstone, but he must not be a partisan and an active politician. Particularly, after the election of the Fourth President, the utmost caution is called for to prevent the rise of any suspicion that the President is favouring any group or groups.

58. Madhu Limaye, M.P., has recently expressed the view that there are two contingencies in which the President should be able to exercise an independent discretion. If no party emerges with an absolute majority in the Lok Sabha in 1972, whom should the President call upon first to form a new Government? Mr. Limaye's own view is that the leader of a potential united front or coalition should receive the President's favour in preference to what would be a rejected Congress Party. According to Madhu Limaye the Congress Party has no locus standi to form the Government in coalition with others even if it is the largest single party in the Lok Sabha. The Hindustan Times, New Delhi, June 1, 1969. K. Suba Rao, Former Chief Justice of India, suggests that the discretion of the President on the question who commands the majority or whom he can call upon to take upon responsibility shall not be exercised arbitrarily. He shall not allow himself to become an instrument of party manoeuvring. "He shall call upon the leader of the majority party to form the Government. If there is no majority party he shall call upon the leader of a coalition party, if there is such a party. If there is no such party, he shall give a chance to the leader of the largest group in Parliament to take responsibility. If the leader of the largest group is not able to form the Ministry, he shall give an opportunity to any other leader who undertakes the responsibility to form the Ministry. He can only dissolve Parliament if no leader is able to form a Ministry." The Tribune, Chandigarh, August 15, 1969.

Functions of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is the keystone of the Cabinet arch. In his hand is the key of the Government. His duties are onerous and his authority enormous. The Prime Minister of Britain is sometimes likened to a dictator. His formal powers at least, as Greaves says, "resemble closely those of an autocrat." This may be an exaggeration, yet the statement is indicative of the extent of the Prime Minister's powers under a Cabinet system of Government and the Prime Minister of India is no exception to it. Professor K.T. Shah expressed apprehension in the Constituent Assembly about the concentration of power in the hands of the Prime Minister. He maintained that "the power which this Constitution seeks to confer on the Prime Minister makes it inevitable that a degree of power will concentrate in his hands, which may very likely militate against the working of a real responsible and democratic government." Not in identical terms, but Dr. Ambedkar also said, "if any functionary under our Constitution is to be compared with the United States President he is the Prime Minister and not the President of the Union."⁵⁹ The comparison is not apt. The Cabinet in the United States is the "President's family". He makes and unmakes his Cabinet at his will. The President can, and very often he does, override the decisions of his 'ministers' or he may not seek their advice or even if he seeks, it, it is for him to decide whether to consult them individually or collectively. The use of the Cabinet depends upon the President's desire. But such is not the case in a Cabinet system of Government. The Prime Minister of India, like his counterpart in Britain, is nothing without a united Cabinet, a united Parliament and a united people behind the occupant of that office. Whatever be the position of the Prime Minister otherwise, the Constitution places him at par with his other colleagues so far as tendering of advice is concerned.⁶⁰ The President can refer the advice tendered by the Prime Minister singly for the decision of the Council of Ministers. Yet, the Prime Minister commands a unique position of superiority. Nehru and Shastri raised the stature of their office to unprecedented heights. The Prime Minister in India in a way enjoys more power as compared with the British Prime Minister. The former appoints, subject to the formal approval of the President, Governors of States, and if the same Party is in power in the States as well as at the Centre, the Prime Minister has an effective hand in the selection of Chief Ministers and their Cabinets.

59. Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. VII, pp. 1144-46.

60. Ibid., p. 998.

(1) The Prime Minister makes the Government. With the appointment of the Prime Minister the essential task of the President is completed, for it rests with the former to select his colleagues and present his list of Ministers to the President for his assent. Technically, the last word in the appointment of Ministers rests with the President because it is he who appoints them. But, in practice, the decision belongs to the Prime Minister and the Presidential assent is more or less a formality.

In the selection of his colleagues and in the assignment of departments, the Prime Minister has a very free hand. It is for him to decide on the size of the Cabinet and the Ministers to be included in it. He may even select colleagues outside the ranks of his party, as was done by Nehru while forming the first Union Cabinet, or even outside Parliament, if in his judgment a particular person is specially fitted for a particular job. But the choice of the Prime Minister of India is not so unrestricted as it is of the British Prime Minister. Amery, while summing up the power of appointing his colleagues says, "few dictators, indeed, enjoy such a measure of autocratic power as is enjoyed by a British Prime Minister while in process of making the Cabinet."⁶¹ The power of the Indian Prime Minister, on the other hand, is limited by party necessities, geographical considerations, and representation of the different communities.⁶² There is nothing in the Constitution which may bind the Prime Minister in his choice, but practical requirements do demand the representation of all the diverse elements.

In the allocation of offices as well, the Prime Minister offers posts at his discretion, although politicians of standing may safely decline what is given if the assignment is deemed derogatory to their political stature. Sardar Patel would have accepted nothing short of Home Affairs, States, and Broadcasting. T.T. Krishnamachari declined to rejoin the Cabinet after the 1962 General Elections unless he was given the Finance portfolio, though he joined in 1962 as Minister for Economic Co-ordination. Later, in August 1963, he succeeded in getting the Finance. In July 1963, S.K. Patil resisted the Prime Minister to shift him from Food to Railways. In August 1963, Patil resigned under the Kamraj Plan and Nehru accepted his resignation. In July 1969, Mrs. Indira Gandhi deprived Morarji Desai of the Finance Department and left him to continue as Deputy Prime Minister alone. He resigned and his resignation was accepted. The Prime Minister insisted that it was her unfettered right to allocate portfolios.

62. When Draft Article 61 came before the Constituent Assembly for consideration, Mahboob Ali Beg again moved an amendment, which had already been negatived, that the Council of Ministers should consist of fifteen members elected by the elected members of both Houses of Parliament from among themselves in accordance with the system of proportional representation. Dealing with it Dr. Ambedkar said that he presumed that the purpose of the amendment was possibly to enable the minorities to secure representation in the Cabinet. The Law Minister pointed out that this purpose could be better achieved by the Instrument of Instructions suggested by the Drafting Committee which directed the President to include in the Cabinet members of the minority communities as far as practicable. Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. VII, pp. 1141-60.

(2) If the machinery of Government is to work efficiently and effectively, then, it is the undisputed right of the Prime Minister to appoint, reshuffle, or dismiss his colleagues. He is free in the exercise of his impartial judgment to make what appointments may seem good to him. It is also his unfettered right to review, from time to time, the allocation of office among his various colleagues and determine whether that allocation still remains the best that can be affected. He may, thus, shuffle his pack as he likes and whenever he likes. Both as captain of the team and head of the administration, it is the duty of the Prime Minister to request any of his colleagues, whose presence in the Ministry he deems prejudicial to the efficiency, integrity, or policy of the Government, to resign. "Therefore, the Prime Minister," as Dr. Ambedkar observed, "is really the key-stone of the arch of the Cabinet and unless and until we create that office and endow that office with statutory authority to nominate and dismiss Ministers there can be no collective responsibility."⁶³

The Prime Minister can also advise the President to dismiss a Minister. According to law a Minister holds office at the pleasure of the President and is liable to dismissal whenever it pleases the President. But it is now the well-established practice of the Cabinet system of Government that the power of dismissal by the Head of the State is exercised solely on the advice of the Prime Minister. While dealing with this aspect of the problem Dr. Ambedkar maintained, in the Constituent Assembly, "In my judgment collective responsibility is enforced by the enforcement of two principles. One principle is that no person shall be nominated to the Cabinet except on the advice of the Prime Minister. Secondly, no person shall be retained as a Member of the Cabinet if the Prime Minister says that he shall be dismissed. It is only when members of the Cabinet both in the matter of their appointment as well as in the matter of their dismissal are placed under the Prime Minister, that it would be possible to realise our ideal of collective responsibility. I do not see any other means or any other way of giving effect to that principle."⁶⁴ It is, however, doubtful, if ever a Prime Minister would advise dismissal as he has other means in the armoury of his powers. The Prime Minister may tender his resignation and reconstitute the Government excluding the undesired Minister. And to remain still more dignified, the Prime Minister may elevate him to a Governorship or ambassadorship. All the same, the right of the Prime Minister to dismiss a Minister is there.

(3) The general election is in reality the election of the Prime Minister. The slogan in the 1952, 1957 and 1962 General Elections was "to vote for the Congress and strengthen the hands of Nehru." The Congress and Nehru had, in fact, become synonymous. He had no visible grips on the party machine, but his sway over the people was greater and more absolute than that of any other democratic statesman elsewhere. Writing about Prime Minister Nehru, Hiren Mukerjee, the Communist M.P., said, "If to a public figure nothing is more rewarding than the love of his people, Jawaharlal Nehru has been one of the most fortunate persons in creation. Apart from Gandhiji, no one in India has been the recipient, in recent decades, of such abounding love—and, while the Mahatma commanded a sort of reverence, Nehru has evoked the people's affection. Even Subhas Chandra Bose, in some ways a more dynamic person, lacked the secret of Jawaharlal's personal fascination for all varieties of people.⁶⁵ K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar, writing under the caption: The Prime Minister, observed "when he enters an assembly, be it a Select Committee or a mass rally, the effect is invariably the same. All eyes converge towards him, all hands clasp in eager affectionate welcome as if to a pre-ordained tune, and a hushed expectancy watches his intrepid movements and strains to catch his words and whispers. The men are a little out of breath, the women are almost overwhelmed."⁶⁶ Prime Minister Nehru was, thus, the virtual leader of his party and he towered above all in national stature. In fact, he had acquired world stature and even his bitter political adversaries acclaimed him as such. "May this gentle colossus", prayed Hiren Mukerjee, "stride the Indian scene for as long as we care to foresee in the future."⁶⁷

The Prime Minister moulds and guides public opinion by receiving deputations and discusses issues, by public speeches at party conferences, and on other important occasions which demand proper attention. The role which a Prime Minister plays in assuming leadership of the party depends upon his personality, his prestige and even his strategy. Jennings says, "since his personality and prestige play a considerable part in moulding public opinion he ought to have something of the popular appeal of a film actor and he must take some care over his make up—like Mr. Gladstone with his collars, Mr. Lloyd George with his hair, Mr. Baldwin with his pipes and Mr. Churchill with his cigars."⁶⁸ Nehru had his baton and a rose in the buttonhole of his achkan. In the exuberance of their enthusiasm the old and the young, the ladies and the little tots raced to offer him, wherever he went, the choicest rose flowers. Nehru and the nation were personified. Mrs. Indira Gandhi's assets are her youth, her strong sense of duty and her unquestioned dedication to the country's interests and good. She has a hold on the people's imagination. After the nationalisation of 14 major Banks in July 1969, Mrs. Gandhi's popularity is running at a peak according to a Gallup Poll report by E.P.W. da Costa.⁶⁹ The survey conducted by him disclosed that in August 1969, her peak popularity rose to 71 as compared to 45 in October 1966 and 41 in August-September 1967. "This is high," says da Costa, "but short of the Indian peak of 97 which Lal Bahadur Shastri reached after the 22-day hostilities in 1965. Nevertheless, the ascent from 41 to her peak figure of 71 is a clear indication that the Prime Minister has emerged in the area of India's most popular leaders which includes her father and Lal Bahadur Shastri."⁷⁰

(4) Then, the Prime Minister is the Chairman of the Cabinet and generally "the chairman of any committee attracts a special kind of loyalty, engendered by the vague feeling that business is expedited and improved by order and that one must be prepared to suffer the chairman's ruling for the sake of the collective enterprise."⁷¹ The Ministers may differ behind closed doors, but they must finally agree, if party solidarity is to be maintained. The possibilities of disagreement are, in fact, rare. A difference between two Ministers or two Departments can be settled by private consultation or by arbitration by the Prime Minister. If differences emerge out of cabinet discussions, then, as chairman of the Cabinet, the Prime Minister occupies a position of pre-eminence which enables him or her to impose a decision. Moreover, the Prime Minister is the leader of the Party and his fifteen or more colleagues owe him a personal as well as a party allegiance. Finally, he controls the agenda. It is for him to accept or reject proposals for Cabinet discussion. In Britain the practice is that the Prime Minister is always consulted by every Minister before an important proposal is put forward and his support elicited. But such a solidarity can only be obtained when one single party enjoys a clear majority in Parliament. In case of a Coalition Government, and more particularly when it is a combination of five or six parties or groups, the possibilities of such a solidarity are rare, and consequently personal as well as party allegiance to the Prime Minister becomes an exception. Chances of such conditions are there, because India, too, is heading towards a multiple party system. If it actually happens, it will be reminiscent of France where every Minister is a prospective Prime Minister.

(5) The Prime Minister is the Manager-in-Chief of the Government's business. He co-ordinates the policies of the several Ministers and the Ministries. He must see the Government as a whole and bring the variety of governmental activities into reasonable relationship with one another. It is, however, not possible for a Prime Minister in any part of the democratic world to exercise his control and supervision over all the Departments of Government. The sphere of the State has become so extensive and its functions so varied and complex that even if any Prime Minister were to venture it the result would be equally disastrous to him and to the country. The responsibilities of the Prime Minister have, therefore, been shared by his colleagues who constitute the inner Cabinet and the work of co-ordination is done by various Committees of the Cabinet. Still the Prime Minister is supposed to exercise a general supervision over all Departments and he or she has a right to be consulted on all matters, important or minor, controversial or otherwise. B.N. Kaul, Principal Private Secretary to the Prime Minister, in his examination before the Public Accounts Committee, on a question about the supervisory functions of the Prime Minister, observed: "The Minister-in-charge of each Ministry is responsible for the affairs of that Ministry. Under the Cabinet system of the Government, the Minister is the highest person-in-charge of a Ministry. He is directly responsible to the Prime Minister." When asked, "Cannot the Prime Minister sit in judgment over other Ministers?", 71. Finer, H., The Theory and Practice of Modern Government (1954), p. 592.

Kaul replied, "He can. Ultimately the Prime Minister is responsible."⁷²

(6) The Prime Minister is the leader of the House of the People, Lok Sabha, if he is its member. Mrs. Indira Gandhi was not a member of the Lok Sabha in January 1966, when she became the Prime Minister. The Constitution does not specifically prevent a Prime Minister if he/she comes from the Upper Chamber.⁷³ In Britain, however, no peer has been Prime Minister since 1902 and he has no access to the House of Lords. But Ministers in India have the right to speak in, and otherwise to take part in the proceedings, of either House of Parliament.⁷⁴ All principal announcement of policy and business are made by the Prime Minister and all questions on non-departmental affairs and critical issues are addressed to him or her. The Prime Minister initiates or intervenes in debates of general importance. The Prime Minister also possesses an immediate authority to correct what he may consider the errors of omission and commission of his colleagues. Prime Minister Nehru appeased an angry Lok Sabha by promising an immediate inquiry when the Food Minister vainly tried to assure the House that it need not feel concerned over the fertilizers. When the Law Minister introduced the Representation of the People's Bill at the fag end of the session of Parliament and hinted at further legislation by the President during the recess it angered the Lok Sabha. The Prime Minister intervened and promised that it would only be done by Parliament and if necessary the session of Parliament might be lengthened.

(7) The Prime Minister is the only channel of communication with the Head of the State on matters of public concern. According to Article 78 of the Constitution, it is the legal duty of the Prime Minister:

- "(a) to communicate to the President all decisions of the Council of Ministers relating to the administration of affairs of the Union and proposals for legislation;
- (b) to furnish such information relating to the administration of the affairs of the Union and proposals for legislation as the President may call for; and
- (c) if the President so requires, to submit for the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision has been taken by a minister but which has not been considered by the Council."

It is a breach of Cabinet etiquette for any other Minister to revise the account given by the Prime Minister or to reveal to the President the substance of Cabinet discussions. The Prime Minister is the Chief Adviser of the President and in emergencies he will first consult him.

Gadgil wrote, "Two brass pots cannot touch each other without making some sound. Once a Minister assumes a position of power, he begins to think of himself as infallible and his opinions as if divinely inspired. In the circumstances, when a dispute arises between two Ministries, they go to the Prime Minister whose word is final." Gadgil, N.V., Government from Inside, pp. 163-64.

73. Mrs. Indira Gandhi stood for the Lok Sabha seat in the 1967 General Elections and was elected.

74. Article 88.

(8) The patronage exercised by the Prime Minister is enormous. All major appointments are really made by him. In the course of making such appointments he, no doubt, receives the advice of his colleagues, but the ultimate choice belongs to him.

The Prime Minister's position. The Prime Ministership of India entails one of the heaviest burdens in the world. As in Britain so in India, the Prime Minister is not merely primum inter pares, first among equals. He is rather "a sun around which planets revolve." While refuting the charge of C.D. Deshmukh that the two crucial decisions on Bombay, which caused Deshmukh's resignation, were not Cabinet decisions but that of the Prime Minister, Nehru declared in the Lok Sabha on July 30, 1956, "I am the Prime Minister of India. I know something of democratic procedure, about the Prime Minister's duties, the Constitution of India and the Constitution of Britain. The Prime Minister is the linchpin of the Government and he can make any statement on behalf of the Government."

The Prime Minister is, indeed, "a sun around which planets revolve". His authority is great if he is keen to assert to the full position which he occupies. The office of the Prime Minister in India is created by the Constitution and his authority carries with it the constitutional sanction. He heads the Council of Ministers and Ministers are appointed by the President on the advice of the Prime Minister. The Ministers hold office during the pleasure of the President, but the President exercises this power on the advice of the Prime Minister. Dr. Ambedkar characterised the Prime Minister's power to appoint and dismiss Ministers as the only means by which the principle of collective responsibility ordained by the Constitution⁷⁵ could be realized.⁷⁶ To defy the authority of the Prime Minister and to challenge his position is suicidal to the political ambitions of a Minister unless the Prime Minister "has handled his job so badly that there is a widespread feeling of his unfitness for it." Nehru even thought of dismissing Sardar Patel. It is reported that he told the Deputy Prime Minister that the Prime Minister had the right to select his colleagues and he could dismiss him if his views differed from the policy of the Cabinet.⁷⁷ Winston Churchill had aptly said, "In any sphere of action there can be no comparison between the positions of number one and number two,

75. See ante, Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. VII, p. 1159.

76. Article 75 (2).

77. Gadgil writes, "As I have said above, although the differences amongst the Cabinet members were not brought up forcefully, the schism between the viewpoint of Vallabhbhai (Patel) and Nehru began to come to surface gradually. Nehru was displeased with a speech made by Vallabhbhai in Varanasi. The speech did not contradict the Cabinet policy as such, but nor did it show any overmuch indulgence for the Muslims. Vallabhbhai believed in justice for all and was stoutly opposed to injustice or treachery. The differences between them became sharper as time went on. Nehru was not pleased by the action taken in Junagadh by Vallabhbhai. He was equally displeased at the firmness displayed by Vallabhbhai in the Hyderabad affair. It was rumoured then that Nehru had given a hint to Vallabhbhai through one of his confidants that he might have to go if he did not behave. I do not believe there could have been any such hint. But I know for certain that Nehru's favourites and sycophants were quite capable of creating such mischief." Gadgil, N.V., Government from Inside, p. 145.

three, or four. The duties and problems of all persons other than the number one are quite different and in many ways more difficult. It is always a misfortune when number two or three has to initiate a dominant plan or policy. He has to consider not only the merits of the policy, but the mind of his chief; not only what to advise, but what it is proper for him in his station to advise; not only what to do, but how to get it agreed; and how to get it done. Moreover, number two or three will have to reckon with numbers four, five and six, or may be some bright outsider, number twenty....” Dr. Ambedkar resigned from the Cabinet and complained in the statement of his resignation that “Many Ministers have been given three or four portfolios so that they have been overburdened. Others like me have been wanting more work. I have not been considered even for holding a portfolio temporarily when a minister-in-charge has gone abroad for a few days.” Nehru accepted the resignations of Morarji Desai, S.K. Patil, Lal Bahadur Shastri, Jagjivan Ram, Shrimali and Gopala Reddy under the Kamraj Plan because it provided him an opportunity to get rid of incompetent or inconvenient colleagues whom he was hesitant to remove in the normal way. Lal Bahadur Shastri and Jagjivan Ram were dropped from the Cabinet in order to keep up an appearance of impartiality in accepting these resignations. Morarji Desai had to quit unceremoniously as Mrs. Indira Gandhi thought that he might not be able to properly implement the policy of nationalisation of banks.

But the office of the Prime Minister, as Jennings says, “is necessarily what the holder chooses to make of it.” The mightily power behind Nehru was his dynamic personality. He, in fact, became an institution and reigned supreme over his Party and Government. “Many of his colleagues and/or party high-ups”, wrote Radhakrishnan, “receive the shock of their lives when Nehru asks them to explain, obscure reports published in the papers, with the relevant cutting pasted faithfully on the note paper.”⁷⁸ The cross-country trips Nehru made during the first and second General Elections are said to have surpassed all records of any Prime Minister in any part of the world. The Prime Minister’s prestige is one of the elements that make for the success of the Party and his personality is responsible for Party cohesion. The position of the Congress Prime Minister, wrote N.V. Gadgil, former Union Minister (1947-52) and Governor of Punjab, “is a peculiar one. In the Cabinet, he naturally claims to be the mouthpiece of the Working Committee, and he naturally claims that it is his responsibility that the decisions of the Government are in conformity with the broad principles and policies laid down by the Congress. In the Working Committee, where he cannot escape dominating, he represents the Government and is in a stronger position to necessarily press his views, backed up as they are by administrative experience.”⁷⁹ Many merits are claimed for such a position of the Prime Minister as he constitutes an effective connecting link between the Government and the Party organization as represented by the Working Committee. “But disadvantage which is inherent in a situation of this kind,” Gadgil remarked, “is equally overwhelming, viz., that the Prime Minister is invested with formidable power and influence and unless he be a genuine democrat by nature he is very likely to become a dictator."⁸⁰ Mrs. Indira Gandhi clarified the position and role of the Prime Minister vis-a-vis of the Congress President and his Working Committee. Mrs. Gandhi, who was addressing the general body of the Congress Parliamentary Party on August 29, 1969, is reported to have said⁸¹ that the sphere of the Congress President was the Party which laid down broad policies. But the implementation of policies and programmes was in the hands of Parliament and the State Legislatures. The leader of the Congress Parliamentary Party, as the Prime Minister, had responsibility not only to the Congress but to the State Governments and to nations of the world. Therefore, it would not be proper to fetter the discretion of the Prime Minister.

The Congress President, S. Nijalingappa, has warned the Congress of the evil of "personality cult" which according to him was reflected in the Prime Minister's desire for freedom of vote in the Fourth Presidential election. The Congress President is of the opinion that Congressmen and other voters rallied behind Mrs. Indira Gandhi because some sort of worship had developed around her personality and voters and supporters of V.V. Giri were swayed by it. Whatever be the merit of this accusation, it is undisputedly true that Mrs. Indira Gandhi has acquired a new political stature after the Bangalore session of the All-India Congress Committee in July 1969. "Any leader", writes K.D. Malaviya, "who develops a healthy political perspective and responds intelligently to the needs of society is entitled to adoration and support, which can by no means be attributed to personal factors, although individual charm and political demeanour must be considered essential attributes of a leader."⁸² Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's performance in nationalising the top 14 Banks and her utterances promising economic and social justice have inspired confidence among the people in a manner unparalleled in the history of the Indian National Congress.

But the Prime Minister's position is bound up with his Party. Without his Party he is nothing. Whatever he is and whatever he can claim to be is due to what the Party has made him. As long as he retains the hold on his Party, he is able within limits to dictate his policy and impose his decisions. Even Nehru had to bow to the demand of the Congress Parliamentary Party on Krishna Menon's resignation in 1962, when China attacked India and the Indian army suffered a series of reverses. Nehru defended Menon in the meeting of the Congress Parliamentary Party and vaguely threatened to resign. It is reported that one of the leaders in the Party said, "If you continue to follow Menon's policies, we are prepared to contemplate that possibility." Nehru yielded and Menon had to resign. Indira Gandhi's conflict with the Party has resulted in splitting the Indian National Congress.

Constitution of Parliament. Parliament is the name given by the Constitution to the Union Legislature,¹ and it consists of the President and two Houses known respectively as the Council of States (Rajya Sabha) and the House of the People (Lok Sabha).² The President is, thus, a constituent part of Parliament just as the Monarch is in Britain. But the American President is not a constituent part of Congress. The Constitution of the United States provides, "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in the Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."³

Though the Constitution of India adopts the language of Britain in describing its Legislature at the Centre,⁴ and makes the President, like the Monarch of that country, a constituent part of Parliament, yet the Indian Parliament is not a sovereign Legislature like the British Parliament. "The Sovereignty of Parliament," says Dicey, "is from a legal point of view the dominant characteristic of our political institutions." It means that Parliament can legislate what it pleases, as it pleases, and that what it enacts is law. What Parliament has enacted, the courts interpret and apply unless Parliament has otherwise provided. Parliament is, in brief, both a legislative body and a Constituent Assembly, and an Act of Parliament cannot be called into question in any court of law.

But the legislative competence of the Indian Parliament is limited, during normal times, to the subjects enumerated in the Union List and in the Concurrent List in the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution. Besides, its supremacy within its own sphere of jurisdiction is limited by the Fundamental Rights guaranteed to the citizens in Part III of the Constitution. Article 13 Clause (2) prohibits the State from making any law which would take away or abridge any of the Fundamental Rights. Where the State makes a law in contravention of the Fundamental Rights, that law shall, to the extent of contravention, be void.

1. Article 79.

2. Ibid.

3. Article 1, Sec. 1.

4. The Union Constitution Committee in their Report presented to the Constituent Assembly suggested the name "National Assembly" as a composite designation for the Parliament of the Union. The Framing of the Constitution, Select Documents, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 581-83. But the Constituent Assembly agreed, on the suggestion of K. Santhanam and Gopalaswami Ayyangar, to the omission of the name "National Assembly." Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. IV, p. 928.

In Britain no formal distinction is made between constitutional and other laws and the same body, Parliament, can change or abrogate any law whatsoever and by the same procedure. The Constitution of India, on the other hand, makes a distinction between statutory law and constitutional law and prescribes a special procedure for amending the latter.⁵ The Constitution, also, empowers the Courts to decide whether a piece of legislation is void or not.

In spite of these limitations on the authority of Parliament, it is the pivot on which revolves the whole machinery of government. Its legislative competence embraces a huge field and its financial powers are vast. Its sanction is also necessary for declaring war and making peace. Parliament, in fact, controls all governmental machinery at the Centre and is, in the last resort, responsible for the good government of the entire country. During times of Emergency all limitations on its legislative and financial authority disappear. Really speaking, Parliament, acting together with the President and the Council of Ministers, assumes sovereign powers so long as the Proclamation of Emergency remains in operation.

Parliament is bicameral. The Memorandum prepared by the Constitutional Adviser envisaged a Parliament consisting of the President and two Houses, the Senate and the House of Representatives. The Union Constitution Committee accepted the principle of bicameralism, but suggested that the two Chambers should be named the Council of States and the House of the People, the former representing the units of the Federation and the latter population. When these proposals came for consideration before the Constituent Assembly⁶ quite a good number of members expressed opinion against establishing a bicameral legislature. Some thought that a Second Chamber might prove to be a "clog in the wheel of progress", and unnecessary expense, inefficiency besides.⁷ Replying to the criticism Gopalaswami Ayyangar pointed out that bicameral Legislature was indispensable for a federal state and it was a universal practice in all the federal countries. Dealing with the role of the Second Chamber, he said, "After all, the question for us to consider is whether it performs any useful function. The most that we expect the second Chamber to do is perhaps to hold dignified debates on important issues and to delay legislation which might be the outcome of passions of the moment until passions have subsided and calm consideration could be bestowed on the measures which will be before the Legislature: and we shall take care to provide in the Constitution that whenever on any important matter, particularly matters relating to finance, there is a conflict between the House of the People and the Council of States, it is the view of the House of the People that shall prevail. Therefore, what we really achieve by the existence of this second Chamber is only an instrument by which we delay action which might be hastily conceived, and we also give an opportunity, perhaps to seasoned people who may not be in the thickest of the political fray, but who might be willing to participate in the debate with an amount of learning and importance which we do not ordinarily associate with a House of the People. That is all that is proposed in regard to this second Chamber. I think, on the whole, the balance of consideration is in favour of having such a Chamber and taking care to see that it does not prove a clog either to legislation or administration.⁸ The Constituent Assembly agreed that there should be two Chambers of the Legislature at the Centre, the Council of States and the House of the People.

Composition of the two Houses. As regards the composition of the Council of States, the Union Constitution Committee decided that it should have a membership of 250 and that the members were to be elected by the Lower House of the Legislatures of the units of the Federation, except for ten members to be nominated by the President in consultation with universities and scientific bodies. Gopalaswami Ayyangar moved an amendment and proposed that the strength of the Council of States should be so fixed as not to exceed one-half of the membership of the House of the People, out of which twenty-five members were to be returned by functional constituencies or panels on the lines of the Irish Constitution (1937). He thought that the original proposal of nomination of ten members was too narrow in its scope. He contended that it was desirable to get into the Council of States persons, who, though not belonging to universities and scientific bodies, deserved, on account of their association with important aspects of the nation's activities, to be members of that Chamber. The remaining members would be returned by units more or less on a territorial basis. The strength of the House of the People was to be so fixed as not to exceed 500. The units of the Federation were to be divided into territorial constituencies in such a manner that there would not be less than one representative for every 750,000 of the population and not more than one for every 500,000.

The first Draft Constitution incorporated the decisions of the Constituent Assembly and the Drafting Committee considered all these provisions as also the provisions regarding the legislative procedure, procedure in financial matters and general procedure for the conduct of business between November 1947 and January 1948. In the meantime the Constitutional Adviser visited the United States of America, Britain and Ireland in order to study the working of the Constitutions of these countries on the spot. He had discussions with eminent persons, including President Truman and President de Valera, and leading jurists. President de Valera suggested that the term of the House of the People should not be less than five years and that the proposal for functional representation in the Council of States should be revised as this kind of representation in the Senate of Ireland had given them sufficient trouble.

The Drafting Committee considered these suggestions and, accordingly, fixed the membership of the Council of States at 250 and instead of representation by functional panels included an Article empowering the President to nominate fifteen members with experience or knowledge of (a) literature, art, science and education; (b) agriculture, fisheries and allied subjects; (c) engineering and architecture; and (d) public administration and social services. The House of the People was to consist of 500 members and the term of office was fixed at five years.

8. Ibid., pp. 924-28.

The special committee, appointed by the President of the Constituent Assembly to examine the Draft Constitution and the various comments and suggestions received by the Constituent Assembly and the recommendations of the Drafting Committee thereon,⁹ decided that instead of four groups of person from amongst whom the President was to make nominations, a simpler terminology should be adopted, and that the nominated members should be persons with knowledge or experience in letters, art, science or social services.¹⁰ An amendment was moved by Dr. Ambedkar to this effect in the Constituent Assembly¹¹ and it was adopted. Consequent on the integration and merger of the Indian States with the Union of India the Drafting Committee made relevant changes at the revision stage. The provisions for election to the Council of States were modified. It was provided that its elected members would be elected by the Legislative Assemblies of Part A and Part B States and Parliament by law would provide for the representation of Part C States. The number of representatives to be returned from each of these States was also included in the Fourth Schedule.

The Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act, 1956 made some amendments to Article 80 consequent on the description of the units comprising the Indian Union as "States" and "Union Territories." The Fourth Schedule was also amended from time to time, as a consequence of the formation of new States and Union Territories. There was also an increase in the elected membership of the Council of States from 205, when the Constitution was adopted in 1949, to 226. The Union Territories of Andaman and Nicobar Islands, the Laccadive, Minicoy and Amindivi Islands, Dadra and Nagar Haveli, and Goa, Daman and Diu, and Chandigarh are not represented in the Council of States.

Article 81 of the Constitution originally prescribed a maximum membership of 500 for the House of the People and also that the scale of representation should be not less than one member for every 750,000 of the population and not more than one member for every 500,000. The Constitution (Second Amendment) Act, 1952, deleted the requirement that there should be not less than one member for every 750,000 of the population. The Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act, 1956 amended Articles 81 and 82 to provide that the House of the People should have not more than 520 members out of which not more than 20 would represent the Union Territories. The method of their election was to be determined by law of Parliament. The Constitution (Fourteenth Amendment) Act, 1962, increased to 25 the number of seats to be assigned to Union Territories.

9. The Draft Constitution was submitted to the President of the Constituent Assembly on February 21, 1948. It was published on February 26 and was given wide publicity in order to enable the people and organizations to express their views and copies of the Draft were sent to every member of the Constituent Assembly, Provincial Legislatures, Provincial Governments, Ministers of the Government of India, the Federal Court and the High Courts inviting criticisms and suggestions. The Drafting Committee considered all such suggestions and comments and decided to recommend certain amendments to the Draft Constitution. Subsequently, the President of the Constituent Assembly constituted a special Committee consisting mostly of the members of the Union Constitution Committee, the Provincial Committee and the Union Powers Committee to examine the Draft Constitution and the various comments and suggestions received, with the recommendations of the Drafting Committee thereon.

COUNCIL OF STATES (RAJYA SABHA)

Composition. The Constitution fixes the maximum strength of the Council of States (Rajya Sabha) at 250; 12 nominated by the President to represent literature, science, art and social service, and not more than 238 other members representing the States and the Union Territories. The representatives of the States are elected by the elected members of their Legislative Assemblies in accordance with the system of proportional representation by means of the single transferable vote. The method of election is, accordingly, indirect. In the case of the Union Territories members are chosen in such manner as Parliament may by law determine. The total number of members in the Rajya Sabha as constituted on April 20, 1968, is 240, of whom 228 are the elected representatives of the States and the Union Territories and twelve are nominated by the President. The principle of nomination was the subject of a good deal of criticism in the Constituent Assembly. Some members characterised it as undemocratic and reactionary element of membership in a democratic Republic. Representation of the States on the basis of population and inclusion of nominated members, it was contended, violated the federal principle. During the early Constitution-making debates even an amendment to establish a single Chamber was moved, although it was defeated. When in the later debate on the Draft Constitution an attempt was again made for a single chamber Legislature, Ananthasayanam Ayyangar defended the Upper House as a way to utilise the services of persons of intellectual capacity and experience of affairs without imperilling the administration. But all such arguments were in favour of bicameralism, and not in defence of the composition of an Upper House in a federation. Nor could it be claimed that the Rajya Sabha so constituted would serve as defence for smaller States. The Rajya Sabha is a continuous body and is not subject to dissolution. Its life is for six years, one-third members retiring after every two years.

Qualifications for Members: To be qualified, a candidate for election to the Rajya Sabha must be:

- (a) a citizen of India;
- (b) not less than thirty years of age; and
- (c) possesses such other qualifications as may be prescribed by Parliament. By the Representation of the People Act, 1951, a candidate for election to the Rajya Sabha must be a Parliamentary elector in the State from which he seeks election.

The qualifications required for eligibility to the Rajya Sabha are the same as those required for the House of the People (Lok Sabha) except that the age in the case of the latter must not be less than twenty-five years. The framers of the Constitution thought that higher qualifications would tend to give greater dignity to the House and, at the same time, higher average ability. The functions, observed Dr. Ambedkar, that a member "is required to discharge in the House require experience, certain amount of knowledge and practical experience in the affairs of the world, and I think if these additional qualifications are accepted, we shall be able to secure the proper sort of candidates who would be able to serve the House better than a mere ordinary voter might do."¹³ A Senator in the United States must not be less than thirty years old, an inhabitant of the State from which he is elected, and a citizen of the United States for nine years.

The Presiding Officer. The Vice-President of India is the ex-officio Chairman of the Rajya Sabha and finds a close parallel in the Vice-President of the United States who is the President of the Senate. The Vice-President of India, like his American counterpart, is not a member of the Rajya Sabha and both have no right to vote except in the event of a tie. But the President of the Senate is just a moderator. He cannot control debate through the power of recognition; he must recognise the members in the order in which they rise. The Chairman of the Rajya

13. Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. VIII, p. 89.

Sabha, on the other hand, enjoys an exalted position. He recognises members to the floor, decides points of order, maintains order and relevancy in debates, puts questions and announces results. The American Vice-President permanently relinquishes the office of the President of the Senate on his succession to Presidency, but the Vice-President of India fills only a casual vacancy and reverts to his original office as soon as the contingency of his acting as President is over.

The Rajya Sabha elects a Deputy Chairman from among its own members¹⁴ and he presides in the absence of the Chairman or during any period when the Vice-President is acting as, or discharging the functions of the President.¹⁵ In the absence of both the Chairman and the Deputy Chairman from any sitting of the Rajya Sabha such person, as may be determined by the Rules of Procedure of the House, acts as Chairman. And if no such person is present, then, such other person as the Rajya Sabha determines acts as Chairman.¹⁶

The Vice-President may be removed by a resolution of the Rajya Sabha, agreed to by the Lok Sabha.¹⁷ But while the resolution for his removal is under consideration of the House, the Vice-President neither presides nor is he entitled to vote on such resolution or on any other matter during such proceedings, although he has the right to speak in and otherwise to take part in the proceedings. The Deputy Chairman is also subject to removal by a resolution of the House supported by an absolute majority of the total membership. The Deputy Chairman, like the Chairman, does not preside while a resolution for his removal from office is under consideration.

The salaries and allowances of the Chairman and the Deputy Chairman are determined by Parliament and are charged on the Consolidated Fund. G.S. Pathak is the Vice-President of India and, as such, the Chairman of the Rajya Sabha.

FUNCTIONS OF THE RAJYA SABHA

The functions of the Rajya Sabha are considered under five heads: legislative, financial, administrative, constituent, and miscellaneous.

Legislative functions. The process of making laws is the business of Parliament as a whole, the President, the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha. The Lok Sabha by itself can do nothing, although the actual powers of the President and the Rajya Sabha are subject to specific limitations. All Bills other than Money Bills, may originate in either House of Parliament,¹⁸ and no Bill can become a law unless agreed to by both the Houses.¹⁹ It means that the power of initiating legislation on any subject, except Money Bills and other financial Bills, equally belongs to the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha and a Bill in order to become a law must be agreed to by both the Chambers. When a Bill is amended in either House, such amendments must be agreed to by both the Houses. In case of disagreement between the two Houses, either on the Bill as a whole or on amendments made in the Bill, the President is empowered to summon both the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha in a joint meeting for the purpose of deliberating and voting on the Bill.²⁰ At the joint sitting questions are decided by a majority of the members of both Houses present and voting. A Bill thus agreed and passed is deemed to have been passed by both Houses. The method of joint sitting also applies when a Bill is passed by one House and sent to the other and it is not passed within six months after its reception by the other House, excluding any period of prorogation or adjournment over four days.²¹

The Rajya Sabha has, thus, co-ordinate legislative powers with the Lok Sabha. The powers of the Rajya Sabha, with regard to ordinary legislation, are in no way limited as the Parliament Act, 1911 as amended in 1949, limits the powers of the House of Lords. It stands on a footing of equality with the Lok Sabha and can press the issue to the extent of summoning a joint sitting for the resolution of disagreement. But at a joint sitting, the position of the Rajya Sabha becomes weaker. The Rajya Sabha has a membership of 240 against 523 of the Lok Sabha, and it means a minority of 1 to 2. It is, accordingly, not difficult for the Lok Sabha to defeat the opposition of the Rajya Sabha. The Rajya Sabha, at the most, can delay the passage of the legislation passed by the Lok Sabha for a period not exceeding six months. It cannot permanently kill it.

Financial functions. The position of the Rajya Sabha in respect of Money Bills is definitely inferior to that of the Lok Sabha. The Constitution defines a Money Bill²² and it is expressly provided that the decision of the Speaker of the Lok Sabha whether a Bill is a Money Bill or not shall be final.²³ The Constitution clearly prescribes that a Money Bill shall not be introduced in the Rajya Sabha²⁴ and it need not be assented to by the Rajya Sabha at all. After a Money Bill has been passed by the Lok Sabha, it is transmitted to the Rajya Sabha "for its recommendations"²⁵ within a period of fourteen days. The Lok Sabha is not bound to accept the recommendations made by the Rajya Sabha. In case, it rejects the recommendations of the Rajya Sabha the Bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses in the form in which it was passed by the Lok Sabha.²⁶ If the Rajya Sabha does not return to the Lok Sabha within fourteen days a Money Bill with or without its recommendations, it is deemed to have been passed by both Houses in the form in which it was passed by the Lok Sabha. The right to vote supplies is perhaps the greatest privilege of a legislative body. Under the Constitution of India this right is the exclusive privilege of the Lok Sabha. Demands for grants are not submitted to the Rajya Sabha.²⁷

Administrative functions. The Rajya Sabha does not control the Executive as the Constitution makes the Council of Ministers responsible to the Lok Sabha.²⁸ In fact, control and responsibility go together. But the Rajya Sabha can influence the Executive in two ways. First, by eliciting information about the actions of Government, and, secondly, by criticism aimed at the Government. The most effective instrument by which the Rajya Sabha seeks information from the Government is through the instrument of oral or written questions together with supplementaries. The normal occasion for criticism of the Executive is a debate on a motion of adjournment and the Rajya Sabha, like the Lok Sabha, possesses this privilege. It can also move resolutions impressing on the Government the desirability of pursuing a particular line of policy. The policy of the Government is really under review when laws are made and Rajya Sabha is an equal participant with the Lok Sabha in the making of laws. In order to defend the policy of the Government, Ministers are there and some of them are appointed from among its members. The Constitution permits a Minister, who is not a member of the Rajya Sabha, to speak in, and otherwise to take part in its proceedings, though he has no right to vote.²⁹ The Rajya Sabha, however, cannot bring about the downfall of the Government.

Constituent functions. The Rajya Sabha exercises constituent functions along with the Lok Sabha. A Bill to amend the Constitution may originate in either House of Parliament.³⁰ And the Bill amending the Constitution is required to be passed in each House by a majority of its total membership and by a majority of two-thirds of its members present and voting.

The Constitution does not prescribe any procedure for settling differences between the two Houses in case of disagreement on a Bill amending the Constitution. The Supreme Court held in Shankari Prasad vs. Union of India, that the procedure required for amending the Constitution is a legislative procedure and that the rules framed by Parliament under Article 118 relating to its ordinary legislative business shall be followed so far as applicable, in the matter of an amendment Bill under the provisions of Article 368. In view of this decision, it is now definite that the differences between the two Houses of Parliament in case of disagreement on an amendment Bill must be settled in the same way as in the case of ordinary legislation under Article 108 of the Constitution. It means a joint sitting of the two Houses. The constituent power of Rajya Sabha, thus, becomes ineffective like the ordinary legislation as at a joint sitting it is always in a minority of 1 to 2.

Miscellaneous functions. The miscellaneous functions of the Rajya Sabha are:

- (1) The elected members of the Rajya Sabha participate in the election of the President of India.³¹ The President is elected by an Electoral College consisting of the elected members of both Houses of Parliament and the elected members of the Legislative Assemblies of the States.³²
- (2) The President is liable to be impeached and a resolution to impeach the President may be moved in any House of Parliament and such a resolution must be passed by two-thirds majority of the total membership of that House. When this has been done, the charge is investigated by the other House or by a Court or Tribunal to which that House may refer the impeachment charge to be investigated. A vote by two-thirds of the total membership of the House which investigates it is necessary for the impeachment to succeed.³³ It means that if the Rajya Sabha initiates proceedings of impeachment the Lok Sabha investigates the charge, and if it is initiated by the Lok Sabha the Rajya Sabha investigates and the impeachment succeeds if the investigating House passes a resolution by a two-thirds majority of its membership. The Rajya Sabha, thus, enjoys co-equal powers with the Lok Sabha in the process of impeachment of the President.
- (3) The Vice-President of India is elected by members of both Houses of Parliament assembled at a joint sitting,³⁴ and he may be removed from office by a resolution of the Rajya Sabha and agreed to by the Lok Sabha.³⁵
- (4) A judge of the Supreme Court,³⁶ or a High Court³⁷ may be removed for misbehaviour or incapacity on the address passed by both Houses of Parliament supported by a majority of the total membership of, and a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting in each House. Here, too, the powers of the Rajya Sabha are identical to those of the Lok Sabha. Agreement of the Rajya Sabha is also necessary if action is to be taken against the Chief Election Commissioner, Comptroller-General, and the members of the Union Public Service Commission.
- (5) The report of the Union Public Service Commission, the Comptroller-General, the Scheduled Castes and Tribes Commission and the Finance Commission are considered both by the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha.
- (6) If the Government makes a proposal to take an appointment from the purview of the Union Public Service Commission, the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha both must agree to its exclusion.

- (7) The Rajya Sabha may declare by resolution, passed by two-thirds majority of its members present and voting, that it is necessary or expedient in the national interests that Parliament should make laws with respect to any matter enumerated in the State List.³⁸ Such a resolution passed by the Rajya Sabha remains in force for a period not exceeding one year.
- (8) The Rajya Sabha is also empowered under Article 312 to create one or more All-India Services, if the House declares by a resolution supported by not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting that it is necessary or expedient in the national interest to do so.
- (9) The approval of the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha, both, is necessary for the continuance of the Proclamation of Emergency, financial³⁹ or otherwise⁴⁰ and the failure of constitutional machinery in a State,⁴¹ beyond a period of two months. If the Lok Sabha stands dissolved, the Rajya Sabha alone is to judge the necessity of the continuance of the Proclamation of Emergency beyond two months. If it does not approve the Emergency stands revoked and normal methods of Government are restored.
- (10) Every order made by the President suspending the enforcement of Fundamental Rights is required to be laid before each House of Parliament.⁴²
- (11) The delegated legislation made and rules framed thereunder by the various Ministries must be approved by both Houses.

Appraisal of the Rajya Sabha. The Rajya Sabha was intended to be less powerful and influential than the Lok Sabha and it is obviously so because the Parliamentary system of Government demands it. The Constitution does not give to the Rajya Sabha specific powers to control the Executive. It, no doubt, has the right to seek information from the Government through the instrument of questions and supplementaries, and discuss and criticize its policy through debate or on motions of adjournment, but the Rajya Sabha cannot plague the Ministry. A defeat of the Government in the Rajya Sabha does not involve the resignation of the Council of Ministers. The Constitution recognizes and ordains the collective responsibility of the Council of Ministers to the Lok Sabha.

The Rajya Sabha has co-ordinate powers with the Lok Sabha in ordinary legislation only in theory. It cannot veto legislation; it only delays. If it rejects a Bill, or does not pass it within six months, or the Lok Sabha does not agree to the amendments made by it in the Bill, the President may summon both the Houses to meet in a joint sitting for the purpose of deliberating and voting on the Bill. The Lok Sabha, thus, can have its way because of its superior numerical strength. In financial matters, the Rajya Sabha is absolutely powerless. Money Bills can only originate in the Lok Sabha. The Constitution not only defines a Money Bill, but it also empowers the Speaker of the Lok Sabha to decide, if a question arises whether a Bill is a Money Bill or not, and the decision of the Speaker is final. Nor has the Rajya Sabha any effective financial powers. The Lok Sabha simply transmits a Money Bill to the Rajya Sabha for its recommendations and it is required to return such a Bill within fourteen days. If it does not return the Bill within fourteen days or returns it with recommendations which are not acceptable to the Lok Sabha, the will of the Lok Sabha prevails. Then, demands for grants are not submitted to the Rajya Sabha; sanctioning of public expenditure is the exclusive right of the Lok Sabha.

The Rajya Sabha does not even serve the purpose of a federal second Chamber. The well-accepted practice of a federal polity is to make the Upper Chamber representative of the constituent States and its constitution should be based upon the principle of equality of representation irrespective of the size and population of the federating units. The Rajya Sabha does not accord equal representation to the States. It is not, at the same time, the voice of the States and has no power to safeguard their interests. The justification for the Rajya Sabha, as Morris-Jones has rightly said, "has always been in terms of 'second thought' rather than 'states rights'."⁴³

It does not, however, mean that the Rajya Sabha occupies the same pitiable position as the French Council of Republic in the Fourth Republic. Nor is it like the Canadian Senate which is neither an effective brake to the hasty and ill-considered legislation nor it properly serves the purpose of a revisory chamber. The intention of the framers of the Constitution in creating an Upper Chamber was, as Gopalaswami Ayyangar said, "to hold dignified debates on important issues and to delay legislation which might be the outcome of passions of the moment." The Rajya Sabha has succeeded both ways. It significantly performs the function of influencing the Government and the people through its debates. Since it is smaller and less worried by the pressure of work, its debates are less frequently subject to strict control through time-limits. The House, accordingly, provides a calmer atmosphere in which speakers can debate controversial questions in a well-informed and objective manner. The debates are often outspoken and free because of the impossibility of overthrowing the Government by the adverse vote of the House. No Government, as Laski says, which is obliged to submit to criticism and to the need of explaining its actions and views can ignore the opinion expressed by men of matured judgment, experience and ability.

Then, the Rajya Sabha enjoys two exclusive functions. In the first place, it is empowered, under Article 249, to declare by resolution, passed by two-thirds majority of its members present and voting, that Parliament should make laws, in the national interest, with respect to a matter that is included in the State List. Secondly, by the same procedure, the Rajya Sabha is given power to create an All India Service whenever it is deemed necessary or expedient in the national interest.

Thirdly, the co-equal power of the Rajya Sabha on constitutional amendment is of great importance. The Lok Sabha by itself cannot amend the Constitution unless the Rajya Sabha, as a representative Chamber of the States, agrees to such a change.

Finally, if the Lok Sabha stands dissolved when the Proclamation of Emergency is issued, the Rajya Sabha alone determines whether Emergency should continue or not after the expiration of two months. Normal Government is restored, if it does not approve.

These specific provisions in the Constitution make the Rajya Sabha an integral part of the governmental machinery. It was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the Council should "play the humble role of an unimportant adviser, nor of an occasional check on hasty legislation," although it was not designed to vie with the representative Chamber of the people.

Relations between the two Houses. "It is the habit of institutions", writes Morris-Jones, "to give birth to loyalties, and when two institutions are placed side by side it is easy for clashes to occur and feelings to run high."⁴⁴ Independent India began with the working of a bicameral legislature only since the General Elections of 1952. "Nevertheless this short time has proved long enough", adds Morris-Jones, "to enable the development of almost bitter rivalry between the two Houses. That this happened so quickly and in spite of the dominating position of one party in both the Houses bears striking witness to the power of institutions to inspire fresh attachments of sympathy and devotion."⁴⁵ The Rajya Sabha is an indirectly elected Chamber with powers similar to the Lok Sabha, except in financial matters. The party composition and the social composition of both the Houses are also similar. The procedure, too, is not appreciably distinguishable. The Rajya Sabha has a regular Question Hour and the same Half-an-Hour Discussion procedure as in the Lok Sabha. The Government, too, had made an effort to introduce first in the Rajya Sabha an increasing number of Public Bills. The Rajya Sabha, thus, started its career on the same lines as the Lok Sabha. But being a Chamber primarily intended for reflection, it had the psychological realization of its inferiority and consequently it felt frustrated. It tried to get rid of its inferiority by claiming an equal status with the other House thereby provoking "the most violent reaction among some members of the Lower House."

The first major clash between the two Houses occurred during the Budget Session of 1953, when the Rajya Sabha refused to accept the position of subordination by not permitting the Law Minister, a member Minister of the Upper House, to appear before the Lok Sabha, on its call, to clear some misunderstanding that had arisen on the Income-Tax (Amendment) Bill, 1952. The Rajya Sabha passed a resolution "that this 44. Parliament in India, op. cit., p. 262.

45. Ibid., p. 256.

Council is of the opinion that the Leader of the Council (the Law Minister, Mr. Biswas) be directed not to present himself in any capacity whatsoever in the House of the People." Members of the Lok Sabha "angrily asserted that Ministers were responsible to the House and doubted the propriety of the Council's resolution." There would have been an open rupture if the tactful intervention of the Prime Minister had not saved the situation.

Soon there was another occasion for conflict. In January 1953, the Rules Committee of the Rajya Sabha sent its proposals with regard to the Public Accounts Committee to the Lok Sabha. It had suggested that the Rajya Sabha should have either a Public Accounts Committee of its own or 7 of its members might be added to the Public Accounts Committee of the Lok Sabha in order to make it a Joint Committee of the two Houses. The Public Accounts Committee passed a resolution saying that a joint committee of the two Houses or a separate Committee of the Rajya Sabha "would be against the principles underlying the Constitution," and consequently unacceptable. The Rules Committee of the Lok Sabha which considered the proposals agreed with the views of the Public Accounts Committee. The matter would have ended there, but the motion of the Prime Minister in the Lok Sabha "to recommend to the Council of the States that they nominate seven members to associate with the Public Accounts Committee of this House" brought the issue in the open. The motion of the Prime Minister did not envisage a Joint Public Accounts Committee of the two Houses, yet it caused a good deal of resentment and criticism in the Lok Sabha. It was on the assurances of the Prime Minister to the effect that the Committee would be a Committee of the Lok Sabha under the control of the Speaker and that the financial powers of the Lower House were in no way threatened that the motion was finally passed in December 1953, and the seven members of the Rajya Sabha joined the Public Accounts Committee in May 1954. Similar difficulties arose with regard to the Joint Committees and "somewhat sullenly" the Lok Sabha agreed to the proposal of the Rajya Sabha.

Chatterjee's incident engendered still more excitement and resentment. In a public speech N.C. Chatterjee, a member of the Lok Sabha, was reported to have said that "the Upper House, which is supposed to be a body of elders, seems to be behaving irresponsibly like a pack of urchins." The question of privileges was raised in the Rajya Sabha and the Chairman directed the Secretary to ascertain the facts. The Members of the Lok Sabha objected to the letter of the Secretary enquiring from Chatterjee whether the report was correct. The Speaker held that the letter was more "in the nature of a writ" and suggested that the reference of this particular issue, and the general problem of procedure in such cases be made to a joint meeting of the Privileges Committees of the two Houses. The Rajya Sabha agreed to it and the two Privileges Committees worked out an acceptable procedure for cases where a member of one House commits a breach of the privileges of the other.

Utility of the Rajya Sabha. These disputes brought into prominence the question of the utility of the Rajya Sabha. A Private Members Resolution was moved in the Lok Sabha in April 1954, demanding the early abolition of the Upper House. Some members of the Congress and the Leftists advanced the same familiar arguments characterising the Rajya Sabha as "a stronghold of reactionary elements" and "a device to flout the voice of the people." Some argued for its retention, but pleaded that its members should be chosen differently. The Government view was that the Rajya Sabha had not been given a fair trial and it was too early to pronounce judgment on its utility. Commenting on the relations of the two Houses of Parliament, Morris-Jones says, "What is certain is that peaceful co-existence is difficult if the two Houses continue to desire to perform the same functions. Moreover, if their roles are not soon distinguished, the tradition of rivalry will become established and the Council will continue to attract a large number of persons who would have even more readily found themselves in the House of the People. The practice of rivalry is a most wasteful exercise of political energies and one without even by-products of value. It can only serve to lower Parliament as a whole in public esteem."⁴⁶

Unless it is acceptably proved that democracy does not need a second Chamber, and more so a federation, it is not democratic to urge for its abolition. Institutions are always reluctant to vanish and it does not seem likely that public opinion could be made to agree to the liquidation of the Rajya Sabha. But enjoyment of identical powers by both the Houses means a sheer duplication and the advantages of such a system of legislature are questionable. Democracy has decidedly made the Lower House a predominant partner, and the Upper House is created to exercise a moderating influence and, as such, it may serve as a brake. But not too tight a brake which may lead to an open rupture between the two Houses. The intention of the framers of the Constitution was definitely clear and the Constitution itself is specific about it. Once this role is realized by the Rajya Sabha the causes of conflict are bound to disappear and each House will shine within its own allotted sphere of functions.

But there is one aspect against which the Rajya Sabha must guard itself. While welcoming the sixty-four new members of the Rajya Sabha on April 6, 1960, Vice-President Dr. Radhakrishnan called upon them to fight "inertia, obscurantism, reaction and superstition." These are the evils from which the Upper Chambers suffer in general and invite widespread criticism for their abolition. The Rajya Sabha, like the Canadian Senate, should not be allowed to become a political pensioner's home. Law-making is a specialised job; and a modicum of technical knowledge and a certain intellectual ability are essential even to understand the problems that confront Legislatures in our times. Perhaps, the criterion laid down in the Constitution for the President's nominations is a partial indication of what is expected of the Second Chamber. It is evident from the nominations so far made that to a great extent the intentions of the framers of the Constitution have not been realised. The ruling Party has not always consciously tried to fill the nominations with a corpus of special knowledge such as cannot be ensured in the Lower House.⁴⁷ Nor have the indirect

47. C.C. Desai (Swatantra) moved in the Lok Sabha a non-official Constitution Amendment Bill seeking to abolish nominations to the Rajya Sabha elections of the remaining members produced a body of "seasoned people", who may import in the debates "an amount of learning and importance", as the late Gopalaswamy Ayyangar argued in the Constituent Assembly. The political parties of India can do much to help the Rajya Sabha admirably play its role as a Second Chamber by sending to it members "whose party grading may be low but I. Q. is high." Morris-Jones points out three outstanding merits of the Council of States. He says, "it supplies additional political positions for which there is a demand, it provides some additional debating opportunities for which there is occasionally need, and it assists in the solution of the legislative timetable problems."⁴⁸

THE HOUSE OF THE PEOPLE (LOK SABHA)

The Lok Sabha. The Lok Sabha (House of the People) is the Lower House of Parliament and it resembles in many respects to the British House of Commons. Parliament in India, as in Britain, is not an institution. The British Parliament consists of the Monarch, the House of Lords and the House of Commons. All the three functionaries join together to complete the actions of Parliament. In India, Parliament consists of the President, the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha. The Head of the State, in both the countries, plays just a formal part in the process of legislation and that is the correct position under a Parliamentary system of Government, though the Indian Constitution invests the President with certain specific legislative powers. The legislative competence of the House of Lords with the passage of the Parliament Act of 1911 as amended by the Act of 1949, has become limited. The Rajya Sabha, too, has an insignificant role to play. The Lok Sabha, like the House of Commons, is the real centre of gravity, though it is the joint action of the President, the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha which law requires to make legislation possible.

The Lok Sabha has a maximum membership of 525; not more than 500 members from the States directly elected on adult franchise and not more than 25 members from the Union territories chosen in such manner as Parliament by law provides. The President may, if he is of the opinion that the Anglo-Indian community is not adequately represented, nominate two members of that community. Originally, such nominations were provided for ten years, but the Constitution (Eighth Amendment) Act extended the period to another ten years and it has once again been extended for and the Legislative Councils. Desai sought the amendment on the ground that these provisions (Articles 80 and 171) had been misused and had come in handy for the ruling parties to extend political patronage. P. Govinda Menon, Law Minister, who intervened in the debate, said that it would be prudent to leave these provisions alone so long as they did not prove injurious to the country's interests. He further said that any human institution was prone to lapses. It could even be said that an element of patronage was inherent in any system of nominations. But it was undeniable that many of the nominated members of the Upper Houses had made significant contributions to debate through the specialised knowledge.

another ten years, expiring in 1980. The actual number of members to each State is so allocated that the ratio between the number and population of the State, as determined in the last census, is, as far as practicable, the same for all States. The present strength, of the House⁴⁹ is 523, consisting of 496 members directly elected from the seventeen States and 24 members directly elected from the Union Territories besides one member nominated by the President to represent the North-East Frontier Agency and two members nominated by the President to represent Anglo-Indians. A candidate for membership of the House of the People (Lok Sabha) must be a citizen of India, not less than twenty-five years of age, and should possess such other qualifications as may be prescribed by Parliament by law.⁵⁰ No person can be a member of both Houses of Parliament simultaneously, nor may any person be simultaneously a member of Parliament and a member of the State Legislature.⁵¹ The Constitution (Sixteenth Amendment) Act, 1963, provides that any one, in order to qualify for election to Parliament, should make and subscribe an oath or affirmation that he would bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of India and uphold the sovereignty and integrity of India.

51. Article 101 (1) (2).

A person is disqualified to be chosen as, or remaining a member of either House (1) if he holds any office of profit under the Union or the State other than an office declared by Parliament or the State Legislature not to disqualify its holder,⁵² (2) if he is declared of unsound mind by a competent court, (3) if he is an undischarged insolvent, (4) if he is not a citizen of India, or has voluntarily acquired the citizenship of a foreign State, or is under acknowledgment of allegiance or adherence to a foreign State, and (5) if he is so disqualified by or under any law made by Parliament.

A member who has been absent without permission for sixty days may be disqualified to remain a member of the House and his seat declared vacant.⁵³

In pursuance of the powers granted under Article 327, to regulate matters of election, the Representation of the People's Act 1951 also lays down certain conditions for disqualification and these are applicable to members of State Legislatures too. The disqualifications are:

- (1) A member should not have been found guilty by a court or an Election Tribunal of Certain election offences or corrupt practices in election;
- (2) He should not have been convicted by a Court in India of any offence and sentenced to imprisonment for a period not less than two years;
- (3) He should not have failed to lodge an account of his election expenses within the time and in the manner prescribed;
- (4) He should not have been dismissed for corruption or disloyalty from Government service;
- (5) He should not be a Director or Managing Agent or hold an office of profit under any Corporation in which the Government has any financial interest; and
- (6) He should not have any interest in government contracts, execution of government work or service.

These disqualifications must not exist on the date fixed for filing the nomination papers of a candidate seeking election and on the date when the results are declared.

Duration of the House. The Lok Sabha has a life of five years unless sooner dissolved. But while a Proclamation of Emergency is in operation the life of the House may be extended by law of Parliament for a period not exceeding one year at a time and not extending in any case beyond a period of six months after the Proclamation has ceased to operate.⁵⁴

52. Article 102 (2) declares that Ministers of the Union Government and State Governments are not subject to disqualification. Parliament (Prevention of Disqualification) Act, 1950 declared that the office of a Minister of State, or a Deputy Minister or a Parliamentary Secretary or a Parliamentary Under-Secretary did not constitute disqualification. The immunity from disqualification was extended in 1951 to members of Commissions, Enquiry Committees, Boards or Corporations receiving payments or honoraria, provided all such payments did not exceed allowances and travelling expenses paid to them as members of Parliament. In 1954 the office of the Vice-Chancellors of Universities, Deputy Chief Whips of Parliament, offices held by officers in the National Cadet Corps and the Territorial Army were exempted from disqualification.

The Union Constitution Committee had recommended a term of four years for the House. The Drafting Committee, as already said, accepted the opinion of de Valera, and changed it into five years. The Draft Constitution in a footnote explained the justification for this change.⁵⁵ It said, "The Committee has inserted 'five years' instead of 'four years' as the life of the House of the People as it considers that under parliamentary system of government the first year of a Minister's term of office would generally be taken up in gaining knowledge of the work of administration and the last year would be taken up in preparing for the next general election, and there would thus be only two years for effective work which should be too short a period for planned administration."

The Speaker. The Lok Sabha elects its own Speaker from among its members to preside over its sittings and conduct the proceedings.⁵⁶ The Speaker vacates his office if he ceases to be a member of the House. He may at any time resign, or may be removed on a resolution passed by a majority of all the then members of the Lok Sabha. Fourteen days' notice for moving such a resolution is required to be given. The Speaker does not vacate his office on the dissolution of the Lok Sabha; he continues in office until immediately before the first meeting of the House after the dissolution. The Constitution also provides for the office of the Deputy Speaker and he performs the duties of the Speaker when the latter is absent or while the office of the Speaker is vacant. In Britain the Speaker is indispensable and without him the House cannot meet. On the death of Speaker Fitz Roy in 1943, for instance, the House of Commons rose at once and could not function until the election of his successor, although the country was in the midst of the Second World War. In India, on the other hand, the Constitution definitely provides that while the office of the Speaker is vacant the duties of the office shall be performed by the Deputy Speaker. And if the office of the Deputy Speaker, too, happens to be vacant, then, the duties of the office of the Speaker shall be performed by such member of the Lok Sabha, as the President may appoint for the purpose. When both the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker are absent from any sitting of the House such persons as may be determined by the Rules of Procedure of the House acts as Speaker. The Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business in Parliament, 1950, provide that "at the commencement of the Parliament or from time to time as the case may be, the Speaker nominates from amongst the members of Parliament a panel of not more than six Chairmen any one of whom may preside in the absence of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker when so required by the Speaker or in his absence the Deputy Speaker." If none of the Chairmen of the panel be available, the House may choose one of its members to act as Speaker. Neither the Speaker nor the Deputy Speaker is to preside at any sitting of the House while a resolution of his own removal is under consideration, although he is entitled to be present, speak and defend himself.

The Constitution gives to the Speaker only a casting vote to be exercised in the case of equality of votes.⁵⁷ This provision incorporates the British convention that the Speaker of the House of Commons does not vote except in case of a tie. But the British Speaker usually endeavours to give the casting vote in such a way that it does not make the decision final thereby extending to the House another opportunity to consider the question.

The Constitution of India further provides that the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker shall receive such salaries and allowances as may be determined by Parliament.⁵⁸ The salaries and allowances of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India.⁵⁹ The Speaker receives a salary of Rs. 3,000 a month and the Deputy Speaker Rs. 1,500 a month for the periods connected with the business of Parliament. There was a move to reduce the salary of the Speaker to Rs. 2,250 a month.

Position of the Speaker. The office of the Speaker is of much dignity, honour and authority. In the Order of Precedence he is placed seventh and is bracketed with the Chief Justice of India. Like the Speaker of the House of Commons in Britain, the Speaker of the Lok Sabha interprets the will of the House and speaks for it as well as to it. He is the custodian of the dignity of the House and an impartial arbiter in its proceedings. Speaking in the Constituent Assembly of India (Legislative), on March 8, 1948, on the occasion of the unveiling of the portrait of the late V.J. Patel, the Prime Minister observed, "Now, Sir, special ly on behalf of the Government, may I say that we would like the distinguished occupant of this Chair now and always to guard the freedom and liberties of the House from every possible danger, even from the danger of executive intrusion. There is always that danger—even from a National Government that it may choose to ride roughshod over others, that there is always a danger from a majority that it may choose to ride roughshod over the opinions of a minority, and it is there that the Speaker comes in to protect each single member, or each single group or a dominant Government....Vithalbhai Patel....laid the foundations of those traditions which have already grown up round the Chair....I hope that those traditions will continue, because the position of the Speaker is not an individual's position or an honour done to an individual. The Speaker represents the House. He represents the dignity of the House and because the House represents the nation, in a particular way, the Speaker becomes the symbol of the nation's liberty and freedom. Therefore, it is right that that should be an honoured position, a free position and should be occupied always by men of outstanding ability and impartiality."

In Britain it has come to be understood since the time of Shaw Lefevre that the Speakership is a strictly judicial office and wholly divorced ed from politics. Immediately after his election to the Chair the Speaker becomes a no-party man and abstains from any kind of political activity. The convention, therefore, is to elect him unanimously at the opening of each Parliament.⁶⁰ and he remains in office till the life of Parliament. If the Speaker of the preceding Parliament is still the member of the House, the convention is to elect him. It was another convention that the retiring Speaker was re-elected unopposed at the General Elections.⁶¹

Vithalbhai Patel may be regarded the first Speaker in India, though his official designation was the President of the Legislative Assembly, who laid the foundations of the office by following the British traditions. Immediately after his election to the Chair in 1925, he declared himself a no-party man and rigidly abstained from any kind of political activity. He had established such a firm reputation as a Speaker and his position was so unchallenged that "in spite of the many remarkable rulings he gave which were not to the liking of the Government of the day he was unanimously elected to the Chair both by the official and non-official members of the Assembly of that day."⁶² And when the urge to participate in the Civil Disobedience Movement of 1930 came, Patel resigned from his office. But the Congress was the first to violate the conventions associated with the office of the Speaker in Britain and so scrupulously observed by Vithalbhai Patel. Mohammed Yakub succeeded Patel, but he was there only for a session. Ibrahim Rahimtoola, who succeeded Yakub soon after his election to the Chair, resigned for reasons of health. Then, came Shanmukham Chetty. But at the next general elections Shanmukham Chetty was opposed and defeated by a Congress candidate. Since, then, the retiring Speakers have always been opposed in the General Elections and the Speakers themselves, till the election of Hukam Singh, retained their active party affiliations. N. Sanjiva Reddy, although had resigned from the Indian National Congress Party immediately after his election to Speakership in 1967, but he was nominated a Congress candidate for the Fourth Presidential election.

The Congress Working Committee in a resolution determined that the Speakers, both in the States as well as at the Centre, should keep back from Congress elections. But this decision of the Working Committee does not imply that they cannot remain members of the Congress Party. Babu Purshotamdas Tandon, when Speaker of the U.P. Legislative Assembly, unequivocally declared that India might not follow the example of Britain. Within the House, Tandon contended, the Speaker must remain a no-party man but outside the House he might maintain his party affilia-

60. A contest for the Speakership is possible. The Labour Party in 1951 did not object to the Conservative candidate for the office, but at the same time proposed that the former Deputy Speaker was most suitable a candidate because of his greater experience. Votes were, accordingly, taken and a Conservative candidate was elected.

61. In 1935 and again in 1945 the Labour Party contested the re-election of Conservative Speakers, Fitz Roy and Clifton Brown, though without any success. In 1950 no official Labour candidate opposed the Speaker. But an independent Labour candidate who ran against him was overwhelmingly defeated. Now the retiring Speaker is invariably opposed.

tions. This point was further made clear by G.V. Mavalankar, the Speaker of the Lok Sabha. Mavalankar maintained, "the Speaker in India is not today absolutely out of political arena as is the Speaker of the British House of Commons.... For the present, the Speaker must continue to be a politician though with very extensive limitations on his activities. He may continue to be a member of his party, but he should not take part in the affairs of the party, particularly in regard to matters which are likely to come before the House for discussion and decision. We have also considered it proper that he should not take sides in public controversies in respect of matters likely to come before the House. In short, he should not identify himself with any propaganda or express any opinions which are likely to embarrass his position as the presiding authority or are likely to create an impression that the Speaker is a partisan."

Mavalankar admitted that the logical corollary of the Speaker's position in Britain is that his seat is not contested in the general elections and he is elected Speaker so long as he wishes to be so elected, irrespective of his party affiliation.⁶³ But "with the present state of political consciousness of public life in India", Mavalankar added, "it is too much to expect that people with different ideologies will all respect the convention of not contesting the election of the Speaker, and it is this aspect which very seriously affects the adoption in toto of all British conventions in respect of the office of the Speaker."⁶⁴ Mavalankar considered the British precedent as an ideal to be reached in the course of time.⁶⁵

Mavalankar followed the middle course between the two schools of thought in India, the new school which urged that the impartiality in the Chair does not depend on the nature of the Speaker's outside activities and, accordingly, did not accept the British model of absolute severance from politics and the older orthodox school, which insisted on the adherence to the British model and emphasised that impartiality demanded sincere attempts to break previous political connections. With regard to Mavalankar's middle course, the Speaker may not be a partisan, yet

63. The Labour Party in England violated the century-old tradition in 1935 and 1945 by contesting the re-election of the Conservative Speakers. But the Labour candidates were defeated both the times and it appears that the electorate feels alive to its duty of re-electing the Speaker unopposed.

65. The Conference of the Presiding officers of Legislative bodies held at Trivandrum in July-August, 1951, passed the resolution: "The conference is of the opinion that it is desirable in the interests of the development of free democratic institutions in this country that following the practice of the British House of Commons a convention should be established to the effect that the seat from which the Speaker or the Chairman stands for election should not be contested.... The necessary corollary of the full establishment of this convention would be that the Speaker or Chairman would not take part in any party politics. The conference feels that such convention is a healthy one and its growth should be encouraged." Journal of Parliamentary Information, Vol. I, p. 141. The National Committee of the Samyukta Socialist Party decided on October 17, 1968 that the Party would not oppose, in any election, a Speaker who had immediately on an assumption of office renounced his party affiliation. It called on other political parties to follow suit. The Tribune, Ambala Cantt., October 19, 1968. Speakers N. Sanjiva Reddy in 1967 and Gurdial Singh Dhillon in 1969, resigned from the membership of the Indian National Congress immediately after their assumption of office.

he still remains a party man and is the choice of his party. And every party man has his own prejudices and the prejudices of a promoted politician are, indeed, very strong. The Chair, under such circumstances, cannot command that much reverence as it does in Britain for its impartiality. The result is the first motion of no-confidence moved against the Speaker on December 18, 1954. It was condemned by the Prime Minister as "vicious" and he described the Opposition responsible for it as "incompetent and frivolous." The motion was lost on a voice vote, but it had a lesson. It gave a setback to the dignity of the Chair and, as such, to the dignity of Parliament. Speaking in the Lok Sabha on the motion, the Prime Minister rightly observed that "it (motion of no-confidence) is a matter for this House, for each individual to consider regardless of party affiliations. Therefore, let us try to think of it not as a party issue but as members of this House, because this matter affects the Hon. Speaker, of course, but it affects the dignity of this House as Parliament, it affects the first citizen of the country, that is, the Speaker of this House."

There have, also, been instances, and now frequent, when the authority of the Chair has been questioned and his rulings contested. A typical case of flouting the Chair's direction happened on April 9, 1960, when the services of the Marshal of the House were requisitioned to bodily remove a Socialist member, Mr. Arjjun Singh Bhadauria. In August 1962, a Socialist Member flouted the authority of the Speaker and cast reflections on his impartiality. In December 1964, Dr. Ram Manohar Lohia was suspended from the House for disobeying the Chair. It has been repeated frequently since then. In fact, such ugly scenes, as disorderly defiance of Speaker's rulings, interruption by members by raising irrelevant points of order and staging a walk-out, have become now a common feature of the proceedings of Parliament and State Assemblies. Speaker Hukam Singh, addressing a conference of Presiding officers on October 29, 1966, stressed the need for finding a "permanent and lasting" solution to the problem of "repeated disorders" in Parliament and State Legislatures.⁶⁶ Satyanarayan Sinha, Union Minister for Parliamentary Affairs, called for a "pathological diagnosis" of the causes for disorderly scenes in India's Legislatures.⁶⁷

Powers and Functions of the Speaker. The powers of the Speaker of the Lok Sabha are more or less the same as those of the Speaker of the House of Commons in Britain. He speaks for the House and to the House and is, accordingly, the principal spokesman of the Lok Sabha and represents its collective voice. Messages on behalf of the House and to the House are sent or received with the authority of the Speaker. All Bills passed by the Lok Sabha are authenticated by his signatures before they are sent to the Rajya Sabha for its consideration or to the President for his assent. He receives all petitions, appeals, messages and documents addressed to the House and all orders of the House are executed through him.

67. Presidential Address delivered at the Fifth All-India Whips' Conference, Bangalore, January 3, 1966. The Hindustan Times, New Delhi, January 5, 1966.

The Speaker presides over the sittings of the House and conducts its proceedings. He decides who shall have the floor and all speeches and remarks are addressed to the Chair. He proposes and puts the necessary questions and announces the results. In consultation with the Leader of the House, the Speaker determines the order of the business, the time to be allotted for different kinds of business, and sees that it is taken up and finished according to the Time Allocation Orders. He is the final judge to decide on the admissibility of questions, resolutions and motions. He must also certify, under Article 110 of the Constitution, whether a Bill is a Money Bill or not. The Speaker does not vote except in the event of a tie.

The Speaker exercises his powers and functions partly under the Constitution and partly under the Rules of the Procedure of the House. The Speaker maintains perfect order and proper decorum in the House and has wide powers to check disorder, irrelevance and unparliamentary language or behaviour. If a member does not obey the orders of the Speaker, he may be asked to withdraw from the House or he may be suspended from attending the House for the remainder of the session, or to adjourn the House or suspend a sitting for a period. If the necessity arises, as it did on April 9, 1960, when Arjun Singh Bhaduria shouted at the top of his voice, "You send for your Marshal. I am not going to withdraw," the Socialist member was thereupon bodily lifted by the Marshal and two members of the Watch and Ward staff. If the Speaker is of the opinion that a word or words used in the debate are defamatory or indecent, or unparliamentary or undignified, he may, in his discretion, order that such word or words be expunged from the proceedings of the House. He accepts the closure of debates and is the guardian of the privileges of the House and protects the interests of the minorities. He also protects the House against the encroachments of the Government. When Ministers tend to encroach upon the rights of the members, or refuse to answer questions, or circumvent the answers, or do not give sufficient information, it is, then, to Mr. Speaker that the members appeal to safeguard and enforce their rights against the executive.

But the chief function, and an arduous one too, of the Speaker relates to the judicious conduct of debates. He fixes time-limit for speeches, and selects amendments to a Bill or a resolution to be discussed by the House. The Speaker is, in fact, the "Lord of the Debate." He must see that the debate centres on the main issue before the House and members do not wander, accidentally or deliberately, in the realm of irrelevance. Then, there are constant appeals to him for his rulings on the points of procedure. Here the Speaker interprets the law of Parliament. His ruling is final which need not be contested.⁶⁸ He also advises the members and the House on points not covered by the Rules of Procedure. He warns disorderly members and if any member persists in disorder the Speaker may order him to withdraw from the House for a day or part of a day.

68. In Britain Speaker's ruling is final and it has force of a precedent. These precedents are followed by successive Speakers until the Rules of Standing Orders are changed. In Australia a member may contest the ruling of the Speaker and when he does so the issue is considered immediately. If the Motion of dissent is duly seconded, it is debated. Canada follows Australia.

In the event of grave disorder he may adjourn or suspend the business of the House. He may even suspend a member of the House for gross disorderly behaviour.

The Speaker appoints Chairmen of all Committees of the House. "The Speaker", writes S.L. Shakhder, "is the supreme head of all Parliamentary Committees set up by him or by the House. He issues directions to the Chairmen in all matters relating to their working and the procedure to be followed. He guides them holding periodical consultations with the Chairmen and the members. The Speaker reads all reports of the Committees and keeps in touch with their activities. All difficulties and matters of importance are referred to him for guidance and advice."⁶⁹ He sees that any notice issued by a Committee or a minute of dissent of a member does not contain any words, phrases or expressions which are argumentative, unparliamentary, irrelevant, verbose or otherwise inappropriate. He may, accordingly, amend it, if deemed necessary, before circulation. The Speaker himself is the ex-officio Chairman of some of the Committees of the House such as the Business Advisory Committee, Rules Committee and the General Purposes Committee.

All communications between Parliament and the President take place through the Speaker. The Speaker signs all Bills in token of their having been passed by the Lok Sabha before they are sent to the Rajya Sabha or to the President.

The Lok Sabha has its own Secretariat and the conditions of service of persons appointed to the secretarial staff of either House of Parliament are regulated by Law of Parliament. The secretarial staff of the Lok Sabha functions directly under the control of the Speaker and is responsible to no other authority. The Speaker also controls the premises of the House and his authority within and without the House is undisputed. He regulates admission of "strangers" and press correspondents to the galleries and other precincts of the House. Visitors and press correspondents after their admission to the galleries are subject to the discipline and orders of the Speaker. In the event of breach of his orders he may punish them by stopping their admission either for a definite or indefinite period or, in serious circumstances, involving contempt of the House or its members or the committees, censure them or, in extreme cases, commit them to prison. "Summons to offenders are issued under his authority and it is sufficient for the courts if his orders merely state that the person is required to appear before the House on a charge of contempt of the House or a breach of privilege."

All matters not specifically provided in the rules and all questions relating to the detailed working of the rules have to be regulated in such a manner as the Speaker may from time to time direct.

FUNCTIONS OF THE LOK SABHA

Legislative Functions. The process of making laws is the business of Parliament as a whole, President, the Rajya Sabha and the Lok Sabha.

69. "Officers of Parliament." Lal, A.B. (Ed.), The Indian Parliament, p. 34.

The Lok Sabha can by itself do nothing, although the actual powers of the President and the Rajya Sabha are subject to limitations. A non-Money Bill may originate in any of the two Houses and it must be passed by both Houses if it has to become law. The Lok Sabha, unlike the British House of Commons,⁷⁰ has no means to overrule the Rajya Sabha. In case of disagreement between the two Houses or if more than six months elapse from the date of the receipt of the Bill by the other House without the Bill being passed by it, the President may summon a joint sitting of both the Houses. If at the joint sitting the Bill is passed by the majority of the total number of members of both Houses present and voting, it shall be deemed to have been passed by both Houses of Parliament.⁷¹ Here lies the supreme position of the Lok Sabha. The will of the Lok Sabha is bound to prevail at the joint sitting on account of its numerical strength.

Financial Functions. "Who holds the purse, holds the power," wrote Madison in the Federalist. It is through the control of the nation's purse that the Lok Sabha enjoys real supremacy over the Rajya Sabha. The Constitution provides that "A Money Bill shall not be introduced in the Council of States" (Rajya Sabha). It must originate in the Lok Sabha and when it is passed by the Lok Sabha it is transmitted to the Rajya Sabha for its recommendations. The Constitution further requires that the Rajya Sabha must return the Bill to the Lok Sabha with its recommendations within fourteen days from the date of the receipt of the Bill.⁷² If the Lok Sabha accepts any of the recommendations of the Rajya Sabha the Bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses of Parliament with those amendments.⁷³ If the Lok Sabha does not accept the recommendations of the Rajya Sabha, the Bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses of Parliament in the original form with which it began its career in the Lok Sabha.⁷⁴ If a Bill passed by the Lok Sabha and transmitted to the Rajya Sabha is not returned to the Lok Sabha within fourteen days, it is deemed to have been passed by both Houses of Parliament after the expiry of fourteen days in the form in which it was passed by the Lok Sabha.⁷⁵ The Rajya Sabha can, thus, only delay the enactment of the Money Bill and that, too, for a period of fourteen days. It is, accordingly, as much powerless as the House of Lords, though the latter can withhold its assent to a Money Bill for a month.

Then, demands for grants are not submitted to the Rajya Sabha. The sanctioning of expenditure is the exclusive privilege of the Lok Sabha.

Electoral Functions. The elected members of both Houses of Parliament form a part of the Electoral College for the election of the President.⁷⁶ The Lok Sabha here enjoys co-equal power with the Rajya Sabha.

The Vice-President of the Republic is also elected by the members of both Houses of Parliament assembled at a joint sitting.⁷⁷

Controlling the Executive. But the most important function of the Lok Sabha is that of controlling the Executive. The Constitution makes the Council of Ministers collectively responsible to the Lok Sabha⁷⁸ and the responsibility of the Council of Ministers to the Lok Sabha involves a constant control of the House over the Government; control and responsibility go together. Responsibility of Government means its resignation from office whenever the policy of Government proves fundamentally unacceptable to the Lok Sabha. An obligation, therefore, rests on the Lok Sabha to exercise a day-to-day scrutiny over the activities of the Government in such a way that fundamental disagreement between the Executive and the representatives of the people will be clear and manifest. If the actual and possible mistakes of the Government were not apparent the Government might become irresponsible. Control by the Lok Sabha prevents irresponsibility since the Ministers are constantly conscious of the fact that they will be called to account.

The Lok Sabha maintains its control in two ways. The first is the constant demand in the House for information about the actions of Government. The second is the criticism that is constantly aimed at the Government in the House. These two methods are closely related to each other and take various forms. The most effective instrument by which the Lok Sabha seeks information from the executive is the oral or written questions. Any member of the Lok Sabha may by following prescribed regulations, direct questions at Ministers and the Ministers at the beginning of the sitting of the House devote almost an hour to answering questions that have been put to them. The institution of asking questions is as highly developed in India as it is in Britain and is prominently distinguished from some of the Dominion countries, like Australia.⁷⁹ It is generally the most interesting part of the proceedings of the Lok Sabha and it provides the time when a member can make his mark and when Ministers, too, can make or mar their reputations. A member may also move for obtaining returns for supplying information on matters of public importance.⁸⁰ Information may, again, be obtained by the House regarding the administration by appointing Parliamentary Committees.

The Lok Sabha is also a debating assembly. "A society," writes Laski, "that is able to discuss does not need to fight; and the greater the capacity to maintain interest in discussion, the less degree there is of an inability to effect the compromises that maintain social peace."⁸¹ The most important function of the Opposition is to discuss and criticize matters of

79. Sir Anthony Eden, in his tour of Commonwealth, is said to have felt more at home in the Indian Parliament's Question Hour than he had been in the Australian Parliament. administration and policy-making and, thus, to make the Government to defend its intentions and practices. The best opportunity for the Opposition to criticize the governmental policy as a whole is when it debates the reply on the Address of the President to Parliament. Another opportunity is when public finance, more especially proposals for expenditure, is under discussion. At this stage the action of every individual Minister and his Ministry is under review. Demands for supplementary estimates similarly offer opportunity for criticism. It must, however, be said that there is no well-organised strong Opposition to create an effective stir in Government by its criticism.

In addition to these regularly scheduled debates, any member of the Lok Sabha may, after due notice and subject to the rules governing it, move a resolution expressing lack of confidence in the Council of Ministers. Motion for a vote of no-confidence is really a crucial occasion in the life of Government as it decides its fate. So long as a government can command a comfortable majority, it is not possible for such a motion to get through, still it creates embarrassments in the ranks of the Ministry and agitates public opinion.⁸² The most normal occasion for the criticism of the executive is debate on a motion of adjournment. A member may, during a sitting, move the adjournment of the House for discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance. If the Speaker admits the motion, then, a full debate on the issue is held.

There is another kind of adjournment motion and it may be called the emergency adjournment motion. It is intended to raise discussion on matters of urgent public importance for short duration and calling attention of the Government. No formal motion is allowed. What the Rules require is that a member wishing to raise a debate should give a notice to the Secretary of the Lok Sabha clearly and precisely specifying the matter to be discussed. The notice must be supported by at least two other members. If the Speaker admits the notice, he will fix a day, in consultation with the Leader of the House, for discussion. The duration of the debate does not exceed two and a half hours. What is important to note here is that even a Government which commands an overwhelming majority in the Lok Sabha cannot prevent the ventilation of an important grievance and the Constitution gives to every member freedom of speech in Parliament.⁸³ The Half an Hour Discussions on matters arising out of questions, also, afford opportunities for ventilating grievances. Other opportunities for raising debates include moving the resolutions and 'No-Day-Yet-Named' motions.

Constituent Functions. The Lok Sabha together with the Rajya Sabha has the power to amend the Constitution. A Bill to amend the Constitution may originate in either House and it must be passed by each

82. Not infrequently the Opposition behaves irresponsibly as it happened on the motion of no confidence against the Government in November 1968. The liberty to oppose the Government was fully exercised by the Opposition parties, but when the turn came for the leader of the Government (Prime Minister) to reply, she was ruthlessly shouted down. This is really tantamount to destroying the values of Parliamentary government.

83. Article 105.

House of Parliament by a majority of its total membership as well as by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting. The Constitution, as said before, does not prescribe the method of resolving differences between the two Houses over a proposed amendment of the Constitution. The Supreme Court held in Shankari Prasad v. Union of India that the procedure required for amending the Constitution is a legislative procedure. It has now, therefore, become definite that in case of disagreement between the Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha over a Constitution amendment Bill the President may summon a joint sitting of both the Houses as provided in Article 108. Here, too, the Rajya Sabha pales into insignificance as its membership is one-third of the whole. The will of the Lok Sabha must necessarily prevail at a joint sitting.

Miscellaneous Functions. Parliament has the power to move for the removal of judges of the Supreme Court and of the High Courts on the ground of proved misbehaviour and incapacity and the address for such a removal must be passed by a two-thirds majority in each House.⁸⁴ Similarly, both Houses consider a resolution for the removal of the Chief Election Commissioner, Comptroller and Auditor-General, and members of the Public Service Commission. Either of the two Houses can prefer a charge for the Impeachment of the President. If the charge is preferred by the Lok Sabha the Rajya Sabha investigates the charge or causes it to be investigated. If the Rajya Sabha prefers the charge, then, the Lok Sabha investigates it or causes it to be investigated. The impeachment succeeds when the House investigating the charge passes a resolution that the charge has been sustained.⁸⁵ The resolution passed by the Rajya Sabha for the removal of the Vice-President must be agreed to by the Lok Sabha.⁸⁶ But no resolution for the removal of the Vice-President can be moved in the Lok Sabha. The approval of the Lok Sabha, along with that of the Rajya Sabha, is necessary for the continuance of the various Proclamations of Emergency issued by the President. The Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha act in an Emergency in setting up Martial Law Courts for dealing with offences committed by civilians, indemnify officers for acts done in good faith and validate punishments awarded during the continuance of Emergency. Rules and Regulations framed by the various Departments of the Government under the power of delegated legislation are approved by both Houses. The reports of the Union Public Service Commission, the Comptroller and Auditor-General, the Scheduled Castes and Tribes Commission and the Finance Commission are presented to both Houses for their consideration. If the Government makes a proposal to take an appointment out from the purview of the Union Public Service Commission, both the Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha must agree to its exclusion.

LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE

Legislative Procedure. The Constitution does not prescribe any detailed procedure for Bills passed by the two Houses of Parliament. It 84. Article 124 (3) and Article 217 (1) (b).

85. Article 61.

86. Article 67.

merely says that a Bill, other than a Money or Financial Bill, may originate in either House of Parliament, and a Bill shall not be deemed to have been passed by Houses of Parliament unless it has been agreed to by both Houses, either without amendment or with such amendments only as are agreed to by both Houses. A Bill pending in either House does not lapse if Parliament is prorogued. The dissolution of the Lok Sabha causes the lapse of any Bill which is pending in it or which has been passed by that House but is pending in the Rajya Sabha. But a Bill which originated in the Rajya Sabha and is still pending there does not lapse on account of dissolution. When the President notifies his intention to summon a joint sitting of both Houses of Parliament a subsequent dissolution of the Lok Sabha does not cause the Bill to lapse.

The rest is covered by the Rules made by Parliament. These rules prescribe an identical procedure in both Houses. A legislative Bill is required to be read three times in each House before it can be deemed to have been passed by both Houses of Parliament. An ordinary legislation measure may be introduced either by a Minister or by a private member. In the former case, it is known as a Government Bill and in the latter case it is known as a Private Member's Bill. In India, unlike Britain, there is nothing of the nature of a Private Bill. A Private Bill in Britain effects particular local or private interest or benefit of person or persons and, as such, is distinguished from a Public Bill, which effects the public uniformly as a whole or a large part of it. A Private Bill is passed by a special procedure distinct from a Public Bill.

In India, a Government Bill and a Private Member's Bill undergo an identical procedure, although we deal with the two classes of Bills separately for purposes of clarity. Government Bills are the more important and we take them first.

First Reading. The first reading covers the introduction of the Bill and its publication in the Gazette of India. On the appointed day, the Minister or the member-in-charge⁸⁷ of the Bill moves the motion for leave to introduce the Bill and reads out its title. Unlike the House of Commons there is no practice in India of introducing a "Dummy Bill." A Bill must be complete by itself, accompanied by a statement of objects and reasons together with a memorandum showing separately the recurring and non-recurring expenditure involved thereto, and the sanction of the President, if it is necessary.

The motion for leave to introduce the Bill is a formal business. By convention, no debate takes place at this stage and the Speaker immediately puts the question to obtain the decision of the House. The House generally grants leave by voice.

Sometimes a motion for leave to introduce a Bill is opposed, as it happened in the case of Preventive Detention (Amendment) Bill, 1954. The Rules of Procedure, in such a case, lay down that "if a motion for leave to introduce a Bill is opposed, the Speaker, after permitting, if he thinks fit, a brief explanatory statement from the member who moves and from the member who opposes the motion, may, without further debate, put the question: provided that where a motion is opposed on the ground that the Bill initiates legislation outside the legislative competence of the House, the Speaker may permit a full discussion thereon". If the motion for leave to introduce a Bill is opposed, the Speaker may allow the mover and the member opposing it to make explanatory statements. The question is, then, put. If the motion is opposed on the ground that the Bill initiates legislation outside the legislative competence of the House, the Speaker may permit a full discussion and obtain the decision of the House. The Attorney-General may also participate in the discussion and clarify the position.

After leave to introduce the Bill has been given, it is immediately published in the Gazette of India and ready for the second stage. The Speaker may allow the publication of the Bill in the Gazette of India upon request from a member initiating the Bill even before the motion for leave to introduce the Bill has been made. In such a case it does not remain necessary to ask for leave of the House to introduce the Bill and if the Bill is afterwards introduced it is not necessary to publish it again.

Second Reading. The second reading consists of consideration of the Bill which can be divided into two stages. After the Bill has been introduced and its copies have been made available to all the members for their use, the member-in-charge of the Bill may move that the Bill may be taken into consideration by the House at once or on some future date specified in the motion or that it be referred to a Select Committee of the House, or to a Joint Committee of the Houses, or that it be circulated for eliciting public opinion. Immediate consideration of the Bill is very rare unless it happens to be an urgent and a non-controversial measure. Reference to a Select Committee is the normal procedure. A motion for reference to a Joint Committee after being carried in the originating House is transmitted to the other House for its concurrence. Bills relating to social matters or any matter which is new in the life of the nation and is likely to arouse a good deal of controversy, are usually circulated for eliciting public opinion. After a motion for eliciting public opinion has been carried, the Secretariat of the House concerned addresses the State Governments asking them to publish the Bill in the State Gazette and give it a wide publicity in order to invite opinions from local bodies, recognised associations or other individuals or associations concerned with the provisions of the Bill. The State Governments collect all such material and transmit it to the Secretariat of the House. The Secretariat collects the various opinions, makes a precis and issues them as papers to the Bill which are circulated to the members of the House.

When one of the motions, referred to above, has been made, then, either on the same day or any other subsequent day the main principles underlying the Bill are discussed. The member-in-charge of the Bill explains, elaborates and elucidates what the proposed measure will do and how the necessity of such a measure is important and urgent. So will do other supporters of the Bill. The members opposing it criticize and attack the Bill. It should, however, be noted that this is not the time for detailed discussion or amendments and vote upon the clauses. It is the Bill as a whole which is discussed and amendments are proposed not to the Bill but to the motion for its immediate consideration, or circulation for eliciting public opinion, or reference to a Select Committee or to a Joint Committee. After a debate on the main motion and any amendments thereto, it is put to the vote of the House. If the motion is carried to refer the Bill to a Select Committee or a Joint Committee, it is ripe for its consideration.

Reference to a Committee. When the motion that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee of the House is moved, the member-in-charge of the Bill indicates the names of the members who would compose the Committee, as also the date by which the report of the Select Committee should be submitted to the House. The mover ascertains from the members in anticipation their willingness to serve on the Committee and includes only those who agree to be included. The Speaker appoints the Chairman of the Committee from amongst its members. Where a Deputy Speaker is one of the members of the Committee, he automatically becomes its Chairman. In case it is moved that the Bill be referred to a Joint Committee, the member-in-charge indicates the number and names of the members constituting the Committee from the House as also the number of the members from the other House. The proportion of members from the Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha is 2:1. The motion also indicates the quorum necessary for a meeting of the Joint Committee, the Rules of Procedure to be applied for the Conduct of its Business and a request to the other House to concur to the appointment of a Joint Committee and communicate the names of its members to be appointed to the Committee. In the case of a Select Committee, the quorum is one-third of the total number of its members. A member who is not a member of the Committee may attend its meetings, but may not take part in its deliberation. A Minister, however, who is not a member of the Select Committee may, with the permission of the Chairman, address the Committee on any point under its consideration. The Chairman of the Committee has a casting vote.

A Select Committee may appoint a Sub-Committee of its own for special consideration on a point or points involved in the Bill. The report of the Sub-Committee is considered by the whole Select Committee. The Committee may hold its meetings whenever it deems desirable no matter whether the House is sitting or not. The meetings are informal and are held in private. One of the officers of the Secretariat of the House nominated by the Secretary of the House, acts as Secretary of the Committee. The Minister concerned, with officers of his Ministry, is present at the meetings of the Committee to explain any point and to furnish any information which may be required.

The Committee examines the Bill thoroughly and in details; first there is a general discussion on the Bill, and, then, there is a clause by clause discussion. Members are required to give notices of amendments a day in advance unless the Chairman waives it out and allows an amendment to be moved. The Committee has the power to summon any person to appear and give evidence and produce any papers or documents relevant to the issues involved in the Bill. It may ask for the production of any paper or document or record which it deems essential for the discharge of its duties. But the Rules permit Government to decline to the production of any paper, document or record if it thinks that its production is not in the interest of the State or is prejudicial to its safety. The Committee may also hear experts or the representatives of special interests likely to be affected by the proposed measure. After hearing all such persons and the examination of the information supplied to it, the Committee comes to its own conclusion "as to whether the clause as it stands is adequate or covers the intention clearly. If in its opinion the wording is defective or the intention is not clearly expressed or the language is ambiguous in some material respects, the Committee proposes amendments or a revision of the clause." But the Committee cannot propose any amendment or revision which defeats the purpose of the Bill. All amendments and revisions proposed by the Committee must be in conformity with the principles of the Bill to which the House has already agreed. The function of the Committee is to "see that the provisions of the Bill bring out the intention behind the principles clearly; that there is no procedural defect in its working, that it does not offend provisions of the existing law and the object proposed to be achieved is adequately brought out." Herein ends the first stage in the Second Reading of the Bill.

Report of the Committee. After the individual clauses have been examined and discussed and all the schedules, etc., thereto, the Select Committee prepares its reports. It consists of two parts: the first is explanatory and contains the points which the Committee considers should be incorporated in the Bill or the reasons for amending, modifying or recasting any of the clauses, and the second part consists of the Bill as amended by the Select Committee. The decisions are arrived at by the majority of the members present and voting. Members dissenting may append minutes of dissent with their explanations. The Committee usually submits its report to the House within the time laid down in the motion for reference of the Bill to the Committee. If it cannot complete its labours within the given time, a request is made to the House for extension. If no time is fixed in the original motion, the Rules provide that the Committee must report to the House within three months from the date on which the House adopted the motion for reference of the Bill to the Select Committee.

The Chairman of the Select Committee or any member authorized by the Select Committee presents the Report to the House. While presenting the Report, the Chairman or the member may make any remarks, but he must confine himself to a brief statement of facts. There can be no debate. After the Report has been presented and its copies circulated amongst the members, the member-in-charge of the Bill may move that the Bill as reported by the Select Committee may now be taken into consideration or that the Bill as reported may be recommitted to the Select Committee or to a different Committee with or without instructions or that the Bill as reported be circulated or recirculated for eliciting public opinion or further opinion thereon. If the House agrees to consider the Bill as reported by the Select Committee, it enters into the second stage of the Second Reading when the Bill is discussed clause by clause. Discussion takes place on each clause of the Bill and amendments to clauses are moved. Members are required to give notice of amendments one day before the day on which a particular clause is to be taken up for consideration. The Speaker determines the admissibility of amendments and selects therefrom amendments to be discussed. Each amendment and each clause is put to the vote of the House. Sometimes for convenience and in order to save time clauses are put en bloc, unless any member desires to speak on any particular clause. The amendments form a part of the Bill if they are accepted by a majority of members present and voting. The consideration of the Preamble is postponed until after the clauses have been considered to enable its amendment in consequence of amendments in the clauses. Consideration of particular clauses also can be postponed if deemed convenient. After the clauses, schedules, enacting formula and Short Title of the Bill have been put to vote and disposed of, the Second Reading of the Bill is over.

Third Reading. Thereafter the member-in-charge of the Bill makes a motion that the Bill as settled in the House be passed. The debate on such a motion is known as the third reading, although no motion in terms that the Bill be read a third time is made. The debate on the third reading of a Bill is of restricted character. It is restricted to the matter contained in the Bill. The Rules provide that the discussion must be confined to submission of arguments either in support or rejection of the Bill. The details of the Bill cannot be referred to further than is necessary for the purpose of such arguments which should be of a general nature. No amendment may be moved which is not formal or verbal or consequential upon any amendment having been made to the Bill during the consideration stage. The motion is then put and voted upon. If majority of the members present and voting support it, the Bill is deemed to have been passed by the House of its origin.

Bill becomes Law. The Bill is, then, transmitted to the other House for its concurrence. A message from the originating House signed either by the Presiding Officer or the Secretary is sent to the other House. The message is read in the House and copies of the Bill are laid on the table. Thereafter, any Minister may give notice that the Bill be taken into consideration. The subsequent procedure of discussion and amendment is the same as in the originating House. After the Bill is passed by the receiving House it is sent back to the originating House with amendments, if any. If the receiving House passes the Bill in the same form in which it came from the House of its origin, it is presented to the President for his assent. The President may give his assent thereto, or withhold it, or return it for reconsideration of the Houses, with or without a message suggesting amendments. But if the Bill is passed again by both Houses of Parliament, with or without amendments, the President must give his assent thereto. A Bill, thus, becomes law.

Disputed Bill and Joint Sittings. If a Bill passed by and transmitted from one House is amended by the other House, the Bill as amended is sent back to the originating House. If the originating House does not agree to the amendment or amendments or makes further amendments to which the other House does not agree, the President may summon a joint session of the two Houses. The Speaker of the Lok Sabha or in his absence the Deputy Speaker presides and the Rules of the Lok Sabha are made applicable at a joint sitting. Amendments can be moved at a joint sitting, but only such amendments are admissible which have been made necessary by the delay in the passage of the Bill, or may arise out of amendments, if any, proposed by one House and rejected by the other. The decision of the Presiding Officer with regard to the admissibility of amendments is final. The Bill is deemed to have been passed by both the Houses if the majority of the members present and voting at a joint sitting agree to it.

A joint session may also be summoned if a Bill passed by one House is rejected by the other, or if more than six months elapse from the date of the reception of the Bill by the other House without the Bill being passed by it.

Private Members' Bills. Since 1953, the last two and a half hours of the Friday sittings are normally allotted for the transaction of Private Members' Business. Private Members' Business consists of Resolutions and Bills. The Speaker decides which of the two is to be dealt with on a particular Friday. In practice, it means that every alternate Friday is made available for Private Members' Bill, the other Friday being devoted to Private Members' Resolutions.

The procedure in the case of Private Members' Bills is the same as for Government Bills, except for some special features. The notice for leave to introduce a Bill must be accompanied with the statement of objects and reasons, the recommendation and sanction of the President required for the introduction or consideration of the Bill, memoranda showing the financial effect of the Bill, etc. A notice may be disallowed, if it is not complete in any respect or the Bill is otherwise defective. The Speaker has the inherent power to disallow notice of a Bill, if he thinks that it is not proper to include it in the List of Business. There is a Committee on Private Members' Bills and Resolutions consisting of not more than 15 members nominated by the Speaker for one year. The Chairman is appointed by the Speaker from amongst the members of the Committee. If the Deputy Speaker happens to be a member of the Committee, he is appointed Chairman automatically. The functions of the Committee are:

(1) To examine every Bill seeking to amend the Constitution before a motion for leave to introduce the Bill is included in the List of Business. The Committee since its inception has taken this matter very seriously and laid down certain principles. One of these states that "the Constitution should be considered as a sacred document—a document which should not be lightly interfered with and should be amended only when it is found absolutely necessary to do so....Such amendments should normally be brought by Government."

(2) To examine all Private Members' Bills after they have been introduced and before they are taken up for consideration in the House and to classify them according to their nature, urgency and importance into two categories, Category A and Category B. Bills in Category A have precedence over the Bills in Category B.

(3) To recommend the time that should be allocated for the discussion of the stage or stages of Private Members' Bill and also to indicate the different hours at which the various stages of the Bill in a day shall be completed.

(4) To examine every Private Member's Bill which is opposed in the House on the ground that the Bill initiates legislation not within the legislative competence of the House. The Speaker considers such objection prima facie tenable.

(5) To recommend time-limit for the discussion of Private Members' Resolutions and other ancillary matters.

FINANCIAL LEGISLATION

Financial Procedure. The principles involved in the financial procedure of the Indian Parliament are essentially the same as those of the British Parliament. In the first place, financial initiative in both the countries is the exclusive right of the Government. Secondly, the Lok Sabha in India, like the British House of Commons, has the exclusive right to vote supplies and to sanction the levy of taxes and imports. Finally, in both the countries, taxation and appropriation and expenditure from public funds need legislative authorization.

Money Bills. The Constitution provides for a special procedure in regard to Money Bills. A Money Bill may not be introduced in the Rajya Sabha and it cannot be introduced without the recommendation of the President. When it is passed in the Lok Sabha, it is transmitted to the Rajya Sabha, with the Speaker's certificate that it is a Money Bill and the decision of the Speaker on this point is final. The Rajya Sabha cannot reject a Money Bill, but it may, within fourteen days of its receipt, return it to the Lok Sabha with its recommendations. The Lok Sabha may either accept or reject all or any of the recommendations of the Rajya Sabha. If the Lok Sabha accepts any of them, the Money Bill shall be deemed to have been passed by both Houses with those amendments. If the Lok Sabha does not accept any of the recommendations of the Rajya Sabha, the Money Bill shall be deemed to have been passed by both Houses in the form in which it was passed by the Lok Sabha. If the Bill is not returned to the Lok Sabha within fourteen days, it shall be deemed to have been passed by both Houses at the expiration of the stipulated period in the form in which it was passed by the Lok Sabha. When it is presented to the President for assent the provision by which the President may return the Bill to the Houses for reconsideration does not apply.

A Money Bill cannot be introduced or moved except on the recommendation of the President. According to Article 110 a Bill is deemed to be a Money Bill if it contains only provisions dealing with all or any of the following matters:

- (a) the imposition, abolition, remission, alteration or regulation of any tax;
- (b) the regulation of the borrowing of money or the giving of any guarantee by the Government of India, or the amendment of the Law with respect to any financial obligations undertaken by the Government of India;

- (c) the custody of the Consolidated Fund⁸⁸ or the Contingency Fund of India,⁸⁹ the payment of moneys into or the withdrawal of money from any such fund;
- (d) the appropriation of moneys out of the Consolidated Fund of India;
- (e) the declaring of any expenditure to be expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund of India or the increasing of the amount of any such expenditure;
- (f) the receipt of money on account of the Consolidated Fund of India or the Public Accounts of India or the custody or the issue of such money or the audit of the accounts of the Union or of a State; or
- (g) any matter incidental to any matter referred to above from (a) to (f)."

The use of the word "only" at the beginning of the definition of a Money Bill is significant. The Constitution prescribes two conditions for a Bill to be regarded a Money Bill. Firstly, it must deal with all or any matters contained in Article 110(i). Secondly, the provisions of the Bill must only deal with such matters and not with any other matter. It is, therefore, not possible to enact as a Money Bill anything which changes the law in other respects. It must be a Money Bill, pure and simple. A Bill which imposes fines, penalties, or licence fees, or deals with taxes imposed by the local authorities is neither a Money Bill nor a Financial Bill.⁹⁰ A Money Bill when it is presented to the President of India for his assent must be accompanied by a certificate of the Speaker that it is a Money Bill. The President shall not withhold his assent from a Money Bill passed by Parliament. It is in pursuance of the supremacy of Parliament in the matter of finance.

It is necessary to distinguish Money Bills from Financial Bills. Money Bills are those which are defined in Article 110 as referred to above. Financial Bills are other Bills containing financial provisions but to which the provisions of Article 110 are not applicable. Financial Bills also cannot be introduced without the recommendation of the President, and must not be introduced in the Rajya Sabha. Whereas a Money Bill is transmitted to the Rajya Sabha for its consideration and recommendation alone and it has no right to amend it, a Financial Bill can be amended by the Rajya Sabha. It rests with the Speaker of the Lok Sabha to determine whether a Bill is a Money Bill or not. The Rajya Sabha has no right to question to the certificate subscribed by the Speaker that the Bill is a Money Bill.

88. All funds received by the Government of India form the 'Consolidated Fund of India' from which alone the Government withdraws money for its expenditure and repayment of debts.

89. A reserve fund called the 'Contingency Fund of India' is placed at the disposal of the Government to meet the unforeseen requirements exceeding the authorized expenditure. The fund facilitates advances subject to subsequent regularization. It is, in brief, grant in advance pending completion of the regular procedure.

90. Articles 110 (2) and 117.

The Budget. The Constitution has adopted the fundamental principles governing the British financial system, that is, parliamentary control over the receipt and expenditure of public money. These principles are:

- (1) no tax can be imposed except with the authority of Parliament;
- (2) no expenditure can be incurred except with the sanction of Parliament;
- (3) no tax can be imposed or expenditure incurred unless asked for by the Executive. It means that financial initiative rests alone with the Executive;
- (4) all expenditure except that specifically charged by any enactment of Parliament requires to be sanctioned on an annual basis. This is called the principle of annuality.

The expenditure for any financial year, the period between April 1, and March 31, must, therefore, be sanctioned either totally or in part by Parliament before the expiry of the previous financial year. That is to say, the Annual Financial Statement or the Budget must be passed whether totally or in part before March 31 of each year. The Budget is ordinarily presented to Parliament in the month of February each year in two parts—the Railway Budget and the General Budget. The Railway Budget exclusively deals with the receipts and the expenditure relating to Railways and it is separately presented by the Minister for Railways. The General Budget deals with estimates of all the Departments of the Government of India excluding Railways and is presented by the Finance Minister. The procedure in case of the Railway Budget and the General Budget is the same.

The Budget or the Annual Financial Statement, as the Constitution names it, must show separately the expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund of India and the sums required to meet other expenditure proposed to be made from the Consolidated Fund of India. It must also distinguish expenditure on revenue account from other expenditure.⁹¹ The expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund of India comprises:

- (a) the emoluments and allowances of the President and other expenditure relating to his office;
- (b) the salaries and allowances of the Chairman and the Deputy Chairman of the Rajya Sabha and the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker of the Lok Sabha;
- (c) debt charges for which the Government of India is liable including interest, sinking fund charges and redemption charges and other expenditure relating to the raising of loans and the service and redemption of debt;
- (d)
 - (i) the salaries, allowances and pensions payable to or in respect of judges of the Supreme Court,
 - (ii) the pensions payable to or in respect of the Federal Court,
 - (iii) the pensions payable to or in respect of judges of any

91. Article 112 (2).

High Court which exercises jurisdiction in relation to any area included in the territory of India or which at any time before the commencement of the present Constitution exercised jurisdiction in relation to any area included in a Province corresponding to a State specified in Part A of the first Schedule;

- (e) the salary, allowances and pension payable to or in respect of the Comptroller and Auditor-General of India;
- (f) any sums required to satisfy any judgment, decree or award of any Court or arbitration tribunal;
- (g) any other expenditure declared by the Constitution or by Parliament by law to be so charged.

The expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund of India is not submitted to the vote of Parliament, but either House of Parliament can discuss it. It is non-votable. The other expenditure is submitted in the form of demand for grants to the Lok Sabha. The Lok Sabha may assent, or refuse to assent to any demand, or assent to any demand subject to a reduction of the amount specified therein. It is votable, but no demand for grant can be made except on the recommendation of the President.⁹²

Stages in Financial Legislation. The Annual Financial Statement or the Budget has to pass through five stages: (1) Introduction or presentation; (2) General discussion; (3) Voting of demands; (4) Consideration and passing of the Appropriation Bill, and (5) Consideration and passing of the taxation proposals; the Finance Bill.

- (1) Introduction or Presentation of the Budget. The Budget session of Parliament generally commences in mid-February when the Railway Minister introduces the Railway Budget and subsequently the Finance Minister introduces the Financial Statement in the Lok Sabha. It is accompanied by the Budget Speech made by the Finance Minister. It is an important event as it unfolds the fiscal and economic policy of the Government for the ensuing year. The copies of the Budget together with the Explanatory Memorandum are printed and circulated among members for their reference. The Budget contains the estimates of receipt and expenditure. The Explanatory Memorandum contains a comparative statement of such receipts and expenditure for the current year and the next year and reasons for any increase or decrease in the amounts. The Memorandum also furnishes other information relating to estimates.
- (2) The general discussion. After the Budget has been presented, money has to be asked for as Demands for Grants. Here the Budget is dealt within two stages—a general discussion, and the demand for specific grants. A general discussion of the Budget as a whole is spread over to three or four days. It is customary for the leaders of the Opposition to initiate the discussion. No discussion of details or cut motions are in order at this stage. It is a general discussion which covers all items of expenditure including those that are 'charged' and are excluded from vote. The discussion relates to policy of the Government involving a review and criticism of the administration of the various Departments and the general problems connected with the nation's finances and the principles involved in the Budget proposals. Following the British practice, the major part of the time for the Budget discussion is allowed to the Opposition to review the work of the Government for the year and ventilate grievances of the people. The discussion is political rather than financial. No vote is taken during the general discussion. But the Finance Minister has the right to reply at the end of the discussion.

- (3) Voting of demands by the Lok Sabha. With the general discussion the work of the Rajya Sabha is complete so far as the Annual Financial Statement is concerned. But the Lok Sabha, after general discussion is over, proceeds to the voting of demands not charged on the Consolidated Fund of India. The voting of demands is the exclusive privilege of the Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha has no share in it. Lok Sabha has the following powers in respect of each demand: (i) to assent to the demand; or (ii) to refuse it; or (iii) to reduce it. The House has no power to increase a demand, or to alter the destination of a grant, or to put any condition as to the appropriation of the grant.

The time for debates on the estimates is determined by the Speaker in consultation with the Leader of the House. Reports of the activities of the different Ministries during the preceding year are circulated among the members for their references. When the demand for grant of a Ministry is moved it comes under scrutiny and the debate, which usually extends to not more than two days, rivets round the working of the Ministry and its administrative policy. But the real debate takes place when amendments are proposed either for the reduction of the amount demanded or for the omission or reduction of any item in any grant.

The voting on the demands must conclude on the fixed day when closure is applied and all outstanding demands are put to vote and disposed of, no matter whether they have been discussed or not.

- (4) The Appropriation Bill. The next stage is the Annual Appropriation Bill which must be passed into a statute. All the demands voted by the Lok Sabha and the expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund are put together and incorporated in a Bill called the Annual Appropriation Bill. The allotment of time for the different stages of the Bill is determined by the Speaker and debate on the second reading of the Bill is general. When the Bill is moved for consideration, debate is resstricted to those points only which have not been discussed during the debates on estimates. Amendments may be moved for reduction in the expenditure alone. No amendments to the grant as voted by the House previously, or altering its destination or varying the amount charged on the Consolidated Fund are admissible.

The Appropriation Bill having passed through all the stages is finally voted upon and if passed by the Lok Sabha, it is certified by the Speaker as Money Bill and transmitted to the Rajya Sabha. The Rajya Sabha must return it to the Lok Sabha with its recommendations, within fourteen days. It is for the Lok Sabha to accept or reject these recommendations, if any. The assent of the President to the Appropriation Bill is just a matter of formality. He cannot return a Money Bill for reconsideration.

An Appropriation Act embodies the authority given by the House, with the assent of the President, to Government to spend money as authorized in the Act. Without such an authority the Government cannot incur any expenditure. The Comptroller and Auditor-General of India would hold a payment illegal and unauthorized if it were made without authorization in the Appropriation Act. If the Government subsequently finds that the money granted under any head is insufficient for its needs, it again comes to the House for a supplementary grant. The supplementary grants are embodied in one or more Appropriation Bills which must be passed by the House before the end of the financial year.

- (5) The Finance Bill. The Finance Bill incorporates the financial proposals of the Government for the ensuing year and is presented to Parliament at the same time as the Budget. The procedure followed is that of a Money Bill. The discussion of the Finance Bill in the second reading is confined to general principles. It is only in the Select Committee that the Bill is considered in details and amendments are moved. Clause by clause consideration of the Bill follows after the presentation of the Committee Report. The scope of amendments is limited to proposals for the reduction or abolition of a tax. The financial proposals become operative immediately after the presentation of the Budget under the Provincial Collection of Taxes Act, 1931. The Finance Bill must be passed before the end of April.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES

The principle of appointing committees is not a modern development. It is, indeed, as old as Parliament itself. The British Parliament soon after its organization realised that, as a deliberative body, it could not do its work effectively and efficiently, although the business it transacted at that stage of its career was very light and simple. It, accordingly, started the practice of appointing its Committees and delegating to them the more detailed consideration of work. With the growth of the parliamentary work and with a view to ensure its smooth, efficient and expeditious disposal the utility and the number of Committees increased tremendously and the House of Commons today relies more on Committees for expertize scrutiny and consideration of legislation and other matters which Parliament is to decide and determine.

The history of Committees in India goes back to 1854 when the first legislature was established. The Legislative Council appointed its own Committee to consider what should be its standing orders. Since then it had become a practice for the Council to appoint from time to time Committees to deal with varied matters. The existing Committees may be divided into: (1) Ad Hoc Committees, and (2) Non-Ad Hoc Committees. In the former category come Select Committees and Joint Committees. Committees in the latter category may be classified according to their functions. The following classification borrowed from S.S. More's Practice and Procedure of Indian Parliament⁹³ presents a matter of fact analysis:

- (a) Committees to enquire:
 - (1) Committee of Petitions.
 - (2) Committee of Privileges.
- (b) Committees to scrutinise:
 - (1) Committee on Government Assurances.
 - (2) Committee on Subordinate Legislation.
- (c) Committees of an administrative character relating to the business of the House:
 - (1) Committee on Absence of Members from the Sittings of the House.
 - (2) Business Advisory Committee.
 - (3) Committee on Private Members' Bills and Resolutions.
 - (4) Rules Committee.
- (d) Committees dealing with provision of facilities to Members:
 - (1) General Purposes Committee.
 - (2) House Committee.
 - (3) Library Committee.
 - (4) Joint Committee on Salaries and Allowances of Members of Parliament.
- (e) Financial Committees:
 - (1) Estimates Committees.
 - (2) • Public Accounts Committee.

A Committee on Public Undertakings has recently been constituted to investigate into the working of public undertakings.

Select Committees. Select Committees are appointed on individual Bills and for making some investigation, inquiry or compilation. The first Select Committee was appointed in 1854 and since then the succeeding Legislatures have invariably appointed numerous such Committees. Select Committees, whether for a Bill or making other investigation, have proved themselves to be convenient instrument for detailed examination of Bills and other problems under inquiry. The Speaker of the Lok Sabha remarked in 1955, "when we meet in the Committees, we do not represent parties, we function as a whole House and we do what, we think, the best in the interest of the House." The Parliamentary Committees help to save time for the House to discuss important matters and prevent Parliament from getting lost in details and thereby losing its hold on matters of policies and broad principles. Apart from this, the very complexity and technical nature of modern business makes it necessary, that it should be closely scrutinised in a businesslike manner, availing of outside technical or expert advice, wherever necessary. The Speaker of the Lok Sabha, accordingly, aptly suggested that the House should appoint large Select Committees and leave the "matter to be thrashed out there than in a bigger House".

Members of a Select Committee are appointed or elected by the House itself or nominated by the Speaker. The willingness of the members desired to serve on the Committee is ascertained before a proposal for appointment or nomination is made. The Chairman is appointed by the Speaker from among its members, but if the Deputy Speaker happens to be a member of the Committee, he shall be appointed Chairman. One-third of the total membership constitutes the quorum and a majority vote determines the decision of a Committee. The Chairman is entitled to a casting vote in case of a tie. A Committee can appoint its own sub-Committee. The meetings of a Committee are private and are normally held in the precincts of Parliament House. It may send for persons to give evidence, produce papers and records. The report is presented by the Chairman of the Committee or a member authorised by the Committee. Members dissenting from the majority report may submit minutes of dissent. The Speaker has the power to give directions to the Committee with a view to regulate its procedure and the organization of its work.

Joint Committees. In order to avoid duplication of proceedings a Bill may be referred to a Joint Committee composed of members of both Houses. Joint Committees also save time and help to bring about and develop good understanding, appreciative spirit and co-operation between the representatives of both the Houses. A motion for the appointment of a Joint Committee and reference of a Bill to such a Committee after being carried out in the originating House is transmitted to the other House for its concurrence. The member-in-charge of a Bill indicates the number and names of the members constituting the Committee from the House to which he belongs as also the number of the members from the other House. The proportion of members from the Lok Sabha and the Rajya Sabha is two to one.

Committee on Petitions. The Committee on Petitions is nominated by the Speaker at the commencement of the House and consists of fifteen members. No Minister can, however, be a member of this Committee.

People have an inherent right to address petitions to the legislature for the redress of grievances or suggest some remedy for public ills. The Committee on Petitions examines the merits of all petitions submitted to the House and makes recommendations to the House after taking such evidence as it deems necessary.

Committee of Privileges. This Committee, too, consisting of 15 members, is nominated by the Speaker at the commencement of the House. It examines all questions of breach of privileges which are referred to it and reports to the House.

Committee on Government Assurances. While replying to questions and supplementaries in the House or in the course of discussion on Bills, Resolutions, Motions, etc., Ministers sometimes give assurances or undertakings either to consider a matter or to take action thereupon or to provide to the House full information later. The Speaker appoints for one year a Committee of fifteen on Government Assurances with a view to scrutinize assurances so made and to report to the House whether such assurances, undertakings and promises have been implemented or not. If implemented, the extent of their implementation and whether such implementation was within the time necessary for this purpose. No Minister is nominated to this Committee. The Committee on Government Assurances was first constituted on December 1, 1953. The Rajya Sabha has no such Committee.

Committee on Subordinate Legislation. The Indian Legislatures have been delegating the rule-making power for more than a century now, but the parliamentary control over subordinate legislation is a recent innovation. Since 1953 a Committee on Subordinate Legislation has been constituted by the Speaker. The Committee consists of fifteen members nominated by the Speaker for one year. Ministers are not included in it. All Rules, Regulations and Orders framed by the Executive to be laid before the House are examined by this Committee. The functions of the Committee are:

- (1) whether the Rules, Regulations and Orders are in accordance with the general objects of the Constitution or the Act under the authority of which they are made;
- (2) whether they contain matters which should be properly dealt with in an Act;
- (3) whether they contain the imposition of any tax;
- (4) whether they directly or indirectly bar the jurisdiction of the Courts;
- (5) whether they give retrospective effect to any of the provisions where the Act or Constitution does not confer such authority;
- (6) whether they involve expenditure from the Consolidated Fund of the public accounts;
- (7) whether they appear to make any unexpected or unusual use of the powers conferred;
- (8) whether there have been justifiable delays in the publication of the Rules or in laying them before Parliament;

(9) whether for any reason they call for any elucidation.

Committee on Absence of Members. The Committee was first constituted on March 12, 1954. It considers applications by members for leave of absence from sittings of the House. It examines the case of members who have been absent for a period of sixty days or more without permission. The Committee recommends to the House whether absence without permission should be condoned or not. In one case it has so far recommended that absence without permission of a member should not be condoned. The Rajya Sabha has no such Committee.

Business Advisory Committee. A Business Advisory Committee, consisting of fifteen members, including the Speaker who is its Chairman, was first constituted on July 14, 1952. The Deputy Speaker is also one of its members. It advises the House on the allocation of time for the various items of Government business. In suitable cases the Committee has the power to indicate in that time table the different hours at which various stages of a Bill or other Government business shall be completed. The Committee may also, on its own initiative, recommend to the Government to bring forward particular subjects for discussion in the House and allocates time for such discussion. Questions regarding extension of sessions and fixation of sittings of the House on the day on which it would not normally sit are first considered by the Committee.

The decisions of the Committee are always unanimous and, by convention, are adopted by the House unanimously on a motion moved by the Minister of Parliamentary Affairs. After acceptance, the motion takes effect as an order of the House, and on the expiry of time for each stage all motions pending at the time are guillotined.

Committee on Private Members' Bills and Resolutions. Its functions are purely the same as that of the Business Advisory Committee in regard to Government business. It allots time to Private Members' Bills and resolutions, examines Private Members' Bills seeking to amend the Constitution before their introduction, categorises Private Members' Bills according to their nature, urgency and importance, after they have been introduced, and examines such Private Members' Bills where the legislative competence of the House is challenged. The Committee was first constituted on December 1, 1953 and its membership consisted of ten. On May 13, 1954, the membership was raised to fifteen. The Deputy Speaker is its Chairman.

Rules Committee. Article 118(1) of the Constitution empowers each House of Parliament to make rules for regulating the procedure and conduct of its business. The Rules Committee has been constituted in pursuance of this provision. It is nominated by the Speaker/the Chairman, and consists of fifteen members. The Speaker/the Chairman, is its ex-officio Chairman. The Committee so nominated holds office until a new Committee is nominated.

The function of the Committee is to consider matters of procedure and conduct of business in the House and to recommend any amendments or additions to the Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business that may be necessary. Apart from the members of the Committee some other members of the House may also be invited to attend particular sittings of the Committee. Till 1954 amendments to the Rules of Procedure were made by the Speaker/the Chairman, but now the recommendations of the Rules Committee are placed before the House and adopted.

Committees dealing with provision of facilities to Members. Besides these, there are three Committees dealing with provision of facilities to Members—the General Purposes Committee, the House Committee and the Library Committee. The function of the General Purposes Committee is to consider and advise on such matters concerning the affairs of the House as may be referred to it by the Speaker. The House Committee deals with matters of accommodation, food and medical aid of members. The functions of the Library Committee are: to consider and advise on such matters concerning the Library as may be referred to it by the Speaker, to consider suggestions for improvement of the Library, and to assist members in fully utilising the services provided by the Committee.

The Estimates Committee. To ensure parliamentary control over grants made to the Government and to supervise and control the actual appropriation, Parliament exercises close scrutiny of public accounts through its two Committees—the Estimates Committee and the Public Accounts Committee. The Estimates Committee was constituted for the first time in 1950 replacing the then Standing Finance Committee of Parliament. Its members are thirty in number and they are elected in accordance with the system of proportional representation from among the members of the Lok Sabha for a period of one year. The Deputy Speaker is the Chairman of the Committee.

The function of the Committee is to scrutinize the Budget estimates for the year, to suggest economies in the expenditure, improvement in organization and other steps for increasing efficiency, to find out whether the money is well laid out and also to suggest the form in which the estimates should be presented to Parliament. Usually the Committee functions through sub-Committees, one corresponding to one or more Departments, and their reports are submitted both to the House and to the Government. The Committee does not complete its work with the final passage of the Budget. It continues with its labours throughout the year and exercises scrutiny over one Department or the other as it chooses and deems necessary.

The Committee does not examine the entire estimates. Subjects are chosen for examination and the Committee takes evidence from departmental officials and outsiders and considers and makes its recommendations on the subjects in reports submitted from time to time to the House. The recommendations made by the Committee may or may not be accepted by the Government. Replies of the Departments on the points raised by the Committee are sent to it in the form of minutes and are made part of the subsequent report of the Committee. Commenting upon the utility of the Estimates Committee Asok Chanda says, "In recent years, however, the Committee's contribution has been more impressive...while the Committee refrains even now from openly criticizing the policy implicit in the estimates, its examination does often indirectly reflect on the manner in which a particular policy has been evolved or is being implemented. There has also been considerable improvement in the organization of the Committee and in its technique, which has better equipped it to fulfil its responsibilities. Even though it works within the limitations inherent in a democratic form of government, its contributions are tending to become more and more effective in economizing national expenditure."⁹⁴ Morris-Jones is rather critical of the role of the Estimates Committee. Its members, he says, "are supposed to look for possible economies but they have in fact been happy to rule out the faint line between economy and efficiency. Further, they have not hesitated to recommend in the name of efficiency large administrative reforms and even re-orientation of policy. Their audacity occasioned strong comment and it may be that they have in the last few years been more modest in the scope of their reports. But "of their growing competence and effectiveness as a control over ministries," he adds, "there can be no doubt. If they find less to be indignant about it, it is in part because their influence is now automatically reckoned with."⁹⁵

The Public Accounts Committee. The Public Accounts Committee considers the Appropriation Accounts in details and "it is the twin brother of the Estimates Committee." The Public Accounts Committees were for the first time constituted at the Centre and in the Provinces as early as 1923. But they met under the Chairmanship of the Finance Member of the Governor-General's or Governor's Executive Council. Their secretariat consisted of the Finance Department and their role was technicalities. Moreover, the position of the Auditor-General was more governmental than independent and he was in no sense servant of the Legislature.

In 1950, the Public Accounts Committee was made a real Parliamentary Committee and the independence of the Auditor-General was ensured by the Constitution, thereby, creating an effective examiner of the administration. In 1954, members of the Rajya Sabha were included in it. Its total membership is 15 from the Lok Sabha and 7 from the Rajya Sabha. The members are elected by the system of proportional representation for one year and no Minister can be its member. The Speaker nominates a seniormost non-official member of the Lok Sabha as the Chairman of the Committee, but if the Deputy Speaker is elected a member of the Committee, he acts as the Chairman.

The function of the Public Accounts Committee is to scrutinize the Appropriation Accounts of the Government of India and other accounts laid before the House and the report of the Comptroller and the Auditor-General of India and to satisfy itself that moneys shown in the accounts have been legally disbursed, that expenditure conforms to the authority that governs it and that re-appropriation has been according to rules. The Committee has also to examine the statement of accounts showing the income and expenditure of State Corporations, and manufacturing schemes and projects of autonomous and semi-autonomous bodies. The Committee submits its report to the House and it is a powerful and vital instrument of parliamentary control of public finances.

95. Morris-Jones, W.H., The Government and Politics of India, p. 196.

The Report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General of India furnishes the Public Accounts Committee with most of the material on which it functions. The Committee has, however, the power to scrutinize and report on almost any matter relating to the management of public finance. The report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General is taken up Ministry-wise, and the Departmental Secretaries are required to appear as witnesses to elucidate and explain the observations of audit, in order to enable the Committee to reach final conclusions and formulate its recommendations. The examination of the Committee extends "beyond the formality of the expenditure, to its wisdom, faithfulness and economy." Specifically, the examination covers the manner in which approved policy is being implemented, the degree of efficiency and economy with which plans and programmes are being executed and the manner in which discretionary powers are being exercised. The Committee is not concerned with the question of policy in the broader sense, but it is concerned with the policy of the method of expenditure. The question whether there is any extravagance or waste in carrying out that policy is within the competence of the Committee.

The utility of the Public Accounts Committee is immense. It is a representative Committee of all shades of opinion and members of Parliament who constitute the Committee recognise the question of public accounts as a national question and, accordingly, its deliberations and findings are devoid of party feelings and partisan approach. It directly contacts the executive officers, the administrators and all those who spend money and, thus, direct elucidation of the disputed matters can be sought from these officials. It may even summon further evidence oral or documentary. If necessary, evidence may be taken on oath, but in practice that is not adopted by any Select Committee except in very special cases. This is, no doubt, a post mortem examination, all the same very effective. The Committee has no power to compel any administrative action to be taken on its observations, but this has not affected the effectiveness of its recommendations. Its power is indirect "and lies nominally in the potential results of its reports and the publicity which it is able to give to the question it investigates and in the moral effect of its criticism."⁹⁶ Morris-Jones puts it in another way. He says, "The fact that their scrutiny is ex-post facto is less important than that the government has continuously to act in the knowledge that scrutiny of any item may take place and that waste and impropriety may be widely exposed in the House and the press. The fact that government replies to the Public Accounts Committee are often vague and cool is less important than that behind the reply there has often been embarrassment and some resolve not to let it happen again."⁹⁷

The Committee on Public Undertakings. The Committee has recently been constituted in the Lok Sabha to investigate into the working of public undertakings. It consists of ten members from the Lok Sabha and five from the Rajya Sabha elected on the principle of proportional representation. The functions of the Committee are:

96. Asok Chanda, Indian Administration, p. 183.

- (1) to examine the reports and accounts of the public undertakings specified in the Schedule;
- (2) to examine the reports, if any, of the Comptroller and Auditor-General on the public undertakings;
- (3) to examine, in the context of the autonomy and efficiency of public undertakings, whether the affairs of public undertakings are being managed in accordance with sound business principles and prudent commercial practices; and
- (4) such other functions vested in the Public Accounts Committee and the Estimates Committee in relation to the public undertakings specified in the Schedule or under the Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business of the House as are not covered by (1), (2), and (3) above and as may be allotted to the Committee by the Speaker from time to time.

The Committee shall, however, not examine and investigate any of the following matters:

- (a) matters of major Government policy as distinct from business or commercial functions of public undertakings;
- (b) matters of day-to-day administration;
- (c) matters for the consideration of which machinery is established by any special statute under which a particular public undertaking is established.

Delegated Legislation. An inevitable consequence of extension in the activities of the State, particularly when it aims to establish a socialistic society, is the sizable increase in legislation. Since it is not possible for the legislature to enact measures so numerous and so comprehensive, delegation of authority to the executive becomes not only necessary but quite inescapable. Delegated legislation is usually concerned with minor matters, of details to give effect to the provisions of the statutes. But it is not so always. There are instances both in India and other countries, where important powers, such as the power to determine matters of principle, to impose taxation, to amend Acts of Parliament, to create new offences and to create penalties have been delegated. There are, no doubt, abnormal instances of legislative delegation of authority, but they are by no means rare. The rules and regulations thus made have the force of law and they cannot be challenged in the Courts unless they are ultra vires of the parent Acts.

Speaker G.V. Mavalankar, once remarked, and rightly too, that delegated legislation is both a necessity and a risk. It is a necessity because Parliament has neither the time nor the requisite expert knowledge to deal with the technicalities which legislation now involves. It is a risk because the institution of delegated legislation has significantly added to the powers of the executive. The rules framed thereunder are very often vexatious to the citizens as the administrative officers concerned with the framing of the rules exalt administrative convenience and the national advantage at the expense of the individual and his freedom. To safeguard against the abuse of power, it is, therefore, for Parliament to keep a watchful and even jealous eye on delegated legislation at all its stages.

The usual safeguards are: defining the limits of delegation, laying down a special procedure for rule-making, giving adequate publicity to the proposed rules, requiring the rules made to be laid on the table of the House, and the process of scrutiny. Two Rules of the Procedure of the Lok Sabha set down important provisions. Rule No. 71 states that "a Bill involving proposals for the delegation of legislative power shall further be accompanied by a memorandum explaining such proposals and drawing attention to their scope and stating also whether they are of normal or exceptional character." Rule No. 222 reads, "Each 'regulation', 'rule', 'sub-rule', 'bye-law', etc., framed in pursuance of the legislative function delegated by Parliament to a subordinate authority and which is required to be laid before the House (hereinafter referred to as 'order') shall, subject to such rules as the Speaker may in consultation with the Leader of the House prescribe, be numbered centrally and published in the Gazette of India immediately after they are promulgated."

The scrutiny of delegated legislation by Parliament itself is of recent origin, although delegated legislation in India is more than a century old and certain safeguards, such as the publication of the rules and judicial review, have existed from the very beginning. The Committee on Subordinate Legislation was first appointed by the Speaker on December 1, 1953 under Rule 88 of the Procedure. It consisted of 10 members including the Chairman appointed by the Speaker. Now it consists of fifteen members and the function of the Committee is to see and report to the House "whether the powers delegated by Parliament have been properly exercised within the framework of the statute delegating such powers." The powers of the Committee are similar to the financial committees to appoint sub-committees having the power of the main Committee and to require the attendance of persons and production of papers and records. The Government may, however, decline to produce a document on the ground that its disclosure will be prejudicial to the safety or interest of the State.

The terms of reference of the Committee on Subordinate Legislation extend to these nine points: (1) Whether it is in accord with the general objects of the Act pursuant to which the orders are made; (2) whether these orders contain matter which in the opinion of the Committee should more properly be dealt with in an Act of Parliament; (3) whether the orders contain imposition of taxation; (4) whether such orders directly or indirectly bar the jurisdiction of the Courts; (5) whether the orders give retrospective effect to any of the provisions in respect of which the Act does not expressly give such powers; (6) whether they involve expenditure from the Consolidated Fund or the Public Revenues; (7) whether they appear to make some unusual or unexpected use of powers conferred by the Act pursuant to which it is made; (8) whether there appears to have been unjustifiable delay in the publication or laying it before Parliament; and (9) whether for any reason its form or purport calls for any elucidation. When the Rules framed by the various authorities are laid before the House, the Committee examines such Rules and reports to the House in the light of its terms of reference as cited above.

The Committee submitted its first report to the Lok Sabha in March 1954 and revealed therein the most unsatisfactory state of affairs. Only one Bill introduced in the House since 1952 complied with the Rule laying down that an explanatory memorandum should accompany proposals for delegated legislation. It, accordingly, made two recommendations: first, that Bills containing proposals for delegation of legislative power should invariably be accompanied by memoranda explaining the scope and the details of such proposals, and, second that the provisions delegating legislative powers in the various statutes should be of a uniform pattern. Speaker Mavalankar congratulating the Committee on its first report told its members that they were the only protectors of the people against "the 'new despotism' getting aggressive." He reminded them that it was their job "to direct the rule-making power in proper channels." At the same time, he cautioned them not to consider themselves hostile to the administration. They were rather its collaborators, co-operators and friends saving the civil servants, as it were, from their worst selves.⁹⁸ The work so far done by the Committee is impressive and the promise for the future is bright. The Committee has constantly drawn attention to several features of orders deemed undesirable, like curtailment of the jurisdiction of the Courts; indefinite, complicated and ambiguous wording; contravention of the provisions of the parent Acts; undue delay between the publication of an order and its being laid on the table of the House.

The Committee on Subordinate Legislation was modelled on the British Select Committee on Statutory Instruments of the House of Commons. There was, however, one important difference between the two. The terms of reference of the Indian Committee are in effect wider, but they still stop the Committee short of a consideration of the merit of an order.⁹⁹ The Law Commission, in its report recommended the setting up of a Standing Committee of experts to scrutinize all important rules and orders prior to their presentation to Parliament. Such a committee of experts would, the report said, save endless litigation on the legality of some of the rules. A large assembly, consisting mostly of members possessing ordinary educational qualifications, is hardly a suitable body to examine the legal implication of rules and orders so made. Their critical examination required a high standard of legal acumen and wide experience which only a few legislators possess. Many of the Acts of Parliament, however, provide that Rules are to be made after previous publication. In such cases, a draft of the Rules has to be published in a manner prescribed by the Government, ordinarily in the Gazette of India, and time is given for submitting objections to the draft Rules and the Rule-making authority takes into consideration objections, if any.

In some respects India has established certain advantageous precedents with regard to subordinate legislation. The Speaker has ever appointed a member of the Opposition as Chairman of the Committee on Subordinate Legislation. Since the membership of this Committee is not open to Ministers, it has functioned as a well-knit business committee free from official influence, party spirit and party whip. The Committee has boldly stood by its duty "of checking and eliminating the chance of the possible transgression of authority prescribed by Parliament." Generally, matters before the Committee are decided by common agreement amongst the members and votes had never been taken. It also goes to the credit of various Ministries and their officers that they have always co-operated with the Committee and supplied them with the requisite information. Whenever the Committee apprised the Ministry or the rule-making authority that the rules so framed go beyond the limits prescribed by the parent Act or that they are not in conformity with the spirit of the Act, they have always accepted the viewpoint of the Committee and remedied the defects. The Committee has particularly been careful in scrutinizing that the courts are not excluded from exercising their jurisdiction and that the rule-making authority makes adequate provision for judicial review. The need for judicial review of subordinate legislation cannot be exaggerated. The limits put by the legislature must not be exceeded and all conditions of exercise of delegated power must be satisfied. The Calcutta High Court held that when rules are to be made for carrying out the purposes of the Act the rules cannot travel beyond the four corners of the Act itself.

The Lok Sabha's Committee on subordinate Legislation has helped to establish a healthy precedent by its recommendation that notifications issued by Government under the Essential Services Maintenance Act should cease to have effect if not approved by a resolution passed by both Houses of Parliament within forty days from the date on which the notification is laid before each House. Hitherto, such notifications came into force on their being published in the official gazette, after they were laid on the table of the House members had to take the initiative to move for their notification or annulment. This was not always an effective safeguard. In most cases rules or notifications issued under powers delegated by statutes remained operative for lack of time, or of initiative on the part of members, for raising a discussion.

CHAPTER VI

THE SUPREME COURT

The need for the Federal Judiciary. A federal judiciary is an essential element in a Federal Constitution. It is at once the interpreter and guardian of the Constitution and a tribunal for the determination of disputes between the constituent units of the Federation. A federation postulates an agreement and the distribution of powers, legislative, financial and executive, between the Union and the Units. Both the Union Government and the State Governments derive their authority from the Constitution and their jurisdiction is limited by the provisions of the Constitution. Where the authority of two sets of government is demarcated and delimited, disputes, as regards the interpretation of the Constitution and the respective rights of the Union and the Units, are sure to arise. It is, accordingly, an essential element of the federal polity that there should be an impartial umpire, a judicial body independent both of the Union Legislature and Executive and of the governments of the Units, which should settle their disputes and preserve the sanctity of the Constitution. In Hammer v. Dagenhart the Supreme Court of the United States held, "This Court has no more important function than that which devolves upon it, the obligation to preserve inviolate the constitutional limitation upon the exercise of authority, Federal and State, to the end that each may continue to discharge harmoniously with the other, the duties entrusted to it by the Constitution." And the United States' Constitution empowers the Supreme Court to determine "all controversies to which the United States shall be a party, to controversies between two or more States."¹

The federation which the Constitution of India establishes is not in the nature of a treaty or agreement between the federating units. There is nevertheless a division of legislative as well as administrative authority between the Union and the States. The Constitution, accordingly, vests the Supreme Court with original jurisdiction to decide disputes between the Government of India and the Governments of the States or between two or more States.² There is another important reason which necessitates an independent judicial body in India. The Constitution vests the Union with powers which vitally conflict with the basic principles of a federation and, as such, "it is the interpretation of the Supreme Court in particular cases, that will hold the centripetal and centrifugal forces in the balance and save the original distribution of powers from any aggressive encroach-

1. Article III, 2 (1).

2. Article 131. But the Indian Supreme Court has no original jurisdiction as the American and Australian Constitutions give to their Supreme Courts to decide disputes between residents of different States or between a State and a resident of another State. Such disputes under the Indian Constitution come to the Supreme Court only on appeal, if the provisions relating thereto are satisfied.

ment on the part of the Union Government."³ The future evolution of the Indian Constitution, thus, depends to a large extent upon the work of the Supreme Court and the direction given to it by that Court. In his address on the role of the Supreme Court, Alladi Krishnaswami Aiyar said: "From time to time, in the interpretation of the Constitution the Supreme Court will be confronted with apparently contradictory forces at work in society for the time being. While its function may be one of interpreting the Constitution as contained in the instrument of Government, it cannot in the discharge of its duties afford to ignore the social, economic and political tendencies of the times which furnish the necessary background. It has to keep the poise between the seemingly contradictory forces. In the process of the interpretation of the Constitution on certain occasions, it may appear to strengthen the Union at the expense of the Units and at another time it may appear to champion the cause of provincial autonomy and regionalism. On one occasion it may appear to favour individual liberty as against social or state control, and at another time it may appear to favour social or state control. It is the great tribunal which has to draw the line between individual liberty and social control. . . ."⁴

The Supreme Court is also the guardian of the Constitution. The Constitution of India declares and guarantees Fundamental Rights of citizens⁵ and provides remedies against interference with their exercise and enjoyment through the Supreme Court.⁶ The Court is constantly called upon to determine the validity of the legislation and executive action with reference to the provisions relating to the Fundamental Rights. The first Attorney-General of India, M.C. Setalvad, in his speech at the inauguration of the Supreme Court, January 28, 1950, while emphasizing the significance of the Supreme Court, inter alia, said, "...The detailed enumeration of fundamental rights in the Constitution and the provisions which enable them to be reasonably restricted will need wise and discriminating decisions. On the Court will fall the delicate and difficult task of ensuring the citizen the enjoyment of his guaranteed rights consistently with the rights of the society and the safety of the State."

Supreme Court in retrospect. The suggestion to establish a Supreme Court in India is found in the Nehru Report, 1928. But in official parlance the idea of establishing a Supreme Court goes back to the Round Table Conferences when the scheme for establishing a federal Constitution of India was evolved. The White Paper proposals of 1933 recommended the establishment of two courts at the Centre, the Federal Court and the Supreme Court. The former was to be the ultimate tribunal for interpreting the Constitution as well as all questions concerning the spheres of the Federal and Provincial authorities and of the Indian States. It was to have both an original and appellate jurisdiction. The Supreme Court was intended to have jurisdiction extended to British India as a final court of appeal from the decisions of Provincial High Courts on matters other than those which fell within the jurisdiction of the Federal Court. But the White Paper was not sure of the necessity of establishing a Supreme Court in addition to the Federal Court as the Indian opinion considered it an unnecessary and unjustifiable expense. It was, accordingly, recommended that the Federal Legislature should be empowered to establish the Supreme Court whenever its necessity and justification was recognised, but the Government of India Act should itself prescribe the powers and jurisdiction of the Court if and when it was established.⁷

The proposal of setting up two courts was subsequently abandoned and the Government of India Act, 1935 set up only a Federal Court with original, appellate and advisory powers.⁸ The Federal Court was not a court of final jurisdiction and appeals could be carried to the Privy Council in London. The Constituent Assembly of India considered the position of the Federal Court at a very early stage and almost simultaneously with the appointment of the Union Constitution Committee, an ad hoc Committee, consisting of S. Varadachariar, Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar, B.L. Mitter, K.M. Munshi and B.N. Rau, was constituted to consider and report on the Constitution and powers of the Federal Court, to be named as Supreme Court of India. The Committee submitted its report on May 21, 1947. Its recommendations were essentially based on the Government of India Act, 1935. The Committee referred to the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Fundamental Rights that the right to move the Supreme Court by appropriate proceedings for the enforcement of fundamental rights should be guaranteed by the Constitution. But the Committee did not consider it desirable to make the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court exclusive. The Committee proposed that in case there was no other court with the necessary jurisdiction, the Supreme Court should exercise that jurisdiction, but where there was some other court with the necessary jurisdiction, the Supreme Court should have appellate powers, including powers of revision.⁹ Since under the new Constitution the jurisdiction of the Privy Council, as the ultimate appellate authority, was to be abolished, the Committee proposed that a similar jurisdiction should be conferred on the Supreme Court.¹⁰

With regard to the organization of the Supreme Court, the Committee suggested that it should have two Division Benches, each consisting of five Judges. The Committee emphatically suggested that the appointment of Judges should not be left to the unfettered discretion of the Executive. Two alternative proposals were suggested in this respect. One was, that for the appointment of puisne Judges the President should in consultation with the Chief Justice of India make a nomination which should be confirmed by at least seven out of a panel of eleven persons, composed of some of the Chief Justices of the High Courts, members of the Central Legislature and some of the law officers of the Union Government. The other method was that the panel should put forward three names for every vacancy and the final choice should rest with the President in consultation with the Chief Justice of India. The same procedure, except that the Chief Justice would not be consulted, would also apply in the appointment of the Chief Justice of India. In order to ensure the independence of the panel, it was suggested that every panel should function for a period of ten years. As regards the qualifications of the Judges, the Committee recommended that similar qualifications as prescribed by the Government of India Act, 1935, for the appointment of the Judges of the Federal Court should be adopted and the age-limit might continue to be 65. The Committee did not approve the appointment of temporary Judges and suggested that ad hoc Judges, out of a panel of Chief Justices and Judges of the High Courts, might be appointed, to deal with temporary increase in work.

The Constitutional Adviser incorporated these recommendations in his Memorandum of May 30, 1947 on the Union Constitution, with one modification that the Judges would be appointed by the President with the consent and approval of two-thirds of the Council of State. As said earlier, the Council of State was to be an advisory body in the nature of the Privy Council, for advising the President on certain matters on which decisions were required on independent, non-party lines.

The Union Constitution Committee did not accept the Constitutional Adviser's suggestion relating to the setting up of a Council of State and, accordingly, proposed that the President should appoint Judges in consultation with the Chief Justice of India and such other Judges of the Supreme Court, as also such Judges of the High Courts as might be deemed necessary. The Committee adopted all other proposals of the ad hoc Committee on Supreme Court. The recommendation of the Committee was, "There shall be a Supreme Court with the Constitution, powers and jurisdiction recommended by the ad hoc Committee on the Union Judiciary, except that a Judge of the Supreme Court shall be appointed by the President after consulting the Chief Justice and such other Judges of the Supreme Court, as also such Judges of the High Courts as may be necessary for the purpose."¹¹

The proposals of the Union Constitution Committee were discussed in the Constituent Assembly on July 29, 1947. Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar moved an amendment specifically declaring that a Judge of the Supreme Court would not be removed from his office except "on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity" and that too only by the President on an address from both Houses of Parliament in the same session. Various other points were raised in the course of consideration of the Report and several amendments were also moved. The Assembly finally accepted the Committee's report together with Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar's suggestion regarding the procedure for the removal of Judges. These decisions were incorporated in the Draft Constitution prepared by the Constitutional Adviser in October 1947.

Shortly thereafter the Constitutional Adviser visited the United States of America, Canada, Britain and Ireland to study the working of their Constitutions. He discussed with some eminent persons the relevant provisions adopted by India from their Constitutions and as a result of these discussions he made two suggestions relating to the Supreme Court. He suggested, in the first place, that Judges in the United States had the option to retire, on attaining the age of seventy and on completing ten years' service in the Supreme Court and it would be desirable if this provision was adopted in India too. Secondly, the jurisdiction exercisable by the Supreme Court should be exercised by the full court and it should not sit in two divisions as suggested by the ad hoc Committee on Supreme Court. Justice Frankfurter of the United States' Supreme Court had attached considerable importance to it, he added.

The Drafting Committee gave utmost consideration to all these suggestions and the Draft Constitution, as it emerged out of its deliberations, provided that the Supreme Court would consist of a Chief Justice and such number of other Judges not less than seven as might be fixed by Parliament. The age of retirement would be 65 and no Judge could be removed from office except by an order of the President passed after an address supported by not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting had been presented by both Houses of Parliament in the same session for such removal on the ground of proved misbehaviour and incapacity. The appointment of the Judges was to be made by the President after consultation with such of the Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts as might be necessary for the purpose; consultation with the Chief Justice of India being compulsory in the case of appointment of puisne Judges. The salaries and allowances of Judges were to be determined by an Act of Parliament and until such an Act was passed as prescribed by the Constitution. Two methods were provided for filling temporary vacancies. In a situation where quorum was not available, the Chief Justice could, after consultation with the Chief Justice of a High Court, request one of the Judges of that High Court to serve as an ad hoc Judge. Alternatively, he could request a retired Judge of the Supreme Court to function as a Judge.

The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was determined on the lines already approved by the Constituent Assembly. It was to have exclusive original jurisdiction in all disputes between the Government of India and one or more States; between the Government of India and any State or States on one side and one or more States on the other or between two or more States. Its appellate jurisdiction would extend to all cases involving a substantial question of law, as to the interpretation of the Constitution, but an appeal on this ground could be entertained only on a certificate given by the High Court or, where High Court refused to grant such a certificate, by special leave of the Supreme Court. Appellate jurisdiction was also conferred in civil cases of the value of Rs. 20,000 subject to the condition that if the High Court had affirmed the judgment of the lower court, a certificate was necessary from the High Court to the effect that the case involved a substantial question of law. It was, however, open to the High Court to certify in any civil case that it was a fit case for appeal to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court could also grant special leave in any case, civil or criminal. The Draft Constitution also provided for the advisory jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The President could refer any question of law or fact to the Supreme Court in order to obtain the opinion of the Court.

When the Draft Constitution was circulated there were several suggestions especially contained in a Joint Memorandum representing the views of the Federal Court and of the Chief Justices of the High Courts. Suggestions also came from the High Courts, Provincial Governments and other official organizations, as well as private individuals. On the whole, the consensus of opinion was in favour of the basic principles governing the jurisdiction and powers of the Supreme Court as provided in the Draft Constitution. There were, however, quite a good number of proposals relating to the appointment of Judges in order to ensure the independence of the judiciary. The Drafting Committee itself moved a number of amendments to these provisions. Other members of the Constituent Assembly, too, moved amendments mainly hinging upon the procedure for the appointment of Judges, the age of retirement, and the acceptance of office by Judges after retirement.¹² But all such amendments were rejected except the one moved by H.V. Kamath which was to enable an eminent jurist to be appointed a Judge of the Supreme Court even if he did not possess the required qualification that he had been an advocate or a Judge for the specified number of years.

There was also a good deal of controversy on the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Some members argued that in all cases where a substantial question of law was involved, a High Court should grant a certificate and the Supreme Court should be empowered to hear all such appeals.¹³ Alladi Krishnaswami Ayyar, K.M. Munshi and Dr. Ambedkar maintained, on behalf of the Drafting Committee, that the Supreme Court had already "wider jurisdiction than any superior court in any part of the world,"¹⁴ but power would be conferred on Parliament to vest the Supreme Court with jurisdiction in criminals appeals.¹⁵ Dr. Ambedkar, however, finally moved a new Article 111-A conferring on the Supreme Court appellate criminal jurisdiction in cases where:—

- (i) the High Court had on appeal reversed an order of acquittal of an accused person and sentenced him to death;
- (ii) the High Court had withdrawn a case for trial before itself from a subordinate court and sentenced the accused person to death;
- (iii) the High Court had certified that the case was fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court.¹⁶

The new Article was adopted by the Constituent Assembly and it figured as Article 134 of the Constitution.

T.T. Krishnamaehari and Dr. Ambedkar moved two more amendments on behalf of the Drafting Committee. These amendments laid down that it would be necessary to obtain the approval of the President for the appointment of ad hoc Judges by the Chief Justice of India, and for the fixation of salaries, allowances, leave and pensions of the staff of the Supreme Court. The first amendment was adopted without discussion and the second was adopted with a slight amendment relating to the general scale of salaries of the staff of the Supreme Court.

Establishment and the Constitution of the Supreme Court. The Constitution provided for the establishment of a Supreme Court of India consisting of a Chief Justice of India and, until Parliament by law prescribed a larger number, of not more than seven Judges.¹⁷ The Supreme Court (Number of Judges) Act, 1956 raised the maximum to ten excluding the Chief Justice. This number was again raised in 1960 to fourteen including the Chief Justice. The increase was necessitated to expedite the disposal of cases in arrears by creating one more Bench of three Judges.

There is no minimum number of Judges fixed by the Constitution. But when the Constitution says that no case involving a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution¹⁸ or a reference under Article 143 shall be decided by less than five Judges, it follows that the Supreme Court cannot exercise its appellate jurisdiction in constitutional cases or the advisory jurisdiction unless there are five Judges to constitute a Bench. Moreover, if an ordinary Bench hearing an appeal finds that a question of constitutional law is involved, it shall refer that question to the Constitutional Bench consisting of five Judges.

If at any time there is no quorum¹⁹ of Judges available to continue or hold any session of the Supreme Court, the Chief Justice of India may, with the previous consent of the President and after consultation with the Chief Justice of the High Court concerned, request a Judge of the High Court, duly qualified to be a Judge of the Supreme Court, to attend the sittings of the Court as an ad hoc Judge for such period as is necessary. He shall remain a High Court Judge and his duties at the Supreme Court are additional, but during his attendance at the Supreme Court he has all the jurisdiction, powers and privileges of a Supreme Court Judge.²⁰ The

19. Apart from the constitutional provision that not less than five judges shall sit to decide constitutional cases and hearing of advisory reference, Rules of the Supreme Court provide, "Subject to other provisions of these Rules, every cause, appeal or matter shall be heard by a Bench consisting of not less than three Judges nominated by the Chief Justice."

20. Article 127. Section 30 of the Canadian Supreme Court Act provides, "Appointment of ad hoc judges—if at any time there should not be a quorum of Judges of the Supreme Court available to hold or continue any session of the Court, owing to a vacancy or vacancies, or to the absence through illness or on leave or in discharge of other duties, assigned by State or Order in Council or to the disqualification of a judge or judges, the Chief Justice, or, in his absence, the Senior puisne judge may in writing request the attendance at the sittings of the Court, as an ad hoc judge, for such period as may be necessary, of a judge of the Exchequer Court, or should the judges of the said Court be absent from Ottawa or for any reason unable to sit, of a judge of a provincial superior Court to be designated in writing by the Chief Justice or in his absence by any acting Chief Justice or the senior puisne judge of such provincial Court upon such request being made to him in writing."

Constitution of India also provides for the attendance of retired Judges of the Supreme Court in the sitting of the Court. The Chief Justice of India may, at any time, with the consent of the President request an ex-Judge of the Supreme Court or of the Federal Court to act and sit as a Judge of the Supreme Court.²¹ It should, however, be noted that while absence of a quorum of the permanent Judges of the Supreme Court is a condition precedent for the appointment of ad hoc Judges, there is no such condition for the appointment of a retired Judge of the Supreme Court or of the Federal Court. A retired Judge may be appointed at any time by the Chief Justice of India with the previous consent of the President.

The Constitution (Fifteenth Amendment) Act, 1963 makes a provision that any person who has held the office of the Judge of a High Court or is duly qualified for appointment as a Judge of the Supreme Court may be appointed as an ad hoc Judge of the Supreme Court. The amendment widens the scope of selection of the ad hoc Judges and removes the difficulty hitherto experienced.

Qualifications for Appointment of a Judge. A candidate for appointment as a Judge of the Supreme Court must be a citizen of India and must have been a Judge of one or more High Courts for five successive years, or an advocate of one or more High Courts for ten successive years, or must be, in the opinion of the President, an eminent jurist. There was no provision in the Draft Constitution for the appointment of non-practising lawyers as Judges of the Supreme Court. It was during the consideration stage of the Draft Constitution that the qualification of being a distinguished jurist was accepted, thus, enabling the Supreme Court to get the benefit of the services of talented non-practising lawyers. While providing for this qualification the Constituent Assembly was prompted by the practice obtainable in the United States where there are several precedents of non-practising lawyers being appointed Judges of the Supreme Court, the most notable and recent example being that of Felix Frankfurter, Professor of Law at Harvard. Ananthasayanam Ayyangar while pleading for the inclusion of an eminent jurist among the Judges of the Supreme Court said, "Sir, I agree with my Honourable Friend, Mr. Kamath, when he says that the choice of the Supreme Court Judges ought not to be limited to Judges already in service and of advocates of ten years' standing. He has moved that it ought to be open to the President, if he so chooses in the interest of proper administration of justice, to include a distinguished jurist. His amendment does not make it obligatory upon the President to choose only a jurist among jurists. In various cases a Supreme Court has to deal with constitutional issues. A practising lawyer barely comes across constitutional problems. A person may enter the profession of law straightaway. He might be a member of a Law College or be a Dean of the Faculty of Law in a University. There are many eminent persons, there are many writers, there are jurists of great eminence. Why should it not be made possible for the President to appoint a jurist of distinction if it is necessary? As a matter of fact, I would advise that out of the seven Judges one of them must be a jurist of great eminence."²²

22. Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. VIII, p. 254.

Every Judge of the Supreme Court is appointed by the President by warrant under his hand and seal after consultation with such of the Judges of the Supreme Court and of the High Courts as the President may deem necessary for such purpose, but the Chief Justice of India shall always be consulted. A Judge holds office until he attains the age of 65. He may resign from his office. He may also be removed from his office after an address for removal is presented to the President by each House of Parliament. Such an address should be supported by a majority of the total membership of the House and also by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members of that House present and voting in the same session. Removal can take place only on the ground of misbehaviour or incapacity investigated and proved in accordance with the procedure which Parliament may by law determine.

Every Judge of the Supreme Court before he enters upon his office has to make and subscribe before the President, or some person appointed in that behalf by him, an oath or affirmation that "I will bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution of India as by law established, that I will duly and faithfully and to the best of my ability, knowledge and judgment perform the duties of my office without fear or favour, affection or ill-will and that I will uphold the Constitution and the laws."²³

Salaries, etc., of the Judges. The Judges of the Supreme Court are paid salaries as specified in the Second Schedule of the Constitution: the Chief Justice Rs. 5,000 and any other Judge Rs. 4,000 a month. The salaries of the Supreme Court Judges are, thus, fixed by the Constitution itself and not determined by Parliament. But the President has the power to reduce the salaries of the Judges during the continuance of the Proclamation of Financial Emergency.²⁴

The Judges are also entitled without payment of rent to the use of an official residence. They are further entitled to travelling facilities or allowances when they travel on duty, the right to leave of absence and pension on retirement. The salaries, allowances, and pensions of the Judges are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India²⁵ and are, accordingly, not subject to the vote of Parliament. The privileges, allowances and other rights in respect of leave of absence and pension are fixed by an Act of Parliament, but may not be varied to their disadvantage after their appointment.²⁶

Thus, the Constitution guarantees to the Judges of the Supreme Court both security of service and emoluments. These provisions are intended to make the judiciary independent, impartial, incorruptible, and having the courage and conviction to do the right as defined by law. "Next to permanency in office", observed Alexander Hamilton, "nothing can contribute more to the independence of the Judges than a fixed provision for their support....In the general course of human nature a power over man's subsistence amounts to a power over his will." The maximum pen-

Independence of the Judges. The Constitution ensures the independence of the Judges and there are eight main provisions which safeguard it and are recapitulated for clarity.

(1) Appointment. As already said, the Judges are appointed by the President in consultation with the Chief Justice of India and such other Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts as the President may deem necessary. The Constitution-makers were at pains to avoid any political consideration in the appointment of Judges as the President acts on the advice of his Council of Ministers and, accordingly, they prudently provided the method of consultation with the Judges themselves both of the Supreme Court and the High Courts and whom the President considered eminently suitable to tender advice. Dr. Ambedkar elucidated the point in the Constituent Assembly. He said, "it seems to me, that in the circumstances in which we live today, where the sense of responsibility has not grown to the same extent to which we find in the United Kingdom, it would be dangerous to leave the appointments to be made by the President without any kind of reservation or limitation. Similarly, it seems to me that to make every appointment which the Executive wishes to make to the concurrence of the Legislature is also not a very suitable provision. Apart from its being cumbersome, it also involves the possibility of the appointment being influenced by political pressure and political considerations. The draft article, therefore, steers a middle course. It does not make the President the supreme and the absolute authority in the matter of making appointments. It does not also import the influence of the Legislature. The provision in the article is that there should be consultation of persons who are ex hypothesi well qualified to give proper advice in the matters of this sort."²⁷ In Britain appointments of Judges are made by the Crown whereas in the United States Judges of the Supreme Court are appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate.

(2) Qualifications. Under the Constitution only a citizen of India who has been for at least five years a Judge of a High Court or for ten years an Advocate of a High Court or a person who in the opinion of the President is a distinguished jurist is qualified to be appointed a Judge of the Court. It all aims to achieve high minimum qualifications for appointment to that august office eliminating thereby import of politics. The Constitution of the United States does not state what qualifications are demanded of Judges of the Supreme Court.

(3) Tenure. The age of retirement of a Judge is sixty-five. The Constitution also provides for retired Judges of the Supreme Court to act as a Judge of that Court. The Law Minister while justifying both these provisions said in the Constituent Assembly, "If you fix any age-limit, what you are practically doing is to drive out a man who, notwithstanding the age that we have prescribed, is hale and hearty, sound in mind and sound in body, and capable for a certain number of years of rendering perfectly good service to the State. I entirely agree that sixty-five cannot always be regarded as the zero hour in a man's intellectual ability. Hence, the special provision in the Constitution for appointing a retired Judge. Therefore, there is less possibility of losing the talent of individual people who have already served in the Supreme Court."²⁸ Judges of the Supreme Court in the United States hold office during good behaviour and there has been much criticism of life appointments. By the Act of 1937, Justices may retire, without resigning, after ten continuous years of service and upon reaching the age of 70.

(4) Removal from office. A Judge of the Supreme Court cannot be removed from office except by an order of the President passed after an address by each House of Parliament, supported by a majority of the total membership of that House and by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting, has been presented to the President in the same session for such removal on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity. There can be no other cause for removal and the removal must alone be on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity. Judges in Britain are removed only by joint address of both Houses of Parliament to the Crown. In the United States of America Judges of the Supreme Court can be removed by impeachment.

(5) Remuneration. The Constitution fixes the salary of the Chief Justice at Rs. 5,000 per month and of the other Judges at Rs. 4,000. Each Judge gets a rent-free house and is entitled to certain other allowances and privileges. The maximum pension for a Judge is Rs. 26,000 a year. In case he has not completed seven years' service, he is entitled to Rs. 7,500 a year. The salary, allowances, privileges and other rights of the Judges in respect of leave of absence or pension after retirement cannot be varied to their disadvantage after their appointment, except during the continuance of Financial Emergency when salaries of the Judges may be reduced by a law of Parliament. The salaries and allowances of the Judges are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India and, accordingly, are not subject to the vote of the Lok Sabha.

(6) Immunities of Judges. The Constitution provides that no discussion on the conduct of a Judge in the discharge of his duties shall take place in Parliament. This has been done to ensure independence of the Judges so that they uphold the Constitution and perform their duties without fear or favour. Nor can the actions and decisions of the Judges in their official capacity be subjected to criticism so as to impute motives of any kind. The Supreme Court has the power to initiate contempt proceedings against any alleged offender indulging in malicious and tendentious criticism. In the contempt proceedings against the Editor, Printer and Publisher of The Times of India, the Court held, "No objection could have been taken to the article (editorial), but had it merely preached to Courts of law the sermon of divine detachment. But when it proceeded to attribute improper motives to the Judges it not only transgressed the limits of fair and bona fide criticism, but had a clear tendency to affect the dignity and prestige of this Court. The article in question was thus a gross contempt of Court. It is obvious that if an impression is created in the minds of the public that the judges in the highest court of the land act on extraneous considerations in deciding cases, the confidence of the whole community in the administration of justice is bound to be undermined and no greater mischief than that can possibly be imagined. It was for this reason that the rule was issued against the respondents.²⁹

The Court may also initiate contempt proceeding if an attempt, direct or indirect, is made to prejudice the minds of the Judges in arriving at an impartial and independent decision. In Dixit v. State of U.P., the Court held, "...that the object of writing this paragraph and particularly of publishing it at the time it was actually done was quite clearly to affect the minds of the Judges and deflect them from the strict performance of their duties. The offending passage and the time and the place of its publication certainly tended to hinder or obstruct the due administration of justice and was a contempt of Court."³⁰

(7) Establishment. The Constitution empowers the Supreme Court to have its own establishment and to exercise complete control over it. All appointments of officers and other employees of the Supreme Court are made by the Chief Justice or any other Judge or officer whom he may direct for the purpose. The conditions of service of all categories of such employees are determined by the Court. All administrative expenses, salaries and allowances of these employees as well as other maintenance charges of the Court's establishment are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India and are not subject to the vote of the Lok Sabha.

(8) Prohibitions after retirement. No person who has been a Judge of the Supreme Court is entitled to plead or act in any Court or before any authority in the country. Even if a Judge resigns office he is debarred from pleading.

Supreme Court to be a Court of Record. The Supreme Court is a court of record and has all the powers of such a Court including the power to punish for contempt of itself. A Court of record is a Court whose acts and proceedings are enrolled for perpetual memory and testimony. These records are of such high and super-eminent authority that their truth is not to be called in question in any Court, though the Court of record itself may amend clerical slips and errors. A Court of record has the power to fine and imprison for contempt of its authority.

In the Draft Constitution there was no Article defining the status of the Supreme Court. Article 108 of the Constitution was added at the instance of Dr. Ambedkar. While introducing the amendment he observed, "Sir, the new Article 108 is necessary because we have not made any provision in the Draft Constitution to define the status of the Supreme Court. If the House will turn to Article 129, they will find exactly a similar Article with regard to the High Courts in India. It seems, therefore, necessary that similar provision should be made in the Constitution in order to define the position of the Supreme Court. I do not wish to take much time of the House in saying what the words 'a Court of record' mean. I may briefly say that the Court of record is a Court, the records of which are admitted to be of evidentiary value and they are not to be questioned when they are produced before any Court. That is the meaning of the words 'Court of record'. Then, the second part of Article 108 says that the Court shall have the power to punish for contempt of itself. As a matter of fact, once you make a Court a Court of record by statute, the power to punish for contempt necessarily follows from that position. But it was felt that in view of the fact that in England this power is largely derived from Common Law and as we have no such thing as Common Law in this country, we felt it better to state the whole position in the statute itself."³¹

The two chief characteristics of a Court of record, therefore, are: (1) the proceedings of the Court of record, preserved in its archives, are called records, and are conclusive evidence of that which is recorded by it; and (2) the Court has power to punish for contempt of itself. In Vinayak Shamrao v. Moreshwar Ganesh, Justice Bose observed, "That is the whole point of a Court of record. All its judgments are preserved, and not merely those which are specially approved or favoured. Why? Because they operate as precedents and may be sent for and studied and followed as occasion requires."

JURISDICTION AND POWERS OF THE SUPREME COURT

Powers of the Supreme Court. The powers and functions of the Supreme Court are reflected in its jurisdiction. In his speech at the inaugural sitting of the Federal Court in 1937, Sir Maurice Gwyer, the first Chief Justice of India, said, "But if, obeying the old maxim that it is the part of a good Judge to enlarge his jurisdiction, I have for a moment looked too far into the future, I do not forget the immediate functions of the Courts; and these are of the first importance. Independent of Governments and parties and unaffected by the vicissitudes of politics, its primary duty is to interpret the Constitution and to provide a peaceful and rational solution of differences which, in the absence of an impartial and independent arbiter, might inflame passions and even issue in violence. It will always be our endeavour to look at the Constitution of India, whether in its present form or in any other form which it may assume hereafter, not with the cold eye of the anatomist, but as a living and breathing organism which contains within itself, as all life must, the seeds of future growth and development. And let me add that I hope that no canons of interpretation which we may adopt will ever hamper the free evolution of those constitutional usages and conventions for which indeed the law provides no sanction, but in which, if opportunity is given, the political genius of a people can find its most fruitful and effective expression."

"The Federal Court will declare and interpret the law, and that I am convinced, in no spirit of formal or barren legalism. But I do not wish to be misunderstood. This Court can, and I hope will, secure that those political forces and currents, which alone can give vitality to a Constitution, have free play within the limits of the law; but it cannot under the current of interpretation alter or amend the law; that must be left to other authorities. Nevertheless, within the limits which I have indicated, I do not doubt that the Federal Court can make a unique and perhaps decisive contribution towards the evolution of India into a great and ordered nation, a link between the East and the West, but with a policy and civilization of its own."

It is a lengthy statement, but it succinctly explains the functions of the highest Court of a country and the role it plays in shaping its destinies. The Constitution of India gives both original and appellate jurisdiction to the Supreme Court. It has also consultative or advisory jurisdiction. The original jurisdiction mainly extends to matters regarding the interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution which arise between the Union and the Units or between the States inter se. Its original jurisdiction, also extends to issuing orders in the nature of writs for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights. Beyond this, the Supreme Court has no original jurisdiction in other matters. Its appellate jurisdiction embraces all matters from the High Courts in the States as well as from other specified Tribunals.

ORIGINAL JURISDICTION

1. Jurisdiction relating to disputes. In a federal polity the powers, as said earlier, are demarcated and delimited between the National and State Governments and accordingly, it is imperative that there should be an independent judicial authority which should interpret the Constitution and secure the respective rights of the federation and the federating units. The Constitution of India vests the Supreme Court with the original and exclusive jurisdiction in any dispute:

- (a) between the Government of India and one or more States; or
- (b) between the Government of India and any State or States on one side and one or more States on the other side; or
- (c) between two or more States which involves any question of law or fact on which the existence or extent of a legal right depends.³² That is to say, the disputes between the Union and the States or between the States inter se must relate to some justiciable right. Where the claim made by one of the parties is not dependent on law but on legal considerations, the Supreme Court has no original jurisdiction. Thus, in order to invoke the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court two conditions are necessary (1) as to parties, and (b) as to the nature of the dispute. If these two conditions are not satisfied, a suit cannot be brought before the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court of India, unlike the American Supreme Court,³³ has no original jurisdiction over cases involving ambassadors and Public ministers or treaties.³⁴ Nor can it entertain suits to which citizens are a party. Suits by individuals against the Union or a State can be brought in the ordinary Courts and would come up to the Supreme Court only in appeal, if the provisions relating thereto are satisfied. The Constitution, also, excludes from the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court disputes relating to water of inter-State rivers or river valleys referred to a special statutory tribunal,³⁵ matters referred to the Finance Commission,³⁶ adjustment of certain expenses between the Union and the States,³⁷ and bar to interference by Courts in disputes arising out of certain treaties, agreements, etc.³⁸

2. Jurisdiction in the matter of Fundamental Rights. The Supreme Court has been invested with special jurisdiction and responsibility in the matter of the enforcement of Fundamental Rights³⁹ and in the exercise of this jurisdiction the Court has the power to issue directions or orders or writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari, whichever may be appropriate. The Constitution also provides that Parliament may by law confer on the Supreme Court power to issue directions, orders or writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, etc., for any purposes other than the enforcement of Fundamental Rights.⁴⁰ It would, thus, be clear that in the exercise of its original jurisdiction the Supreme Court may issue directions or orders in the nature of these writs for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights and for other purposes, if so empowered by an Act of Parliament. It must, however, be noted that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to issue directions or orders in the nature of writs for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights is not exclusive. It is concurrent with that of the High Courts.⁴¹ The High Courts are also empowered to issue directions, orders or writs for the enforcement of the Fundamental Rights and for any other purpose. But the Constitution places special responsibility on the Supreme Court when it ordains: "The right to move the Supreme Court by appropriate proceedings for the enforcement of the rights conferred by this part is guaranteed."⁴² No such responsibility is laid on High Courts under Article 226. In Romesh Thapar v. State of Madras the Supreme Court held that Article 32 of the Constitution does not merely confer power on the Supreme Court as Article 226 does on the High Courts, to issue certain writs for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights or for any other purpose as part of its general jurisdiction. Article 32 provides a "guaranteed" remedy for the enforcement of those rights, and this remedial right is itself made a Fundamental Right by being included in the Chapter on Fundamental Rights in the Constitution. The Supreme Court as such constituted is "the protector and guarantor of fundamental rights, and it cannot consistently with the responsibility so laid upon it, refuse to entertain applications seeking protection against infringement of such rights. citizen can resort directly for such relief to the Supreme Court without first resorting to the High Court under Article 226 of the Constitution."

It may further be added that the Supreme Court has made it abundantly clear that remedy under Article 32 can only be permitted in the case of an infringement of a Fundamental Right and cannot be extended to cover cases of infraction of any other constitutional right. In Ramjital v. Income Tax Officer the Supreme Court has held that the immunity from the imposition or collection of taxes by authority of law, which is conferred by Article 265, is not a Fundamental Right and cannot, therefore, be enforced by a petition under Article 32.⁴³

Secondly, the Supreme Court has also laid down that a petition under Article 32 must establish not only that the impugned law is an infringement of a Fundamental Right but that it also affects or invades the Fundamental Right of the petitioner guaranteed by the Constitution. In Charanjital v. Union of India, a shareholder of a company sought to enforce a Fundamental Right of the Company under Article 32, and it was held by the Court that he could not do so unless his own Fundamental Right had been infringed.⁴⁴

The Supreme Court is also empowered to decide any dispute relating to the election of the President or the Vice-President.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION

The Supreme Court also exercises appellate jurisdiction from High Courts and other Tribunals in the States. The Supreme Court is, thus, the final appellate court in the country. An appeal to the Supreme Court is provided in all cases, civil, criminal, or other proceedings, in which a constitutional question is involved.⁴⁵ The Court in Election Commission v. Venkatarao observed: "The whole scheme of the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court clearly indicates that questions relating to the interpretation of the Constitution are placed in a special category irrespective of the nature of the proceedings in which they may arise, and a right of appeal of the widest amplitude is allowed in cases involving such questions." In civil cases there will lie an appeal as of right to the Supreme Court once the certificate as to value is obtained from the High Court.⁴⁶ In criminal cases, too, the appeal lies to the Supreme Court as of right in cases involving death sentence and as specified in clauses (a) and (b) of Article 134(1).⁴⁷ Moreover, the right of the Supreme Court to entertain appeal, by special leave, in any cause or matter determined by any Court in India, except Military Tribunals, is unlimited.⁴⁸

The Supreme Court as the highest Court of appeal stands at the apex of the Indian Judicature. Its appellate jurisdiction is much wider than that of the Supreme Court of the United States which concerns itself only with cases arising out of federal jurisdiction, or the validity of laws. M.C. Setalvad, in his speech at the inauguration of the Supreme Court on January 28, 1950, said: "The writ of this Court will run over territory extending to over two million square miles inhabited by a population of about 300 millions.... It can truly be said that the jurisdiction and powers of this Court in their nature and extent are wider than those exercised by the High Courts of any country in the Commonwealth or by the Supreme Court of the U.S.A.... In fact, the Supreme Court has shown willingness to entertain appeals not only from ordinary courts but also from industrial courts, election tribunals and other quasi-judicial adjudicating bodies.

The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court for purposes of clarity may be discussed under four categories:

(1) Constitutional cases. An appeal lies to the Supreme Court from any judgment, decree or final order of a High Court in India, whether in a civil, criminal or other proceedings, if the High Court certifies that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution.⁴⁹ Where the High Court has refused such a certificate, the Supreme Court may, if it is satisfied that the case involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution, grant special leave to appeal from such judgment, decree or final order.⁵⁰ When a certificate by the High Court or special leave by the Supreme Court has been granted any party in the case may appeal to the Supreme Court on the ground that the High Court has wrongly decided the question of law regarding the interpretation of the Constitution. But the appellant may, with the permission of the Supreme Court, take other grounds also in support of his appeal.⁵¹ And the new ground taken with the permission of the Supreme Court need not be a constitutional ground.

It follows that the decision of the High Court upon the validity of an Act or any other question involving the interpretation of the Constitution shall not be final. The final authority for interpreting the Constitution rests with the Supreme Court, whatever be the nature of the suit or proceedings. It may, however, be noted that the case appealed in the Supreme Court, either when the High Court grants a certificate or where the Supreme Court grants special leave, must involve a question of law and it must be a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution. It must not be a question of fact and it must not be a question of interpretation of any other law which does not involve the interpretation of the Constitution. The minimum number of Judges, who sit for the purpose of deciding any case involving a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution, is fixed by the Constitution at five.⁵² That is, the constitutional Bench of the Supreme Court must consist of at least five Judges.

(2) Appeals in civil matters. Article 133 provides for a right to appeal to the Supreme Court in civil proceedings against a judgment, decree or final order of a High Court if it certifies the case as fit for appeal.⁵³ An appeal also lies on the certificate of a High Court either that the matter in dispute, both at the inception of the suit and when the certificate is sought, is not less than Rs. 20,000,⁵⁴ or that the decision involves a question respecting property of that value. But if the High Court's judgment confirms a judgment of an inferior Court a further certificate that a further question of law is involved is required. A party which secures a certificate that a substantial question of law is involved cannot be debarred from raising a constitutional point.

(3) Appeals in criminal cases. An appeal lies to the Supreme Court from any judgment, final order or sentence in a criminal proceeding of a High Court if it (1) sets aside on appeal an order of acquittal passed by the lower Court and sentences the accused person to death; or (2) has withdrawn for trial before itself a case from a subordinate Court and has, in such trial, convicted the accused and sentenced him to death; or (3) certifies that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court.⁵⁵

The Constitution further authorises Parliament by law to enlarge the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in criminal matters.⁵⁶ But so long as Parliament does not legislate as such the Constitution intends that, except in cases referred to above, the State High Courts shall normally be the final Courts of appeal in criminal matters. Hence, where a High Court grants a certificate that the case is a fit one for appeal to the Supreme Court it should do it only in exceptional cases "where it is manifest that by disregard of legal process or by violation of the principles of natural justice or otherwise, substantial and grave injustice has been done."⁵⁷

(4) Special leave to appeal by the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court may, in its discretion, grant leave to appeal from any judgment, decree or order, etc., in any cause or matter made by any Court or tribunal in India, other than a Court Martial.⁵⁸ This provision gives very wide powers to the Supreme Court. Articles 132 to 135 deal with ordinary appeals to the Supreme Court and they lay down the conditions under which an appeal will ordinarily lie to the Supreme Court. But under Article 136 discretion is conferred on the Supreme Court to grant special leave of appeal from any decision of any Court or tribunal other than a Court Martial. It means that the leave to appeal may be granted notwithstanding the limitations contained in Articles 132 to 135 and notwithstanding that the High Court has refused leave to appeal. The power of the Supreme Court to grant special leave to appeal is, thus, not subject to any constitutional limitation. It is left entirely to the discretion of the Supreme Court. "Broadly speaking," writes Durga Das Basu, "the Supreme Court could exercise this power to give relief to the aggrieved party in cases where the principles of natural justice have been violated, even though the party may have no footing to appeal as of right."⁵⁹

Moreover, the special leave to appeal under the provisions of Article 136 can be not only from a High Court but also from any Court or tribunal in the territory of India. The Supreme Court has, thus, power to grant special leave to appeal even from the judgment of a Court subordinate to a High Court or a tribunal, the duties and functions of which are similar in the nature to those of a Court. In Bharat Bank v. The Employees of the Bharat Bank Justice Fazl Ali observed: "Can we then say that an Industrial Tribunal does not fall within the scope of Article 136? If we go by a mere label, the answer must be in the affirmative. But we have to look further and see what the main functions of a Tribunal are and how it proceeds to discharge those functions. This is necessary because I take it to be implied that before an appeal can lie to this Court from a Tribunal, it must perform some kind of judicial function and partake to some extent of the character of a Court."

It will be, thus, clear that subject to the exception that no appeal lies to the Supreme Court from any judgment, determination, sentence or order passed or made by any court or tribunal constituted by or under any law relating to the Armed Forces, the extraordinary jurisdiction of the Supreme Court extends to all cases and all matters, civil, criminal or otherwise. It has also been held by the Supreme Court, in Raj Krishna Bose v. Binod Kanungo, that even when the Legislature states that the orders of a tribunal under an Act like the Representation of the People Act, shall be conclusive and final, the Court can interfere under Article 136 as the jurisdiction conferred by this Article cannot be taken away or whittled down by the Legislature. The discretion of the Court, so long as this provision remains, is unfettered.

As regards the precise extent of the jurisdiction under Article 136 the Supreme Court has held in Dhakeswari Cotton Mills Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income Tax, that "It is not possible to define with any precision the limitations on the exercise of the discretionary jurisdiction vested in the Supreme Court by the constitutional provision made in Article 136. The limitations, whatever they may be, are implicit in the nature and character of the power itself. It being an exceptional and over-riding power, naturally it has to be exercised sparingly and with caution and only in special and exceptional situations. Beyond that it is not possible to fetter the exercise of this power by any set formula or rules". The Court, accordingly, does not grant special leave to appeal unless it is specifically shown that exceptional and special circumstances exist, that substantial and grave injustice has been done and the case in question presents features of sufficient gravity to warrant a review of the decision appealed against.⁶⁰

Enlargement of the Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The Constitution provides for further enlargement of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court by an Act of Parliament.⁶¹ But if the enlargement of such jurisdiction affects matters on the Union List, the agreement of the State Governments is a prerequisite. The enlargement of powers may be in relation to the original or the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. This power follows from the power of Parliament to legislate with respect to such matters. The ad hoc Committee on Supreme Court observed: "If the Union Legislature is competent to legislate on a certain matter, it is obviously competent to confer judicial power in respect of that matter on a tribunal of its own choice; and if it chooses the Supreme Court for the purpose, the Court will have the jurisdiction so conferred."⁶²

Parliament may by law confer on the Supreme Court power to issue directions, orders or writs for any purpose other than the enforcement of Fundamental Rights.⁶³ It should be noted here that while the power of the Supreme Court to issue directions, orders or writs for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights is conferred by the Constitution itself and is guaranteed by it, the power of the Supreme Court to issue directions, orders or writs for other purposes depends on an Act of Parliament and is consequently subject to regulation by Parliament.

Parliament may by law make provision for conferring on the Supreme Court such ancillary powers as may be necessary to enable it to perform the functions placed upon it under the Constitution. But such law of Parliament must not be inconsistent with any of the provisions of the Constitution.⁶⁴

Power to review its own decisions. Like the highest Courts in other countries the Supreme Court of India, too, is not bound by its own decisions. It can reconsider its own decisions provided that such review is in the interest of the community and justice. An application for review must be filed with the Registrar of the Supreme Court within thirty days its judgment is delivered in appeal and it must briefly and distinctly state the grounds for review. The application for review must also be accompanied by a certificate by a counsel that it is supported by proper grounds. Any such review is undertaken by a larger Bench than the one which passed the original judgment. The Supreme Court's power to review its earlier decisions helps it to correct any decision which may be erroneous.

Enforcement of decrees and orders of the Supreme Court. The decisions of the Supreme Court are binding on all Courts in India.⁶⁵ It may pass any order to do complete justice in any cause or matter before it, and its orders are enforceable throughout the territory of India in such manner as may be prescribed by an Act of Parliament.⁶⁶ All civil and judicial authorities are constitutionally bound to act in aid of the Supreme Court.⁶⁷

The Constitution, accordingly, gives a binding nature to the decisions of the Supreme Court and the supreme and overriding status of these judgments is placed beyond the reach of an ordinary legislative enactment.

Consultative or advisory functions. The Constitution confers on the President the power to refer to the Supreme Court any question of law or fact which in his opinion is of public importance. The President may refer such a question not only where it has actually arisen but also where it appears to the President that it is likely to arise. The President can, accordingly, refer to the Supreme Court the question whether a proposed Bill will be intra vires of the Constitution. Such references are heard by a Bench consisting of at least five Judges and the Court follows the procedure of a regular dispute that comes before it. The opinion of the Court is pronounced in open Court. It may not be a unanimous opinion and the dissenting Judges can give their separate opinion. But the opinion of the Supreme Court is not binding on the President as it is not of the nature of a judicial pronouncement. It is also not obligatory on the Supreme Court to give its opinion; it may or may not.

Under Clause (2) of Article 143 the President may refer to the Supreme Court for its opinion dispute arising out of any treaty, agreement, etc., which had been entered into or executed before the commencement of the Constitution. In the case of such references, it is obligatory for the Supreme Court to give its opinion to the President.

The first reference made by the President to the Supreme Court for its opinion was in 1951. The Court was asked to determine the validity of certain provisions of the Delhi Laws Act, 1912, the Ajmere Marwara (Extension of Laws) Act, 1947 and the Part C States (Laws) Act, 1950. The second reference was on the Kerala Education Bill in 1957. A reference was made in connection with an Indo-Pakistan agreement relating to the exchange of enclaves (Berubari Union). The opinion of the Supreme Court in this case was against the views of the Government of India which had held that Parliament was competent to implement the agreement by an ordinary enactment and amendment of the Constitution was not necessary.

The latest reference made by the President was relating to the resolution of conflict between the Uttar Pradesh Legislative Assembly and the Allahabad High Court. The facts of the case were as follows: a person who had been sentenced for contempt of the Assembly approached the High Court for a writ of habeas corpus. The Assembly summoned to its bar the Judges of the High Court who had issued the rule on the ground that the Judges had been guilty of contempt. The Supreme Court held that in a case involving contempt allegedly committed by a person who is not a member of the Assembly, the High Court can deal with a petition challenging the order of the Legislature. The Court also ruled that a Judge who passes an order on such petition does not commit contempt of the Legislature.

66. Article 142.

67. Article 144.

The advisory function of the Supreme Court is analogous to that possessed by the Privy Council in Britain. Section 4 of the Judicial Committee Act, 1833 provided that His Majesty may refer to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council "any such matter whatsoever as His Majesty shall think fit." The Committee shall, where a reference is made to it, hear and consider the same and advise His Majesty. But dissenting opinions are not delivered in the Privy Council and here the procedure followed in India differs from that of the Privy Council.

Similarly, Section 60 of the Canadian Supreme Court Act, 1906 authorises the Governor-General to refer important questions of law and fact and obtain the opinion of the Supreme Court thereupon. The Supreme Court is bound to entertain and answer the references and the answers are advisory. But the Constitution of the United States does not contain any corresponding provision and the Supreme Court has consistently refused to pronounce advisory opinions upon abstract questions of law. To do so, the Supreme Court held, would be incompatible with the position the Court occupies in the Constitution of the United States.⁶⁸

There had been a good deal of difference of opinion among jurists and political thinkers in India on the advisability of placing a constitutional obligation on the Court to give opinion to the executive on questions of law.⁶⁹ The framers of the Constitution, however, thought it expedient to confer advisory functions on the Supreme Court. The ad hoc Committee on Supreme Court in this connection observed: "Having given our best consideration to the arguments pros and cons, we feel that it will be on the whole better to continue this jurisdiction⁷⁰ even under the new Constitution. It may be assumed that such jurisdiction is scarcely likely to be unnecessarily invoked...."⁷¹ Durga Das Basu objects to the use of the word "jurisdiction". He refers to Halsbury's Laws of England where jurisdiction of a Court is defined as "the authority or power of a Court to hear and determine a cause or complaint presented in a formal way for its decision. The authority conferred on the Supreme Court in this respect, he says, is not the authority to hear any cause or complaint. The Court is required to give its opinion on any question of public importance that may be referred to it by the President. Opinion so given by the Supreme Court is not of the character of judgment and is, therefore, not binding upon the Courts in India, although all such opinions carry great weight and authority with all courts and tribunals.

If the Chairman or any other Member of the Public Service Commission is sought to be removed from his office on grounds of misbehaviour, a reference must be made by the President to the Supreme Court, which will report in favour or against such removal after an inquiry. But a novel extension of the advisory functions of the Supreme Court has recently been observed. The Prime Minister made a statement in Parliament on May 7, 1963, that a Supreme Court Judge would make a quasi-judicial inquiry into the dealings of Minister of Mines and Oils, K.D. Malaviya vis-a-vis Serajuddin and Company.

SUPREME COURT AND JUDICIAL REVIEW

The Supreme Court is the guardian of the Constitution. The power of the Courts to interpret the Constitution and to secure its supremacy is, in fact, inherent in any Constitution which provides government by defined or limited powers. "A limited Constitution...one which contains certain specified exceptions to the legislative authority...can be preserved in practice in no other way than through the medium of the Courts of Justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the Constitution void. Without this, all the reservations of particular rights or privileges amount to nothing."⁷² This point was succinctly elaborated by Chief Justice Marshall of the United States in the famous case of Maybury v. Madison. He observed: "The powers of the Legislature are defined; and that these limits may not be mistaken or forgotten, the Constitution is written....The Constitution is either superior, a paramount law, unchangeable by ordinary means or it is on a level with ordinary legislative acts, and like other acts, is alterable when the legislature shall please to alter it....If the latter part be true, then written Constitutions are absurd attempts on the part of the people to limit a power, in its own illimitable...."

"It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is....If, then, Courts are to regard the Constitution, and the Constitution is superior to any ordinary act of the Legislature, the Constitution and not such ordinary act must govern the case to which they both apply."

The Constitution of the United States does not specifically empower the Supreme Court to declare the constitutionality or otherwise of State or Federal Acts. But the Supreme Court has deduced this power from two important provisions of the Constitution which are, also, indicative of the intention of its framers. Article VI establishes the supremacy of the Constitution and Article III extends the federal judicial power to "all cases, in law and equity arising under this Constitution." Chief Justice Marshall relying upon these provisions, declared in Marbury v. Madison that the Supreme Court determines the constitutionality or otherwise of the laws, Federal and State, and this power with the Supreme Court was a necessary consequence of the supremacy of the Constitution.⁷³ Otherwise the declaration of the supremacy of the Constitution, Marshall concluded, would have no meaning. Since Marshall's decision in 1803, the principle of judicial review is firmly embedded in the American system of government and it has, as Dicey maintained, become a duty of every Judge in the United States to treat as void any enactment which violates the Constitution.

There is no express provision in the Constitution of India declaring the Constitution to be the supreme law of the land. Perhaps, the framers of the Constitution deemed such a declaration superfluous, because they might have believed the power to be clearly enough implied when all the organs of Government, Federal and State, owe their origin to the Constitution and derive powers therefrom, and the Constitution itself cannot be altered except in the manner specifically laid down in the Constitution as provided for in Article 368.

It is, again, true that the Constitution does not expressly empower the Courts to declare laws invalid. But the absence of such a provision in the Constitution does not, as said before, restrict the right of the Courts to decide whether a piece of legislation is void or not. It is a necessary consequence of the supremacy of the Constitution. Moreover, a Federal polity functions within demarcated and delimited spheres. The Constitution, as such, imposes definite limitations on the different organs of Government and exercise of any excess of authority by any organ of Government is transgression of the constitutional limitations and, accordingly, void of the Constitution. It is for the Courts to determine whether any of the constitutional limitations has been exceeded or not.

The Constitution of India imposes two kinds of limitations on the powers of the Legislature: (a) Legislative competence, and (b) Fundamental Rights conferred by Part III of the Constitution.

(a) Legislative Competence. Articles 251 and 254 provide that in case of inconsistency between law made by Parliament and law made by the Legislatures of State, the law made by Parliament prevails and the State law shall be void. There is no corresponding provision nullifying Union law with respect to a matter included in the State List. But Article 246 demarcates the subject matter of laws within the competence of Parliament and the State Legislatures, and these subjects are enumerated in List I and List II. It is, further, provided that Parliament has exclusive power to make laws with respect to the subjects enumerated in the Union List, and the State Legislatures have exclusive power to make laws with respect to subjects enumerated in the State List. The Union Parliament, no doubt, has the power to legislate for the whole or any part of the territory of India under Article 245, but this territorial jurisdiction of Parliament is "subject to the provisions of the Constitution", and the provisions of the Constitution limit the jurisdiction of Parliament to subjects enumerated in the Union List. If Parliament directly makes law with respect to a subject matter included in the State List and it is not "subject to the provisions of the Constitution," it is the duty of the Courts to declare such law of Parliament void.⁷³ Thus, the Courts in India have the power to pronounce upon the validity of laws on the ground of excess of legislative powers, though such powers is vested in the High Court⁷⁴ and the Supreme Court.⁷⁵

(b) Other provisions which limit the powers of Parliament and State Legislatures are those relating to the Fundamental Rights contained in Part III of the Constitution. Article 13 declares that any Law of the Legislature which contravenes any of the provisions of the Part on Fundamental Rights shall be void. The inclusion of Article 13 in the Constitution is, in fact, a matter of abundant caution. Even in the absence of this Article, if any of the Fundamental Rights was infringed by any enactment of the Legislature, the Courts have always the power to declare the enactment, to the extent it transgresses the limits, invalid. Chief Justice Kania observed in Gopalan v. The State of Madras, "The inclusion of Article 13(1) and (2) in the Constitution appears to be a matter of abundant caution. Even in their absence, if any of the Fundamental Rights was infringed by any legislative enactment, the Court has always the power to declare the enactment, to the extent it transgresses the limits, invalid. The existence of Article 13(1) and (2) in the Constitution therefore is not material for the decision of the question what fundamental right is given and to what extent it is permitted to be abridged by the Constitution itself."

The Fundamental Rights conferred by the Constitution are not absolute. They are limited. In some cases the limitations are imposed by the Constitution itself, while others leave it to the Courts to determine the reasonableness of the restrictions. It must, however, be noted that in every case it is the rights which are fundamental and not the limitations. It is the duty of the Supreme Court, therefore, to see that the rights which are intended to be Fundamental are kept Fundamental and if any law has transgressed any of these limitations it is to be ascertained by the Court. If the Court determines that the law exceeds the limits so imposed, it will declare the law to be void. The Court must see that neither Parliament nor the Executive exceed the bounds within which they are confined by the Constitution.

The power of judicial review exercised by the Supreme Court was abundantly made clear by Justice B.K. Mukerjee. "The Constitution of India," His Lordship observed, "is a written Constitution and though it has adopted many of the principles of the English parliamentary system, it has not accepted the English doctrine of the absolute supremacy of Parliament in matters of legislation. In this respect, it has followed the American Constitution and other systems modelled on it. Notwithstanding the representative characters of their political institutions, the Americans regard the limitations imposed by their Constitution upon the action of the Government, both legislative and executive, as essential to the preservation of public and private rights. They serve as a check upon what has been described as the despotism of the majority...."

"In India it is the Constitution that is Supreme and Parliament as well as State Legislatures must not only act within the limits of their respective legislative spheres as demarcated in the three lists occurring in the 75. Articles 131-36.

74. Article 228.

Seventh Schedule to the Constitution, but Part III of the Constitution guarantees to the citizen certain fundamental rights which the legislative authority can on no account transgress. A statute law to be valid, must in all cases be in conformity with the constitutional requirements and it is for the judiciary to decide whether any enactment is constitutional or not".

Apart from being implied in the division of powers between the Union and the States and in the inclusion of the Fundamental Rights, judicial review is explicit in the constitutional provisions that the Supreme Court exercises jurisdiction in cases between the Union and one or more States or the States inter se, that it is the Court of appeal in cases involving interpretation of the Constitution and that the right to move the court for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights is itself a fundamental right.

Judicial review is, therefore, an essential part of the Indian constitutional system and the framers of the Constitution gave an unequivocal expression of it when they described the Supreme Court in the Constituent Assembly as "the Guardian of the Constitution", a "Champion of liberties", "a watch-dog of Democracy," and so on. This is further authenticated by para 5 of the Report of the Drafting Committee which read, "The Drafting Committee had attempted to make these rights (Fundamental Rights) and the limitations to which they must necessarily be subject as definite as possible, since the Courts may have to pronounce upon them." Then, the Judges of the Supreme Court, as also that of the High Courts, make and subscribe an oath and affirmation, before assumption of office "to uphold the Constitution and laws".⁷⁶ No other functionary—"not even the President of India—", cogently observes Dr. Dash, "is administered a similar oath and as such the Judiciary has the solemn duty of upholding the Constitution against attacks from the legislature and the executive and again to uphold the laws against arbitrary action of man in power, in order that there shall be a government by laws and not of men."⁷⁷ Justice S.R. Das also held that "the Court is bound by its oath to uphold the Constitution".

But it does not mean that the scope of the power of the Supreme Court is as extensive as that of the Supreme Court of the United States. This position has been accepted by the Supreme Court itself. There is no "due process of law" clause in the Indian Constitution and, as such, the Supreme Court in India, unlike the American Supreme Court, cannot bring in their own conception of justice and equity. It has no authority to question the wisdom or policy of the law duly made by the Legislature, at the Centre or in the States. Nor can it declare a law unconstitutional on the ground of unjust and oppressive provisions or because it is supposed to violate natural, social or political rights of citizens unless such injustice is prohibited or such rights are guaranteed or protected by the Constitution.

Role of the Supreme Court. The role of the Supreme Court is, indeed, great and its powers wide. The Supreme Court of India, in the words of Alladi Krishnaswami Aiyar, "has more powers than any other Supreme Court in any part of the world". Placed as it is at the apex of a single unified judiciary, it lays down not only the law of the Constitution, but also the general law. Its foremost duty is to see that the laws are fairly administered and justice is denied to none by any Court or tribunal. In addition to ordinary channels of appeal the Constitution confers on the Supreme Court extraordinary powers where justice might require the interference of the Court. The power of the Supreme Court to grant special leave to appeal from the decision of any Court or tribunal, except military tribunals, is not subject to any constitutional limitation. It is entirely the discretion of the Supreme Court and it may give relief to any aggrieved party in cases where the principles of natural justice have been violated.

76. Third Schedule, Parts IV and VIII.

77. Dash, S.C., The Constitution of India, p. 353.

Then, the Supreme Court is a Court of record and has all the powers of such a Court including the power to punish for contempt of itself. The acts and proceedings of a Court of record are of such high and super-eminent authority that their truth is not to be called in question in any Court. This gives a pre-eminent position to the Supreme Court. Its decisions are binding on all Courts in India and the supreme and overriding status of its judgments is placed beyond the reach of an ordinary legislative enactment. And consultative functions of the Supreme Court are important inasmuch as that it can pronounce advisory opinions even upon abstract questions of law.

But the primary duty of the Supreme Court is to interpret the Constitution and declare laws. It interprets the Constitution and determines laws in case of conflict of authority between the Union and the States. In this respect the role of the Indian Supreme Court vitally differs from that of the Supreme Court of the United States. This is obviously for the reason that there is difference in the very nature of the federation in the two countries. The exhaustive enumeration of powers of the Union and the States in the Seventh Schedule of the Indian Constitution, the vesting of residuary powers and the power of issuing directions in the Union and overriding powers in emergencies minimise the possibilities of disputes to arise between the Union and the States and consequently the Supreme Court to assume such extensive powers of judicial review as it is in the United States.

The detailed enumeration of Fundamental Rights in the Constitution and the provisions which enable them to be reasonably restricted renders judicial review inescapable. But the power of invalidating laws vested in the Supreme Court on the ground of contravention of the Fundamental Rights, again, differs from that of the United States' Supreme Court. There is under the Indian Constitution no "due process" clause and no doctrine of "judicial supremacy". The "due process" clause in the Constitution of the United States and the doctrine of "judicial supremacy" have made the American Supreme Court the arbiter of social policy in the United States; a kind of super-legislature which justifies the claim of Chief Justice Hughes that "we are under a Constitution but the Constitution is what the judges say it is." In India, on the other hand, there had hitherto prevailed the doctrine of "legislative supremacy" subject to constitutional limitations. The Court declared an Act void where it was in clear contravention of the constitutional limitations, but it did not question the policy involved in the legislation. While the Court was always vigilant to prevent any encroachment by the Legislature upon the Fundamental Rights, it was yet not a third Chamber sitting in judgment on the policy laid down by the Legislature and embodied in the legislation which the Court was considering. The Supreme Court itself defined its powers in Gopalan v. State of Madras. It held, "In India, the position of the judiciary is somewhere between the Courts in England and the United States no scope in India to play the role of the Supreme Court in the United States." The authority of the Court is to be exercised in such manner that neither Parliament nor the executive exceed the limits set for them by the Constitution; if they do the Supreme Court has the power to halt them.

But the recent decision of the Supreme Court in Golak Nath and Others vs. The State of Punjab that in future Parliament cannot abridge any of the Fundamental Rights through the normal procedures of Constitutional amendment under Article 368 raises issues of far-reaching political and juristic importance. In this case the Court has overruled its own unanimous decision to the contrary. "We would be very reluctant", observed Mr. Justice Wanchoo, in his minority judgment, "to overrule the unanimous decision in the Shankariprasad case or any other unanimous decision by the slender majority of one in a large Bench constituted for the purpose." The decision in this case was reached by a six to five majority and unless it is reversed by the Supreme Court itself on some future date, it must prevail. The two important implications of the majority decision are that a permanent restraint has been placed on Parliament's power to pass any amendment (even where this is supported by a two-thirds majority in Parliament) which has the effect of taking away or abridging the individual's constitutional rights, and, secondly, the Directive Principles of State Policy must be enforced without amending the Fundamental Rights.

Thus, the delicate and difficult problem of adjusting the Fundamental Rights and restrictions thereon to the ever-changing unforeseen social demands will in future be the responsibility of the judiciary. Sir Maurice Gwyer said, in his speech at the inaugural sitting of the Federal Court, that while declaring and interpreting the law the Court should not look at the Constitution "with the cold eye of the anatomist, but as a living and breathing organism which contains within itself, as all life must, the seeds of future growth and development."⁷⁸ In short, the Supreme Court must take into account the "new atmosphere" in Parliament and in the country as Prime Minister Nehru put it while clarifying the Government's position on the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Bill. The words of Sir Maurice Gwyer that "the Federal Court will declare and interpret the law and that I am convinced, in no spirit of formal or barren legalism" describes the precise role of the Supreme Court. M.C. Setalvad, former Attorney-General of India, referring to the decision in Golak Nath case hopes that the Supreme Court itself would work out a solution which would not bar representatives of the people from leading the nation on its onward march of ordered progress and development.⁷⁹

The authority of the Supreme Court of India is intended to be more a check on the executive excess than to legislative acts and the Constitution confers definite powers on it in this respect. In addition to the jurisdiction over illegal acts in appeal, the Supreme Court possesses revisional powers through the judicial writs of certiorari, mandamus, etc. These writs are really the bulwark of the liberties of the people and their utility with the expansion of the province of the State has still more increased. Alladi Krishnaswami Aiyar aptly said that "with the expansion of the sphere of governmental activity, inevitable under modern conditions in spite of the strong criticism of the late Lord Chief Justice of England, the institution of Administrative Tribunals and Agencies invested with judicial or quasi-judicial functions will continue to be a feature of modern government and it has almost become unavoidable. The only safeguard against the abuse of the power vested in such tribunals and bodies is in the ultimate or revisory jurisdiction being vested in the higher courts of the realm and in the Supreme Court."⁸⁰

Another sphere in which the Supreme Court has commendably intervened is that of industrial disputes. A rapidly developing country like India needs well-defined laws governing the relations between the industrial employer and the worker. The various industrial tribunals "who have been given the authority to regulate the relation of the worker with his master have enunciated concept of social justice which are more in the nature of benevolent despotism than a law of the land." This has tended to produce increasing complications thereby retarding the fulfilment of the targets of the Five-Year Plans and the industrial progress of the country. The Supreme Court has so far disposed of finally more than seventy matters connected with industrial disputes. There are standing orders from the Chief Justice that labour matters must get priority in disposal over other civil matters. In a series of judgments relating to the matters so far decided the Supreme Court "has placed the law relevant" to the industrial relations between the employer and the worker, "on a firmer and sounder basis."

The Supreme Court is, thus, the repository of justice and human rights in various spheres. This august body is ever watchful of the activities of all those who have the authority of the Indian citizen. In playing this role, it has with wisdom and dignity defined the rights and obligations of all concerned—the individual, the Legislature and the Executive, "and commands the confidence and respect of the people in a larger measure than any other institution in the country."

Report of the Law Commission. The Report of the Law Commission on the reform of the judicial administration was presented to Parliament on February 25, 1959. The Report is a massive document covering 1,282 pages and is divided into two volumes. Among other things, the Commission has adversely commented on the appointment of the Judges of the Supreme Court and the High Courts. The Commission has held that the best talent among the Judges of the High Courts has not always found its way to the Supreme Court. On the other hand, it is widely felt that "communal and regional considerations and executive influence (exerted from the highest quarters) have been responsible for some appointments." The Commission has deplored this trend and said that "such considerations should not prevail."

Stating that appointments hitherto made to the Supreme Court have been practically confined "to one class of persons", the Commission says that an effort should be made to directly recruit distinguished members of the Bar at a time when they can look forward to a fairly long tenure on the Bench. The person selected should have a tenure of at least ten years in the interests of stability of judicial administration. The Commission, however, is not in favour of raising the retiring age of Judges. As for the tenure of office of the Chief Justice of India, the Commission suggests that the period should be at least five to seven years "as the manifold duties of his office would require some time to familiarise himself with them."

The present practice of appointing the seniormost puisne Judge of the Supreme Court as the Chief Justice of India has been severely criticised by the Law Commission. The Commission feels that this practice "is not desirable, because the duties of the latter require not only a person of ability and experience, but also a competent administrator, capable of handling complex matters." Instead, the Commission has recommended that the most suitable person, whether from the Supreme Court, the Bar or the High Courts, should be chosen as the Chief Justice of India.

As for the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, the Commission feels that it is not necessary to enlarge it in criminal matters. The Commission feels that although the exercise of jurisdiction under Article 136 of the Constitution has prevented grave miscarriage of justice in some cases, yet the Court might be chary of granting special leave freely as such a practice has a tendency to affect the prestige of the High Courts.

With regard to appeals on matters relating to labour disputes, the Commission says that the file of the Supreme Court is clogged with such appeals. The Commission recommends that relief should be given to the Supreme Court by enabling the parties to file appeals in such matters to the High Courts or to a special tribunal constituted for the purpose, without taking away the jurisdiction of the Court under Article 136 of the Constitution. In spite of the increase in the pending cases before the Court, the Commission feels that a further increase in the strength of the Court will have to be deferred for the present. The Court may, in the meantime, consider the desirability of instituting a system of preliminary hearing in Article 32 petitions and of enlarging the powers of a single judge or of a division Bench to deal with contested interlocutory and miscellaneous matters.

No part of the Law Commission's report has attracted such wide attention as its references to the methods of appointment of Judges and their service conditions. The Commission has rightly observed that it is not consistent with the dignity of retired Judges to have chamber practice. It further urges that retired Judges should be barred from Government service except what is provided under Article 128 of the Constitution. The practice of providing retired Judges diplomatic or other posts is plainly undesirable and should be discontinued. These feelings were voiced in both the Houses of Parliament when the Law Commission report was discussed. Dr. H.N. Kunzru pleaded in the Rajya Sabha that retired Judges should not be reappointed in any capacity other than judicial.⁸¹ The issue had also earlier been raised in the Lok Sabha, when demands for grants of the Law Ministry were discussed.⁸²

The Law Minister, A.K. Sen, repudiated in the Lok Sabha⁸³ the finding of the Law Commission that considerations other than merit had weighed with the Government for some appointments in the Supreme Court and the High Courts. The Law Minister declared emphatically: "I consider it my duty to say that never during the last eight or nine years has the Government imposed any of its nominee on the High Court or the Supreme Court." Pandit G.B. Pant, the Home Minister, came out strongly, in the Lok Sabha while winding the debate on his Ministry's demands for grants,⁸⁴ against these observations of the Law Commission. The Home Minister said that since the Constitution came into force 19 judges had been appointed to the Supreme Court and every one of them was nominated and recommended by the Chief Justice of India.

In spite of such categorical repudiations the issue was, again, vehemently raised in Parliament in the debate on the Report of the Law Commission. Repudiating the criticism that the appointment of judges was vitiated by extraneous consideration the Home Minister said, "In this matter our position is unassailable." He, however, expressed his sorrow that certain "myths" had crept into the Law Commission's Report, and though they had been exploded they were still being repeated.⁸⁵ Two important considerations, which weighed in the appointment of Judges, said B.N. Datar, Minister of State for Home Affairs, in the Lok Sabha during the debate on the Bill to provide for the appointment of three more judges to the Supreme Court, were merit and longest period of experience. Most of the Judges, he added, in the High Courts were recruited from the Bar. They acquired sufficient experience before being appointed to the Supreme Court.⁸⁶ Referring to the demand that the members of the Bar should be appointed Supreme Court Judges, the Minister said that the Government had no alternative but to promote High Court judges to the Supreme Court. The Minister disclosed that an offer for appointment had been made to two eminent lawyers, but they had declined.

An impartial judiciary and an efficient and economical legal system are the basic conditions of the Rule of Law. The Government, the Courts, the Bar and the public all have to co-operate to create these conditions. It is really sad that the Law Commission Report had pointed out that communal and regional considerations had prevailed in certain cases in the appointment of even Supreme Court Judges. But to cast reflections on the Judges, even indirectly, is in a way undermining their prestige and impairing the confidence of the people in the judiciary. Recruitment of Judges from the Bar is, no doubt, a fitting measure to foster confidence in the highest Court in the country. It is really regretted, as the Home Minister said in Parliament, that prominent members of the Bar had declined offers to join the Supreme Court evidently on the plea of low salary. Such an attitude did not speak well of the members of the profession. There ought to be a tradition, as in Britain, of the best talent serving the Supreme Court Bench for a term. In Britain, there is a long list of legal talent, such as Lord Reading, Lord Simon, Sir Stafford Cripps and others who served the Bench at great personal sacrifice and only with a view to serving the nation. It is, accordingly, essential that conditions of public awareness of the vital functions of the highest Court of justice in the country should be created.

CHAPTER VII

THE UNION AND THE STATES

Original Units of the Union. Before 1947 there were politically two Indias—British India, governed by the British Crown according to the laws passed, from time to time, by the British Parliament and enactments of the Indian Legislature, and the Indian States, about 600 in number and popularly known as Princely States, under the suzerainty of the British Crown but for the most part under the personal rule of the Princes. In 1950, when the new Constitution of the Sovereign and Independent Republic of India came into being, the Indian States had been liquidated and the country was welded into a single political entity. Three different patterns were discernible in the process of their integration into the Union of India:

(1) 216 States having a population of over 19 millions were merged in the neighbouring Provinces which were designated in the Constitution as Part A States;

(2) 61 States having a population of about 7 millions were constituted into newly Centrally administered units known as Part C States;

(3) 275 States with a population of about 35 millions were integrated to create new administrative units, namely, Part B States of Rajasthan, Madhya Bharat, Travancore-Cochin, Saurashtra and Patiala and East Punjab States Union (PEPSU); and

(4) 3 States, Hyderabad, Jammu and Kashmir and Mysore became Part B States.

The constituent units of the Union of India were, therefore, divided into three categories. Part A States which included Assam, Bihar, Bombay, Madhya Pradesh, Madras, Orissa, Uttar Pradesh, West Bengal and Punjab. The Andhra State was created in 1953 out of Telugu-speaking areas of Madras, thus, making a total of 10. Part B States were 8: Hyderabad, Jammu and Kashmir, Madhya Bharat, Mysore, Patiala and East Punjab States Union, Rajasthan, Saurashtra, and Travancore-Cochin. The State of Jammu and Kashmir, though specified in Part B of the First Schedule, was placed on a special footing and there was a special Article (370) in the Constitution dealing with it. Other Part B States were covered by Article 238 in Part VII of the Constitution.

Part C States consisted of Ajmer, Bhopal, Coorg, Delhi, Himachal Pradesh, Kutch, Manipur, Tripura, and Vindhya Pradesh. Cooch-Bihar, which was originally a Part C State, was subsequently merged with West Bengal. Bilaspur, too, was originally a separate unit in Part C but was afterwards merged in Himachal Pradesh.

Disparate Status of the Constituent Units. A peculiar feature of the Indian Constitution was the disparate status of the constituent units. The Drafting Committee explained the reasons for this disparity. The Committee said, "In Article 1 of the Draft, India has been described a Union of States. For uniformity the Committee has thought it desirable to describe the units of the Union in the new Constitution as States, whether they are known at present as Governors' Provinces, or Chief Commissioners' Provinces or Indian States. Some differences between the units there will undoubtedly remain in the new Constitution, and in order to mark this difference, the Committee has divided the States into three classes: those enumerated in Part I of the First Schedule, those enumerated in Part II, and those enumerated in Part III."¹ The Constitution maintained this difference and established, as said above, three categories of States and gave each category a pattern and status of its own.

The status of Part A and Part B States was based on the concept of federalism, but there were a few significant differences in the governance of the two. The head of a Part A State was a Governor appointed by the President for a period of five years. The head of a Part B State was a Rajpramukh and the office was hereditary in the case of Hyderabad and Mysore. The head of Jammu and Kashmir State was designated Sardar-i-Riyasat and he was elected by the State Legislature for a period of five years. A Rajpramukh of a Union of States was the ruler of one of the principal constituent states and was elected by the Council of Rulers of the States forming that Union. The Rajpramukh was to be recognised by the President. The President also recognised the Sardar-i-Riyasat of Jammu and Kashmir, although it was just a formality. But the main feature that distinguished Part B States from Part A States was the provision contained in Article 371 which vested the Union Government with the authority of exercising general control over the Governments of those States for a period of ten years from the commencement of the Constitution, or for such longer or shorter period as determined by Parliament. It was further provided that Part B States must comply with such particular directions as could be given to them from time to time by the President. And the directions were in practice so ubiquitous and frequent that the control exercised by the Union Government was characterised by many as "the new paramountcy." The State of Mysore was, however, exempted from such a control.²

Part C States which ranked lowest in the hierarchy were administered by the Union Government on a unitary basis. The Constitution clearly specified that the President would administer these States and in administering them he might act through a Lieutenant-Governor or a Chief Commissioner to be appointed by him, or through the Government of a neighbouring State.³ The Constitution further provided that Parliament might create by law or continue by law local legislatures for these States and specify their functions.⁴ Parliament was also authorised to create for each of such States a Council of Advisers or Ministers.⁵ Parliament, accordingly, passed the Government of Part C States Act, 1951, providing for the setting up of the Legislatures and Ministries in Part C States. But this devolution of powers to Legislatures and Governments of Part C States did not detract the Legislative authority of Parliament over those States or from the responsibility of the Union Government to Parliament for their administration. It was really unfederal to deem Part C States as the units of a federation.

Apart from the States of the Union, the Constitution also provided for the administration of the territories in Part D and other territories including the acquired territories but not specified therein. The only territory specified in Part D was the Andaman and Nicobar Islands. A territory, unlike a State, did not form a unit of the Union of India and as such it essentially differed from the States of the Union in matters of representation in the Union Parliament. Representation in the Rajya Sabha was only limited to the States⁶ and a territory being not a unit of the Union did not have representation there. The peoples of the States of the Union had representation in the Lok Sabha by virtue of the Constitution whereas representation of the people of a territory depended upon legislation by Parliament.⁷

A territory was administered by the President through a Chief Commissioner or other authority appointed by him, and by regulations which had the force of an Act of Parliament.⁸ The legislative powers of Parliament also included matters in the State List.⁹ The authority of the Union Government, administrative and legislative, including the regulation-making power, was, thus, complete in all respects.

But public opinion, both within and without the Part B and Part C States, had been consistently critical of this constitutional anomaly which, it was argued, offended the principle of equality of status between the constituent units of a federation. It also contradicted, the critics maintained, the principle of equal rights and opportunities for the people of India. The States Reorganisation Commission was "impressed by the weight of the public sentiment on this matter" and, accordingly, recommended that the existing constitutional disparity between the different units of the Union to disappear as a necessary consequence of reorganisation. "The only rational approach to the problem, in our opinion," observed the Commission, "will be that Indian Union should have primary constituent units having equal status and a uniform relationship with the Centre, except where, for any strategic security or other compelling reasons, it is not practicable to integrate any small area with the territories of a full-fledged unit."¹⁰ The Commission held that the classification of States into three categories was adopted essentially as a transitional expedient and was not intended to be a permanent feature of the constitutional structure of India. Part B States, the Commission recommended, should be equated with Part A States by omitting Article 371 of the Constitution and by abolishing the institution of the Rajpramukh. The institution of the Rajpramukh, observed the Commission, "has a political aspect" and large sections of public opinion view its continuance with disfavour on the ground that it "ill accords with the essentially democratic framework of the country."¹¹

With regard to Part C States, the Commission recommended that with the exception of Delhi, Manipur and Andaman and Nicobar Islands, which should be centrally administered, the remaining States in this category should, to the extent practicable, be merged in the adjoining States.¹² Such of the States as could not be merged in the adjoining areas for security and other imperative considerations should be administered by the Centre as Territories.¹³

According to the States Reorganisation Commission the component units of the Indian Union were, thus, to consist of two categories:

- (a) "States" forming primary federating units of the Union; and
- (b) "Territories" centrally administered.

The Government of India announced on January 16, 1956 its acceptance of the recommendations of the States Reorganisation Commission for the abolition of the constitutional disparity of the different States such as Part A, B and C States, and the abolition of the institution of the Rajpramukh.

THE PROBLEM OF REORGANISATION OF STATES

The Structure of the States. The Provinces which later became States of the Union of India were not shaped by any rational or scientific planning. They were arbitrary creations, the result of expediency and administrative convenience. As the British victories enlarged and their sphere of influence extended the provincial organisation was so devised as to serve two purposes: to uphold the direct authority of the supreme power in areas of economic and strategic importance, and to establish political authority in areas acquired. Of these two, the first was, as the States Reorganisation Commission observed, "obviously the primary objective, and it required the suppression of the traditional, regional and dynastic loyalties. This was sought to be achieved by erasing old frontiers and by creating new provinces which ignored natural affinities and common economic interests."¹⁴ The administrative organisation of the Provinces thus created was so devised as to secure their complete subordination to the Central Government, which acted as an agent of the Home Government in Britain and an instrument of furthering imperial interests.

This "conscious or deliberate design" in the demarcation of territories of administrative units continued till the beginning of the present century when it began to be appreciated that even administrative convenience required compact units with some measure of homogeneity. In the formation of new Provinces, therefore, various factors conducive to the growth of natural units were given due consideration, although all such factors were subordinated to the prime considerations of administrative and military exigencies. Then, began the policy of 'balance and counterpoise' and as a result of that all subsequent territorial changes were made with a view to curbing the rising tide of nationalism in the country and to give to the Muslims, wherever possible, a position of approximate equality if not a position of superiority over the Hindus.

Thus, the Provinces were only, as the Indian Statutory Commission admitted in 1930, "a number of administrative areas which had grown up almost haphazard as the result of conquest, supersession of former rulers or administrative conveniences."¹⁵ To these factors given by the Statutory Commission, may be added the policy of 'balance and counterpoise' so assiduously pursued by the British rulers.

India inherited these "ill-assorted" administrative units on attaining Independence in 1947. The geographical situation became still more confusing on the liquidation of the former Indian States which brought about the adventitious accretion of territories to some of the Provinces by the process of merger and formation of States, Union and Centrally administered areas. The structure of the States of the Union of India at the inauguration of the Republic was, therefore, as the States Reorganisation Commission observed, "partly the result of accident and circumstances and partly a by-product of the historic process of the integration of former Indian States."¹⁶

Need for reorganising the States. The Indian Statutory Commission in 1930 had fully realised the need for reorganising the Provinces before any scheme of federal government could be given a serious consideration. The Commission felt that "the adjustment of provincial boundaries and the creation of proper provincial areas should take place before the new process (of federating) has gone too far. Once the mould has set, any mal-distribution will be still more difficult to correct."¹⁷ The States Reorganisation Commission approvingly referred to this observation of the Statutory Commission and remarked: "This applied in a greater measure to the ill-assorted units representing territories of some of the former Indian States whose future should be considered before vested interests get too strongly entrenched and reasonable settlement becomes difficult."¹⁸ In fact, the resultant units of the Indian Union by the elimination of the former Indian States had become more illogical and their boundaries untenable than what they were even during the British period. The States Reorganisation Commission rightly observed that the desirability of reorganising the States was not only politic, but also emergent because "India, with her programme of large-scale planning, has to think in terms of enduring political units."¹⁹

Rationale of reorganization. The demand for the reorganization of States in the pre-independence days was largely related to the principle of linguistic homogeneity and almost for half a century was equated with it. "This is because", as the States Reorganization Commission observed, "the movement for redistribution of British Indian Provinces was, in a large measure, a direct outcome of the phenomenal development of regional languages in the nineteenth century which led to an emotional integration of different language groups and the development amongst them of a consciousness of being distinct cultural units. When progressive public opinion in India, therefore, crystallised in favour of rationalization of administrative units, the objective was conceived and sought in terms of linguistically homogeneous units." In certain parts of the country it led to the linguistic fanaticism. The mad frenzy exhibited by the people, immediately after the publication of the States Reorganization Report, bears testimony to the fact that linguistic divisions, if viewed in a narrow way, can also be a source of danger. There was a shift in the direction of the view that in considering reorganization of States linguistic principle should be balanced with other relevant factors, such as the unity and security of the country, administrative convenience, financial circumstances and economic progress under programme of national planning, so that the welfare of the people of each constituent unit as well as of the nation as a whole was promoted. But linguistic fanaticism had no end. Maharashtra and Gujarat States came into being on May 1, 1960. Vidarbha is still in the grips of linguistic frenzy and Punjab has been divided into Punjab and Haryana.

The British approach. As it has been observed earlier, during the British period the structure of the administrative units had been largely determined by the accidents and circumstances attending the expansion of the British rule in India. It had not any rational, cultural or economic basis, and all territorial changes were governed, mainly, by imperial interests. The linguistic principle for the formation of Provinces, however, figured "as an ostensible factor" in a letter from Sir Herbert Risley, Home Secretary to the Government of India, to the Government of Bengal, dated December 3, 1903. In this letter was first mooted the proposal for the partition of Bengal. The principle of language figured prominently in the Partition Resolution of 1905 and again in 1911 when Lord Hardinge's Government proposed to the Secretary of State for India the annulment of the partition. But the linguistic principle, as the States Reorganisation Commission correctly remarks, "was pressed into service on these occasions only as a measure of administrative convenience, and to the extent it fitted into a general pattern which was determined by political exigencies. In actual effects, the partition of Bengal involved a flagrant violation of linguistic affinities. The settlement of 1912 also showed little respect for the linguistic principle in that it drew a clear line of distinction between the Bengali Muslims and Bengali Hindus. Both the partitions thus ran counter to the assumption that different linguistic groups constituted distinct units of social feeling with common political and economic interests."²⁰

The authors of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, too, recognised the desirability of redistribution of provincial territories so as to constitute smaller and more homogeneous units, though they did not consider that the time was opportune "to unite the sufficiently difficult task of revising the Constitution of India with the highly controversial labour of simultaneously revising the entire political geography of the country."²¹ While commending the objective of smaller and more homogeneous units, the authors of the Report observed, "We cannot doubt that the business of government would be simplified if administrative units were both smaller and more homogeneous; and when we bear in mind the prospect of the immense burdens of Government of India being transferred to comparatively inexperienced hands, such considerations acquire additional weight. It is also a strong argument in favour of linguistic or racial units of government that, by making it possible to conduct the business of legislation in the vernacular, they would contribute to draw into the arena of public affairs men who were not acquainted with English."²² It is important to note that the Montagu-Chelmsford Report also examined the suggestion for the creation, within the existing Provinces, of sub-provinces on a linguistic and racial basis with a view to provide suitable units for experiments in responsible government. The suggestion was, however, rejected as impracticable, but in Orissa and Bihar, it was recommended that "the possibility of instituting sub-provinces need not be excluded from consideration at a very early date."

The question of redistribution of Provinces was examined by the Indian Statutory Commission. The Commission recognized that the provincial boundaries, as they then existed, embraced in many cases areas and population of no natural affinity and separated those who under any rational scheme of reorganization would be united. It, therefore, strongly recommended the reconstitution of the Provinces and considered it as a necessary preliminary step for setting up a federal system of government in the country. The Commission, no doubt, attached importance to the linguistic principle in the adjustment of the provincial boundaries, but did not regard it as the sole criterion for such a reconstitution. They placed more emphasis on other factors, particularly the agreement amongst the people affected by the changes. Dealing with the factors which should govern redistribution, the Commission observed, "If those who speak the same language form a compact and self-contained area, so situated and endowed as to be able to support its existence as a separate province, there is, no doubt, that the use of a common speech is a strong and natural basis for provincial individuality. But it is not the only test—race, religion, economic interest, geographical contiguity, a due balance between country and town and between coastline and interior, may all be relevant factors. Most important of all perhaps, for practical purposes, is the largest possible measure of general agreement on the changes, proposed, both on the side of the area that is gaining, and on the side of the area that is losing territory."²³ pointed in September 1931, the Orissa Commission, under the Chairmanship of Sir Samuel O'Donnel, to examine and report on the administrative, financial and other consequences of setting up a separate administration for the Oriya-speaking people and to make recommendations regarding its boundaries in the event of separation. The Resolution of the Government of India, thus, accepted the linguistic principle in the creation of the Province of Orissa. But the Samuel O'Donnel Committee while making its recommendation took into consideration all the relevant factors, language, race, the attitude of the people, geographical position, economic interests and administrative convenience with particular emphasis on the wishes of the inhabitants where they could be ascertained. The Joint Parliamentary Committee (1933-34) disregarding all other factors observed that "a separate Province of Orissa would be a most homogeneous Province in the whole of British India, both racially and linguistically."²⁴ The Committee even discounted the financial difficulties involved in the creation of the Province of Orissa and remarked, "the main difficulty here is a financial one, since Orissa is now and may well remain a deficit area. It appears to us that any financial difficulty likely to be caused thereby is not serious enough to outweigh the advantages which will accrue from the separation."²⁵ The Government of India did not accept in entirety the boundaries suggested by the Samuel O'Donnel Committee and the Province of Orissa was created in 1936 with such modifications as were considered desirable.

Sind came into existence in 1936 and ostensibly it was another instance of the acceptance of the linguistic principle. The Indian Statutory Commission while rejecting the claim of Sind for separation from Bombay had observed that there were "grave administrative objections to isolating Sind and depriving it of the powerful backing of Bombay before the future of the Sukkur Barrage is assured and the major adjustments which it will entail have been effected."²⁶ But the Joint Parliamentary Committee accepted its separation on the plea that it had been pressed not merely by the Sindhi Muslims but also by Muslim leaders elsewhere in India. The Committee further observed that "apart from other considerations, the communal difficulties that would arise from attempting to administer Sind from Bombay would be no less great than those which may face a separate Sind administration."²⁷ The birth of Sind was, accordingly, the result of deliberate design of the British Government rather than the vindication of the linguistic principle.

Linguistic Provinces and the Indian National Congress. The Indian National Congress had indirectly supported the linguistic principle when it agitated for annulling the partition of Bengal which divided the Bengali-speaking people into two separate units. But it accepted the linguistic redistribution of Provinces as its official creed and a political objective at the Nagpur session in 1920. In pursuance of this policy the Congress adopted the linguistic basis for its own regional organisation in the following year. In 1927 when the Indian Statutory Commission was appointed it adopted a resolution declaring that "the time has come for the redistribution of Provinces on linguistic basis" and proposed that as a step towards that direction Andhra, Utkal, Sind and Karnataka should be constituted into separate Provinces. Those who supported the resolution went to the extent of suggesting that it was the right of the people speaking the same language and following the same traditions and culture to determine their own future. The reference was, of course, to the peoples' right of self-determination.

The Nehru Committee (1928) of the All-Parties Conference gave to the linguistic principle its whole-hearted support and observed, "If a Province has to educate itself and do its daily work through the medium of its own language, it must necessarily be a linguistic area. If it happens to be a polyglot area difficulties will continually arise and the media of instruction and work will be two or even more languages. Here it becomes most desirable for Provinces to be regrouped on a linguistic basis. Language as a rule corresponds with a special variety of culture, of traditions and literature. In a linguistic area all these factors will help in the general progress of the Province."²⁸ The Committee, while analysing the factors—wishes of the people, language, geographical, economic and financial considerations—which should govern the reorganisation of Provinces, recommended that of all these factors "the main consideration must be the wishes of the people, and the linguistic unity of the area concerned."²⁹

The Congress on three definite occasions between 1927 and 1945 reaffirmed its faith in the linguistic principle. At its Calcutta session in 1937, reiterating its political objective of the linguistic redistribution of Provinces, the Congress urged for the immediate formation of Andhra and Karnataka Provinces. In July 1938, the Congress Working Committee gave a clear assurance to the deputations from Andhra, Karnataka and Kerala that the Congress, when in power and position to do, would undertake the redistribution of Provinces on the basis of language.

But the Congress election manifesto of 1945 sounded a departure from its avowed policy and political objective. While repeating the past assurances, the manifesto declared that the administrative units should be constituted, as far as possible, on a linguistic and cultural basis. This qualification put on the linguistic principle meant that not all the Provinces, but as far as possible, conditions and circumstances permitting in each case, Provinces would be constituted on a linguistic and cultural basis.³⁰ This shift in the Congress policy found its echo in the Constituent Assembly (Legislature) on November 27, 1947 when the Prime Minister,

30. K.M. Munshi writes, "From early in 1946, I raised my voice against the danger of linguism as a distinct menace to national solidarity, and fought the danger as best I could. More powerful voices than mine also spoke about the danger of linguism." Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel characterised the impatient champions of redistribution of Provinces on linguistic basis as "assassins of nationalism." Jawaharlal Nehru said that the principle of linguistic Provinces "produced more conflict and trouble than any kind of peaceful solution to the problem." Munshi, K.M., Indian Constitutional Documents, Vol. I, p. 227.

while conceding the linguistic principle, remarked, "First things must come first and the thing is the security and stability of India." But the clamour inspired by linguism was difficult to resist, and on June 17, 1948, a Commission, presided over by Justice S.K. Dar was appointed by the President of the Constituent Assembly to examine and report on the formation of linguistic Provinces and on the administrative, financial and other consequences flowing therefrom. It will appear from the terms of reference of the Dar Commission that the linguistic principle was not the only basis on which the Commission was to recommend the redistribution of Provincial boundaries. Other factors were as much important as the linguistic factor.

The Dar Commission reported to the Constituent Assembly in December, 1948. It recommended that though the linguistic principle was an important consideration for the demarcation of provincial boundaries, yet it was neither the main nor the exclusive consideration. There were no less important factors of geographical, economic, financial and administrative considerations which must all be given an equal emphasis. After weighing all these factors, the Commission came to the conclusion that it would be inadvisable to undertake reorganisation of any kind in the prevailing circumstances. Linguistic homogeneity, the Commission observed, should be a part of administrative convenience. It further emphasised that all those factors which impeded the growth of nationalism must be outright rejected or should stand over. When the Indian States had completely integrated, the country fully stabilised and nationalism fully established, it was only then, the Commission observed, that the merit of some of the Provinces for reconstitution might be considered.³¹

31. In a memorandum submitted to the Dar Commission, Dr. B.R. Ambedkar stated, "In discussing the question of creating such linguistic Provinces, it would be very short-sighted to omit from one's consideration the fact that the structure of the Government of India of the future is to be cast in a dual form (a) Central Government, and (b) a number of Provincial Governments inextricably inter-linked and interwoven in the discharge of their respective Legislative, Executive and Administrative functions. Before one could agree to the creation of the Linguistic Provinces, one must, therefore, consider the effects which Linguistic Provinces would have on the working of the Central Government.

Among the many effects that may be envisaged, following are obvious:—

(1) Linguistic Provinces will result in creating as many nations as there are groups, with pride in their race, language and literature. The Central Legislature will be a League of Nations and the Central Executive may become a meeting of separate and solidified nations filled with the consciousness of their being separate in culture and therefore in interests. They may develop the mentality of political insubordination, i.e., refusal to obey the majority or of staging walk out. The development of such a mentality is not to be altogether discounted. If such a mentality grows, it may easily make the working of the Central Government impossible.

(2) The creation of Linguistic Provinces would be fatal to the maintenance of the necessary administrative relations between the Centre and the Provinces. If each Province adopts its own language as its official language, the Central Government will have to correspond in as many official languages as there are linguistic Provinces. This must be accepted as an impossible task. How great a deadlock Linguistic Provinces will create in the working of the Government machine can be better understood by studying the effects of Lingu-

Immediately after the Dar Commission had submitted its report, the Congress at its Jaipur session (December 1948) appointed a Committee, consisting of Jawaharlal Nehru, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya, to consider and review in the light of the Dar Commission Report and the new problems that had arisen since Independence, the question of linguistic Provinces. The J.V.P. Committee, as it has come to be known, practically reiterated the recommendations of the Dar Commission. The Committee observed that the Indian National Congress accepted the linguistic principle as the basis of provincial redistribution when it was not in a position to face the implications of its practical application and hence it could not appreciate the consequences emerging therefrom. Now having actually seen the realities of administration and the consequential effects of independence the primary consideration, they emphasised, must be the security, unity and economic prosperity of India and every separatist and disruptive tendency should be rigorously discouraged. Language, the Committee remarked, was not only a binding force but also a separating one. "The old Congress policy of having linguistic Provinces could only be applied after careful thought had been given to each separate case and without creating serious administrative dislocation or mutual conflicts which would jeopardise the political and economic stability of the country."

The Committee, however, admitted that if public sentiment was insistent and overwhelming on the formation of linguistic Provinces, the practicability of such a demand with its implications and consequences must be examined, but subject to two limitations: first, that at least in the beginning the linguistic principle should be applied only to well-defined areas about which there was mutual agreement, and, secondly, that all proposals which had a merit behind them could not be implemented simultaneously. To make a beginning, the Committee proposed that Andhra should be created a separate Province. The Congress Working Committee accepted the J.V.P. Report in April 1949, and approved the formation of the Andhra State. The State of Andhra came into existence on October 1, 1953, and it was the precursor of the shape of things to come.

The Congress adhered to its policy expressed in the J.V.P. Report till 1953. The election manifesto of 1951 declared that the decision about the reorganisation of the States would ultimately depend upon the wishes of the people concerned. Language was, no doubt, the manifesto further stated, an important factor, but there were other factors also, economic, istic Provinces on Judiciary. In the new set up, each Province will have a High Court with the right to hear appeals against the decisions of the lower courts. On the basis of Linguistic Provinces, Courts of each Province, including the High Court, will conduct their proceedings in the language of the Province. What is the Supreme Court to do when its jurisdiction is invoked for rectifying a wrong done by a High Court? The Supreme Court will have to close down. For, if it is to function, every judge of the Supreme Court—I am omitting for the moment the lawyers practising therein—must know the language of every Province, which it is impossible to provide for. It may lead to a break up of India. Instead of remaining united, India may end in becoming Europe—faced with the prospect of chaos and disorder." Munshi, K.M., Indian Constitutional Documents, Vol. I, pp. 228-29.

administrative and financial, which must all be given equal weight. But a significant swing in the Congress policy was witnessed at its Hyderabad session in 1953. The First Five-Year Plan was initiated in 1951 and its successful implementation had become the most important concern of the Government of India and the Congress Party. Planning entailed integration of policy as it embraced the entire life of the nation. No State function, under the circumstances, could be compartmentalised. All were national in scope and though there was virtue in their local administration, yet they must be standardised at high level. All this meant a unified and concerted action. It was, therefore, natural that there should be a change in the Congress policy relating to the reorganisation of the States. The Hyderabad resolution of 1953, accordingly, declared that in considering the reorganisation of the States all relevant factors, such as the unity of India, national security and defence, cultural and linguistic affinities, financial considerations and economic progress both of the State and the Nation as a whole should be borne in mind. C. Rajagopalachari went to the extent as to declare that the linguistic Provinces ideal presented a primitive mentality.

The Congress Working Committee in its resolution in May, 1953, adopted the Congress policy as declared at the Hyderabad session. It was reaffirmed at the Kalyani session in January, 1954. The Kalyani resolution further declared that the unity of India and national security "must be given first priority."

Appointment of the States Reorganisation Commission. On December 22, 1953, the Prime Minister made a statement in Parliament that a "high level commission" would be appointed to "examine objectively and dispassionately" the question of the reorganisation of the States of the Indian Union "so that the welfare of the people of each constituent unit as well as the nation as a whole may be promoted." The Prime Minister while making this announcement referred to the important factors that should be taken into account by the Commission in the reorganisation of the States. He said, "The language and culture of an area have an undoubted importance as they represent a pattern of living which is common in that area. In considering a reorganisation of States, however, there were other important factors which have also to be borne in mind. The first essential consideration is the preservation and strengthening of the unity and security of India. Financial, economic and administrative considerations are almost equally important, not only from the point of view of each State but for the whole nation. India has embarked on a great ordered plan for her economic, cultural and moral progress. Changes which interfere with the successful prosecution of such a National Plan would be harmful to the national interest."³²

The States Reorganisation Commission, consisting of Justice Syed Fazl Ali, Chairman, Dr. Hriday Nath Kunzru and Sardar K.M. Pannikar, members, was appointed under the Resolution of the Government of India in the Ministry of Home Affairs dated December 29, 1953. The terms of reference of the Commission were to "investigate the conditions of the problem, the historical background, the existing situation and the bearing of all important and relevant factors thereon. They will be free to consider any proposal relating to such reorganisation. The Government expect that the Commission would, in the first instance, not go into the details but make recommendations in regard to the broad principles which should govern the solution of this problem; and if they so choose, the broad lines on which particular States should be reorganised and submit interim reports for the consideration of Government."³³

The Commission was required to report to the Government not later than June 30, 1955. The period was subsequently extended to September 30, 1955. The Commission visited 104 places throughout the country and interviewed over 9,000 persons besides receiving 1,52,250 memoranda from individuals, parties and associations denoting the wishes of particular localities to be included within one or the other unit. Out of this bewildering number, the number of "well-considered memoranda", according to the Commission, "did not exceed about 2,000."³⁴ The Commission went round virtually the entire country and "made every effort to get a complete cross-section of public opinion. Care was taken to see that all those who represent public opinion were heard unless they themselves were adverse to expressing any views. The people interviewed included members of political parties, public associations, social workers, journalists, municipal and district board representatives and other people representing cultural, educational, linguistic and local interests. The purpose of the all-India tour was not only to ascertain public opinion but also to make on-the-spot studies of different places and to understand the background of the problem and the popular sentiment on various aspects of reorganisation."³⁵

The Commission submitted its report to the Government of India on September 30, 1955. It was, however, presented to the people on October 10, 1955. On the eve of the Report's publication broadcast, the Prime Minister said, "I was a little surprised at some of the recommendations. I can well imagine that many others who read this report will feel in the same way." Continuing his broadcast, the Prime Minister maintained, "No report or recommendations could possibly satisfy everybody. We have thus to find what is good from the point of view of the country as a whole and has the largest measure of agreement and support."³⁶

Recommendations of the States Reorganisation Commission. The Commission examined the arguments for and against the "appropriateness of the time for undertaking large-scale changes in the existing set-up" and concluded that "the task of redrawing the political map of India must be now undertaken and accomplished without avoidable delay, in the hope that the changes which are brought about will give satisfaction to a substantial majority of the Indian people."³⁷

The perspective in which the Commission formulated their proposals were, thus, summed up by them: "It is the Union of India that is the basis of our nationality. It is in that Union that our hopes for the future are centred. The States are but the limbs of the Union and while we recognise that the limbs must be healthy and strong, and any element of weakness in them should be eradicated, it is the strength and stability of the Union and its capacity to develop and evolve that should be the governing consideration of all changes in the country." In framing their recommendations the Commission was guided by certain broad principles contained in its terms of reference. These were:

- (1) the preservation of the unity and security of India;
- (2) linguistic and cultural homogeneity;
- (3) financial, economic and administrative considerations; and
- (4) the successful working of the national plan.

The Commission examined all the relevant factors and came to the conclusion that it was neither possible nor desirable to reorganise States on the basis of a single test of either language or culture. Linguistic homogeneity, in the opinion of the Commission, was an important factor conducive to administrative efficiency, but it must not be considered as an exclusive and binding principle overriding all other considerations, administrative, financial or political. The Commission emphatically rejected the theory of "one language one State." The idea of a unilingual State breeds a particularist feeling and encourages exclusivism which may tend to blur, if not to obliterate, the feeling of national unity, which is yet to develop into a positive concept. Similarly, the Commission repudiated the "homeland" concept, which as the outcome of the linguistic units, and strongly emphasised "the dangerous character of this doctrine especially from the point of view of our national unity."

The Commission considered each individual case on its merits and the conclusions arrived at were based on the totality of circumstances. It, accordingly, recommended that the constitutional disparity between the constituent units of the Indian Union should disappear, because in any scheme of rational reorganisation the regrouping of territories cannot be undertaken by categories. This meant the equation of Part B States with Part A States and the abolition of the institution of the Rajpramukh. Part C States should be merged with the adjoining States and such as those could not be merged for security and other imperative considerations should be Centrally administered territories. The component units of the Indian Union should, therefore, comprise:

- (i) "States" forming the federating units of the Union; and
- (ii) "Territories" which were to be Centrally administered.

The States proposed by the Commission were: Andhra, Assam, Bihar, Bombay, Jammu and Kashmir, Karnataka, Kerala, Hyderabad, Madhya Pradesh, Madras, Orissa, Punjab, Rajasthan, Uttar Pradesh, Vidarbha and West Bengal; 16 in all. The three Territories proposed were Delhi, Manipur, and the Andaman and Nicobar Islands. The Chairman recommended that Himachal Pradesh should also be a Centrally administered territory, while Sardar Pannikar favoured the creation of a new State of Agra consisting of parts of Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Bharat and Vindhya Pradesh.

Evaluation of the States Reorganisation Commission Report. The first reactions published simultaneously with the Commission's findings were most unfavourable. Even the Prime Minister confessed, on the eve of the Report's publication broadcast, that he was a little surprised at some of the recommendations. Nehru added, "I should like to confer with my colleagues fully in order to clarify my own mind. I can well imagine that many others who read this report will feel the same way."³⁸ The Congress Working Committee's resolution of October 14, 1955, called upon the Congressmen to avoid "the agitational approach" to the Report and not to associate themselves with other parties or groups in any agitation or demands. The chief grouse expressed was the division of the Maharashtra into two States, Vidarbha and Bombay, and splitting of Telugus and residuary Hyderabad. With regard to the Commission's recommendations on Punjab, the Akali leader, Master Tara Singh, characterised them as "a decree of Sikh annihilation."³⁹ But for the moderate elements, all others, the Communists, the Trade Unionists, the Socialists, the Akalis, the Hindu Mahasabha and even Congress circles, were critical of the report.

The task entrusted to the Commission, was no doubt, complicated and controversial. The problem of redrawing States' boundaries so as to accommodate linguistic claims was entrusted to the Commission for solution because it was both distracting and demoralising to have each claim pressed by agitation and won or lost according to the circumstances of the moment. Andhra gave a cue to others and the aspirants for separate linguistic Provinces intensified the popular frenzy. It is true that after achievement of Independence the reorganisation of States had become inevitable. The Congress was committed to it and it had promised to organise Provinces on linguistic basis.⁴⁰ But the experience of eight years after Independence, emergence of new national and international problems, and the launching of the First Five-Year Plan, placed the Congress in a position to appreciate the realities and the actual requirements of the country. Consistent with that attitude the linguistic principle had to be toned down. Linguism cannot be the sole criterion for the formation for a State specially when that State happens to be a constituent unit of a federation. Other factors—geographical, historical, financial and administrative—must all be taken into account in order to produce not only a balance but a harmony which will make for the solidarity and strength of the nation, though there is bound to be different emphasis in different places. Examined from this canon, the States Reorganisation Commission submitted an impartial and balanced Report. It was based on the examination of many facts and the reconciliation of many factors. The Commission rightly observed that no proposals for reorganisation should be determined by a single test. But interested political parties and groups viewed the Report from one single test and that was why they did not see any good in it. The findings of the Commission need be judged and its conclusions appreciated by balancing various elements involved in the scheme of reorganisation while keeping the solidarity of the country as the chief. The problem of reorganisation of the States is really controversial and it is exceedingly difficult to obtain general consent on any aspect of it. The Congress Working Committee in its October 14, 1955 resolution asked for co-operative approach to the Report "and the problems dealt with in it, which should be seen in their entirety."⁴¹ Acharya Kripalani hailed the Report "as a piece of good job" and rightly maintained that no other Commission could have done a better job.⁴² It was not possible for the Commission to satisfy the conflicting and contradictory demands of the different lingual areas, when it has to be remembered that linguistic and other group loyalties have deep roots in the soil and history of India. That has ever been the bane of Indian politics.

40. In his prayer speech on January 25, 1948, a few days before his assassination, Gandhi said, "The Congress had already adopted that principle (linguistic redistribution) and had declared its intention to give effect to it constitutionally as soon as they came to power, as such redistribution would be conducive to the cultural advancement of the country. But such redistribution should not militate against the organic unity of India. Autonomy did not and should not mean disruption, or that hereafter Provinces could go the way they choose, independent of one another and of the Centre. If each Province began to look upon itself as a separate, sovereign unit, India's independence would lose its meaning and with it would vanish the freedom of the various units". Munshi, K.M., Indian Constitutional Documents, Vol. I, pp. 229-30.

Implementation of the Commission's Report. The Report of the Commission was released on October 10, 1955. Since the issues involved in the recommendations of the Commission had created widespread discontent often swayed by sentiments, the Government of India, before formulating their decisions, desired the fullest scope being given to a thorough-going discussion of the Report and opportunities being afforded to every interest concerned to express its views. This eliciting of the public opinion process inundated the Government of India with 1,22,150 memoranda and representations. Besides, the Report was referred, although it was not legally binding to do so, to the Legislatures of all the component units of the Union of India, including the Electoral Colleges of some Part C States, like Kutch, Manipur and Tripura, and discussed by them at length. Parliament gave its most fullest and comprehensive consideration to the Report exceeding 55 hours debate in the Lok Sabha and 41 hours in the Rajya Sabha in the course of which 244 members participated. After a marathon endeavour of discussion, consultation and persuasion, the Government of India was able to present a complete scheme for the reorganisation of the States incorporated in the three draft Bills, which were placed on the table of both Houses of Parliament on March 16, 1956. These Bills were passed in August and September of the same year. The reorganization scheme which came into operation on November 1, 1956, is embodied in the States Reorganisation Act, 1956, Bihar and West Bengal Transfer of Territories Act, 1956, and the Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act, 1956.

The New Political Map of India. As a result of reorganisation the Union of India was to consist of 14 States and 6 Territories. The States were, Andhra Pradesh, Assam, Bihar, Bombay, Kerala, Madhya Pradesh, Madras, Mysore, Orissa, Punjab, Rajasthan, Uttar Pradesh, West Bengal and Jammu and Kashmir. The six Territories were: Delhi, Himachal Pradesh, Manipur, Tripura, the Andaman and Nicobar Islands, and the Laccadive, Minicoy and Amindivi Islands. No territorial change was made in the case of Assam, Orissa, Uttar Pradesh and Jammu and Kashmir. Kerala was a new name, although it represented substantially the old State of Travancore-Cochin. The Kannada-speaking areas which had been brought together retained the name of Mysore. Andhra Pradesh was the combination of the States of Hyderabad and Andhra. The case for an enlarged Andhra State was forcefully stated by the Reorganisation Commission, though they favoured the formation of such a State five years hence. The formation of the new Bombay State was based on a formula suggested by the Commission, though its territorial complex had to be altered to some extent by Parliament so as to consolidate in one State all the Marathi and Gujarati-speaking people. The exclusion of Himachal Pradesh and Tripura from the States of the Punjab and Assam respectively was decided after taking into consideration the wishes of the people and the immediate needs of those areas regarding their economic development.

The political map of India redrawn in 1956 had to be changed on May 1, 1960, when the State of Bombay was bifurcated into Maharashtra and Gujarat. The Union of India, then, consisted of 15 States and 6 Territories. It was again changed on August 1, 1960 when the Prime Minister announced in Parliament the decision of the Government for the creation of Nagaland as a new State—the 16th in the Republic. This decision followed an agreement reached between the Prime Minister of India and the 19-member Naga delegation headed by Dr. Imkongliba Ao, President of the Naga People's Convention. The basis of the talks was 16-point draft constitutional proposals adopted by the Naga People's Convention held at Mokokchung from October 23 to 26, 1959. The Constitution (Thirteenth Amendment) Act, created the State of Nagaland, comprising the territory known as the Naga Hills Tuensang Area and covering an area of about 6,000 square miles inhabited by about 400,000 Nagas. For the present there is one common Governor both for Assam and Nagaland. Certain special powers in regard to financial matters had been vested in the Governor. Once again the political map was changed by creating the seventeenth State of Haryana on November 1, 1966. Punjab was divided into Punjab and Haryana with portions of territory going to Himachal Pradesh—a Union Territory.

Two new features of the scheme of reorganisation, not relatable to the Commission's Report, were the formation of the Zonal Councils and the setting up of Regional Committees of the Legislature in the Punjab and Andhra Pradesh. The Zonal Councils were intended to provide a forum for inter-State co-operation and an effort, in association with the Union Government, for the settlement of inter-State disputes and the formulation of inter-State development plans. The Regional Committees of the Legislature in Punjab and Andhra Pradesh were intended to be set up with the object of catering to the special needs of the regions concerned within the framework of a unified State structure.

New Assam State. The Government of India announced on September 11, 1968, its decision to constitute an autonomous State within the State of Assam consisting of the hill districts of Garo and Khasi and Jowai (Jaintia) in the first instance.⁴³ The autonomous districts of Mikir Hills and North Cachar Hills would be given option to join the autonomous State through a two-thirds majority vote in their respective District Councils. The autonomous State will have a Legislative Assembly and a Council of Ministers. The executive power of the autonomous State will be co-extensive with the subjects assigned to the autonomous State and will vest in the Governor of Assam who will act on the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers of the autonomous State. The subjects which will be transferred exclusively to the autonomous State will include agriculture, forests and fisheries, education (including university education), communications (other than highways important to the state as a whole), medical and public health, local bodies and co-operatives, land, mines, and mineral development, medium and small-scale industries, administration of justice and prison. Matters affecting tribals' interests, such as inheritance, marriages, social customs, appointment and succession of chiefs would also be within the purview of the autonomous state. The autonomous state will also have taxation powers in respect of the subjects assigned to it including land revenue and agricultural income-tax, excise duty, taxes on mineral rights, taxes on goods and passengers and entertainment tax. The autonomous state will also be assigned its relatable share out of the sales tax.

Bills passed by the legislature of the autonomous state will be submitted to the Governor of Assam for his assent and in this matter he will act on the aid and advice of the Council of Ministers of the autonomous State, except where it relates to subjects concurrent to both the legislatures and where its provisions are repugnant to a law passed by the legislature of Assam. The concurrent subjects are in respect of schemes of agriculture of common benefit to the autonomous state and the rest of Assam, conservation of forest in a catchment area of major irrigation, flood-control, hydro-electric and navigation projects, and a few subjects out of the Concurrent List, as provided for in the Constitution, such as acquisition and requisitioning of property, transfer of non-agricultural property, registration of documents, recovery of public dues. Other subjects in the Concurrent List will remain with the State of Assam.

The Government and the Legislature of Assam will continue to exercise all the powers of the State as hitherto in respect of areas other than those constituting the autonomous state. So far as the areas of autonomous state are concerned, the Government and Legislature of Assam will have jurisdiction in respect of certain subjects which are of common importance, such as State high-ways, major projects in the field of irrigation, flood control, drainage, water storage and water power, navigation and major industries. With a view to providing unified administration of public order and police (excluding village and town police assigned to the District Councils under the Constitution) these subjects will also rest with the State of Assam.

43. Gori Hills, the Khasi Hills and the Jowai forming parts of the autonomous State cover a population of 7,90,000.

The hill areas of Assam, including those constituting the autonomous state, will have representation in the Assam Legislature as at present. In choosing the ministers of Assam Cabinet, adequate representation will be given to the areas forming part of the autonomous state and other hill areas.

A Standing Committee consisting of the members of the Assam Legislature from the autonomous state and other hill areas, with a few other members of the Legislature, will be constituted. Bills (excluding Money Bills) in respect of subjects which are of common interest to the State of Assam as a whole, that is, other than the subjects assigned to the autonomous state, will be referred to the Standing Committee for consideration after introduction in the Assam Legislature. The views of the Committee will be taken into account when the Bills come up for consideration in the House.

The Assam High Court, the Assam State Public Service Commission and the Assam State Electricity Board will continue to have jurisdiction in the autonomous state, and there will be joint cadres of All-India Services and some of the higher state services.

One of the basic objectives of reorganisation has been to provide for a unified and co-ordinated approach to the security and development of the north-eastern region as a whole. With this end in view, the Government of India have decided to set up the North-Eastern Council (NEC) consisting of the Governor of Assam and Nagaland as Chairman, the Chief Ministers of Assam, Nagaland and the autonomous state, one Minister from each of these three States, and Chief Commissioners and Chief Ministers of Union Territories in the region. The Council is intended to provide for a unified and co-ordinated approach towards the development of inter-state communications, common irrigation and power and flood controls projects and co-ordinated plans for agricultural production, regional food self-sufficiency and balanced industrial development of the region. The Council will prepare, in respect of these, an integrated plan for the region as a whole. It will also discuss other matters of common interest to the region and suggest suitable measures including appropriate institutional arrangements.

The District Councils will continue with their present powers. In the autonomous state they will be under the control of the Government of that state. The Sixth Schedule of the Constitution will be amended in order to improve the procedures of the District Councils and to enable them to function efficiently and, if necessary, to give them more powers. Shillong will continue to serve as the Headquarters both of the State of Assam and the autonomous state.

The Lok Sabha on April 15, 1969 passed the Constitution (Twenty-second Amendment) Bill by 369 to 28 votes. Except for the Jan Sangh, all parties supported the Bill and all amendments were rejected by voice-vote. The Bill has now become the Constitution Amendment Act. Originally, the Bill was introduced in the Lok Sabha in January 1969. When it was put to vote on March 25, it failed to get the requisite majority and, accordingly, it had to be introduced de novo.

Administration of Union Territories. The Union Territories are centrally administered. The Territorial Councils Act, 1956 provided for the establishment of Territorial Councils in Himachal Pradesh, Manipur and Tripura. These Councils, as also the Corporation of Delhi were elected on the basis of universal adult franchise and were responsible for the conduct of local affairs. They functioned under an elected Chairman and had the power of making bye-laws. They also constituted the Electoral Colleges for the elections to the Rajya Sabha for the Territories. To associate popular elements with the administration of the Centrally administered Territories Advisory Committees were established for the Territories of Himachal Pradesh, Delhi, Manipur and Tripura. The Union Government consulted these Committees in regard to (i) general questions of policy relating to administration of subjects in the State sphere; (ii) all legislative proposals in the State sphere pertaining to the Territories; and (iii) matters relating to the annual financial statement of the Territories.

The Constitution (Fourteenth) Amendment Act (1962) seeks to give Parliament the power to enact laws for the creation of Legislatures and Council of Ministers in the Territories of Himachal Pradesh, Manipur, Tripura, Goa, Daman and Diu and Pondicherry. The Home Minister, while moving the Bill in the Lok Sabha on September 5, 1962 for consideration said that the Government had come to the conclusion that it should give to the Union Territories the same status and the same position as under the old Part C States. Delhi and Andamans have been excluded, the former because of its special status as the national capital and the latter because the islands are still very backward and not in a position to shoulder the responsibilities of representative government. Dealing at length with the position of Delhi, the Home Minister said, "I have always made it clear whenever I have said anything about the set up of Delhi that Delhi should be kept in a different category. I still think the same way."

The Legislatures in these Territories are partly elected and partly nominated. The Councils of Ministers formed therefrom, accordingly, enjoy a limited autonomy and continue to be under the supervisory control of the Centre in financial and other matters. The Act, however, meets the demand of Himachal Pradesh for full status of a State more than half way. The merit of the new measure is that, unlike the old Part C States, some of which had legislatures and ministries and others only advisory councils, all the Union Territories now have an identical set up.

ZONAL COUNCILS

Zones and Zonal Councils. The States Reorganisation Act, 1956 divided the States and the Territories as reorganised (excluding the Andaman and Nicobar Islands and the Laccadive, Minicoy and Amindivi Islands) into five Zones and established a permanent Zonal Council for each of them. The five Zones were:

- (1) the Northern Zone, comprising the States of Punjab, Rajasthan, Jammu and Kashmir, and the Union Territories of Delhi, and Himachal Pradesh;

- (2) the Central Zone, comprising the States of Uttar Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh;
- (3) the Eastern Zone, comprising the States of Bihar, West Bengal, Orissa, Assam and the Union Territories of Manipur and Tripura;
- (4) the Western Zone, comprising the States of Bombay and Mysore; and
- (5) the Southern Zone, comprising the States of Andhra Pradesh, Madras and Kerala with Mysore as a permanent invitee.

With the bifurcation of Bombay State in 1960 the Western Zone comprises Gujarat, Maharashtra and Mysore State. The Northern Zone, after the division of Punjab, now includes the States of Punjab, Haryana, Rajasthan, Jammu and Kashmir and the Union Territories of Delhi and Himachal Pradesh.

Birth of the Idea of Zonal Councils. The idea of Zonal Councils arose from the just and wholesome revulsions against the ugly passions disclosed by the reactions of linguistic communities in connection with the proposals of the States Reorganization Commission. Before concluding his speech on the States Reorganisation Report in the Lok Sabha, on December 21, 1955, the Prime Minister commended to the House the idea of dividing India after reorganisation of States into four or five big areas and setting up an advisory Zonal Council in each of them to "develop the habit of co-operative thinking." The Prime Minister made no secret of what he would do if left to himself. He said, "The more I have thought about it, the more I have been attracted to something which I used to reject previously and which I suppose, is not at all practicable now. That is the division of India into four, five or six major groups regardless of language, but always I will repeat, giving the greatest importance to the languages in those areas. I do not want this to be a step to suppress language, but rather to give it encouragement. That I fear, is a little difficult. We have gone too far in the contrary direction. But I would suggest for the consideration of this House a rather feeble imitation of that. That is, whatever final decisions Parliament arrives at in regard to these States, we may still have what I would call Zonal Councils, for four or five states, as the case may be, having a common council..." The Prime Minister indicated that the Zonal Councils would be advisory bodies. "Let us see how it develops," said Nehru. "Let the Centre be associated with it for dealing with economic problems as well as the multitude of border problems and other problems that might arise."

The feeler thrown by the Prime Minister was received by the House with enthusiastic cheers, and approving nods from some prominent members of the Opposition were also witnessed. The result was that the idea of the Zonal Councils had quick maturity and found expression in the resolution of the Government of India published on January 16, 1956, containing decisions on most of the States Reorganisation Commission's proposals. It stated that "the Government of India propose, simultaneously with the creation of the new States, to establish Zonal Councils, which may deal with matters of common concern to the States in different Zones, including economic planning and questions arising out of reorganisation."

Part III of the States Reorganization Act provided for five Zones and the composition and functions of the Zonal Councils.

A Zonal Council was, accordingly, established for each of the Zones. While forming the division of these Zones several factors, such as the natural divisions of the country, requirements of economic development, cultural and linguistic affinities, means of communications and requirements of security and law and order, were taken into account. The Northern Zone with its headquarters at New Delhi was inaugurated on April 24, 1957, Central Zone with its headquarters at Allahabad in May, 1957, the Eastern Zone with its headquarters at Calcutta on April 30, 1957, the Western Zone with its headquarters at Bombay on September 20, 1957, and the Southern Zone with its headquarters at Madras on July 11, 1957.

Composition of the Zonal Councils. The Zonal Council for each Zone consists of the following members:

- (i) a Union Minister appointed by the President;
- (ii) the Chief Minister of each of the States included in the Zone and two other Ministers of each such State to be nominated by the Governor;
- (iii) where any Union Territory is included in the Zone, one member for each such Territory to be nominated by the President;
- (iv) in the case of the Eastern Zone, the person for the time being holding the office of the Adviser to the Governor of Assam for Tribal Areas.

The Zonal Council for each Zone has also a body of Advisers consisting of:

- (a) one person nominated by the Planning Commission;
- (b) the Chief Secretaries in the States included in the Zone; and
- (c) the Development Commissioners in the States included in the Zone.

The Advisers assist the Zonal Council in the performance of its duties. They also have the right to take part in the discussions of the Council or of any Committee of the Council of which the adviser may be named a member. But no adviser has a right to vote at a meeting of the Council or of any such Committee.

Power to Appoint Committees. A Zonal Council may from time to time by resolution passed at a meeting appoint committees of its members and advisers for performing such functions as may be specified in the resolution. The Council may nominate and associate with any such Committee such Union Ministers or Ministers in the States included in the Zone and officers of the Union Government or State Governments as it may think appropriate. A person associated with a Committee of a Zonal Council has the right to take part in the discussions of the Committee, but without the right to vote. The Advisers of the Council, too, who are members of the Committees, have no right to vote. A Committee so appointed shall observe such rules of procedure in regard to transaction of business at its meetings as the Zonal Council may, with the approval of the Government of India, lay down from time to time.

Staff and office of the Council. The Union Minister nominated by the President to a Zonal Council is its Chairman. The Chief Ministers of the States included in the Zone act as Vice-Chairmen of the Council for that Zone by rotation each holding office for a period of one year at a time. Each Zonal Council has its own Secretariat consisting of a Secretary, a Joint Secretary and such other officers as the Chairman of the Council may consider necessary to appoint. The Chief Secretaries of the States represented in the Zonal Council shall each be the Secretary of the Council by rotation and hold office for a period of one year at a time. The Joint Secretary is chosen from amongst officers not in the service of the States represented in the Council and is appointed by the Chairman of the Council. The Secretariat of each Council is located at such place within the Zone as its Council may determine.

Meetings of the Council. Each Zonal Council meets when summoned by the Chairman. Unless otherwise determined by the Council itself, the Zonal Council for each Zone shall meet in the States included in that Zone by rotation. The Chairman presides at the meeting of the Council and in his absence the Vice-Chairman. If both the Chairman and Vice-Chairman remain absent, any other member chosen by the members present, from amongst themselves, shall preside at a meeting of the Council. The Chairman shall observe such rules of procedure in regard to transaction of business at its meetings as the Council may, with the approval of the Central Government, lay down from time to time.

All questions at a meeting of a Zonal Council are decided by a majority of votes of the members present. In the case of equality of votes, the Chairman or, in his absence, any other person presiding has a casting vote. The proceedings of every meeting of a Council are forwarded to the Union Government and also to each State Government concerned.

Objectives of the Councils. The Councils are deliberative and advisory bodies competent to discuss matters of common interest to some or all of the parties represented in them, namely, the Union, the States or the Union Territories. They may advise the Central Government and the Government of each State concerned as to the action taken on any such matter. It has been provided that the Zonal Councils may in particular discuss and make recommendations regarding:

- (a) any matter of common interest in the field of economic and social planning;
- (b) any matter concerning border disputes, linguistic minorities, and inter-State transport; and
- (c) any matter connected with or arising out of the reorganization of States.

Provision has also been made for the holding of joint meetings of two or more Zonal Councils.

Main Objectives of the Zonal Scheme. When the Constitution of India was being framed some statesmen expressed the view that India should adopt a Unitary rather than a Federal system of Government. They pointed out that Federalism would encourage fissiparous tendencies, make economic planning difficult and prevent administrative uniformity. The framers of the Constitution preferred the Federal to the Unitary system, as they thought that Federalism alone could forge unity of the wide cultural and social diversity in the country and prevent heavy concentration of power which was incompatible with democratic practice. They were, however, not oblivious of the cogency of the arguments of the opponents of Federalism and provided, accordingly, for a federal polity with an exceptionally strong unitary bias.

Two factors have recently led to the revival of the demand for a Unitary form of Government—the bitter controversy and the ugly incidents which followed the publication of the States Reorganisation Report, and the realization that the presence of small States as constituent units of a Federation stands in the way of the effective implementation of development plans. Switching on to the Unitary system of Government is really not the panacea of India's ills at this stage. But to bring about the "emotional integration of India," as Prime Minister Nehru fervently appealed in Parliament, is no doubt the desideratum and the scheme of Zonal Councils is an inspired idea. The Zonal Councils are purely deliberative and advisory bodies intended to foster habits and institutions of economic co-operation and administrative co-ordination among the States within each Zone. The co-operation and co-ordination thus brought about is sure to contribute to the proper integration of the development programmes of the Zones by easing the rigidities and artificial barriers occasioned by the interference of State boundaries. And they may in time prove to be valuable correctives, on the psychological and emotional plane, to the rivalries and separatist tendencies promoted by the more extreme types of linguistic claims. Referring to the Zonal Councils, Pandit Govind Ballabh Pant rightly remarked in Parliament, "while the States have to be carved in accordance with their natural affinities, the supreme objective of strengthening the unity, the cohesion of the nation and the country, has to be given the first and foremost consideration.... So far as the economic and developmental requirements of the country are concerned, these linguistic affinities do not mark the bounds of the various territories. Rivers do not determine their course in accordance with the language of the people who make them their homes. The mines that lie deep down in the bosom of the earth do not follow any regional pattern, much less any linguistic pattern. So for the purpose of economic development at least, if not for anything else, it would be desirable to have councils of this type. Besides, they should serve to heal the wounds that separation may cause in some places." The scheme of Zonal Councils, in brief, is the test in the art of living together. They are the flexible instruments to develop inter-state co-operation and the best example of co-operative Federalism.

The main objectives of the Zonal Scheme can best be described in the words of Pandit Pant which he outlined at the inaugural meeting of Northern Zonal Council:

"(1) to achieve an emotional integration of the country;

- (2) to help in arresting the growth of acute State consciousness, regionalism, linguism and particularist trends;
- (3) to help in removing the after-effects of separation in some cases so that the processes of reorganisation, integration and economic advancement may coalesce and synchronise;
- (4) to enable the Centre and the States, which are dealing increasingly with matters economic and social, to co-operate and exchange ideas and experience in order that uniform policies for the common good of the community are evolved and the ideal of a socialistic society is achieved;
- (5) to co-operate with each other in the successful and speedy execution of major development projects; and
- (6) to secure some kind of political equilibrium between different regions of the country."

Utility of the Zonal Councils. While the scheme of the Zonal Councils has been received generally with enthusiasm, apprehensions have also been expressed that it was too idealistic a venture and that it might result in a Zonal Council either absorbing the participating States, or Councils developing into powerful bodies which would weaken the Centre. But this is not the correct appraisal of the Zonal Councils. The Zonal Councils are deliberative bodies whose task is to advise the Central Government and the participating State Governments for action to be taken in matters of common interest. Their advisory functions are confined to secure better co-ordination within the different Zones, promotion of collective approach and effort to solve problems common to all the units within a Zone. They are intended to foster inter-State concord and thereby strengthen and invigorate the Centre as well as the States. Pandit Pant, the Union Home Minister, clarified this point at the inaugural meeting of the Northern Zonal Council, when he said, "The Councils, as I have already observed, are advisory bodies. But if they are to serve the purpose for which they have been constituted, their recommendations will need to be treated with consideration and respect. The success of this experiment will depend to a large extent on the outlook which the State Governments bring to bear on their deliberations, their ability to appreciate each other's point of view and their readiness to reconcile the State aspect of different problems with their inter-State aspect." The creation of the Zonal Councils will not, therefore, in any way detract from the content of the legislative and executive of the States.

The idea of providing a meeting ground for inter-State co-operation in matters of common interest to States is by no means peculiar to India. In the United States of America, beginning with the inter-State Parole and Probation Compact of 1934, collective State action by means of compacts had been utilised to promote inter-State co-operation. Some agencies created to secure inter-State co-operation include a Legislative Reference Bureau, Inter-State Commissions, Conferences on current governmental problems, Conferences of State executives, administrators and judges and regional associations. In Australia, in the same way, inter-State co-operation had taken various forms.

In India the Zonal idea dates back to Coupland Plan, though it was a device to give economic complexion to certain political plans. After Independence, a Joint Advisory Council for Punjab, PEPSU, and Himachal Pradesh was set up and it continued to be in existence till the Northern Zonal Council came into being. In fact, the Northern Zone, which includes the Punjab, the PEPSU merged into it as a result of the reorganisation of the States, and the Union Territory of Himachal Pradesh, was the pioneer in initiating the Zonal idea. Another such example of regional co-operation was the Bhakra Control Board on which Punjab, PEPSU, Rajasthan and Himachal Pradesh were represented. The Zonal Councils are an inter-State forum where the States are associated with each other to promote and facilitate co-operative efforts towards the economic and social development of each Zone and as a consequence of that towards the unity and welfare of the nation. The unity and welfare of the whole country is the essence of emotional integration of India. Pandit Pant epitomised the whole truth when he said that "no region could prosper unless the security and unity of India were completely ensured and generated for today, for tomorrow and for ever."

Generally, social and economic interests cut across State lines and are of either regional or national concern. Greater co-ordination of social and economic policies and the planned and orderly development of the resources of the country can only be ensured if major policy decisions are not compartmentalised in the State-moulds. They must be fully studied and discussed with their impact on territories contiguous and the people, who are sure to share the weal and woe resulting from such policy decisions. The Madras Finance Minister, C. Subramaniam, while inaugurating the quarterly meeting of the Southern Indian Chamber of Commerce on November 12, 1958, pleaded for Zonal approach while formulating the Third Five-Year Plan for the country. He suggested that instead of assessing the resources of each State separately and planning State-wise a combined and co-ordinated Zonal approach should be made to planning. This, he maintained, besides eliminating regional disparities, would avoid lopsided development of a particular State.⁴⁴ Pandit Pant appealed to the Southern Zonal Council meeting to set the overall economy of the South, rather than of the individual States, as the guiding principle. Pandit Pant's appeal had an effect and the States of Andhra and Madras were knit into economic agreements, which hitherto had taken regional-political colour. Wider economic co-operation was envisaged in the proposal to set up a regional grid linking the power systems of Madras, Andhra, Mysore and Kerala. There are some who entertain serious doubts about the utility of the Zonal Councils in dealing with questions connected with, or arising out of the re-organisation of the States, such as, border disputes, linguistic minorities and inter-State transport. It is further contended that in such matters it is impossible for neighbours to come to agreement by mutual discussion. The Governments of Andhra and Madras have failed to settle even minor border disputes. Maharashtra and Mysore are still waging their endless controversy. A proposal that Nehru should convene a conference of the Chief Ministers of Andhra, Maharashtra and Mysore for a discussion of Krishna-Godavari waters dispute and then suggest his own solution was mooted, but without any tangible result.⁴⁵ In fact, disputes, even minor, about persons and places arouse more passion and create a deep sense of regional loyalties which had ever been the bane of Indian politics. At one occasion Nehru went so far as to suggest that if there was a choice between national unity and the Third Plan he would abandon the plan rather than risk disunity.

The Congress President Sanjiva Reddy, in his address to the Congress Session at Bhavnagar, suggested that the separatist tendencies could best be countered by arming the five Zonal Councils, which had so far served as advisory bodies, with the authority to "back up their solutions and implement them." He maintained that "Decisions taken at Delhi may not take fully into account all the local needs.... Decisions at the State level may not reflect fully the needs of national importance. It is obvious therefore that a via media establishment is needed to decide the problems at an intermediary level."

The first and somewhat critical reaction to the Congress President's suggestion of giving statutory powers to the Zonal Councils came from the Praja Socialist Party Chairman, Asoka Mehta.⁴⁶ He expressed the view that though seemingly attractive Sanjiva Reddy's proposal for stronger Zonal Councils was not without dangers. The alternative solution that Mehta offered was to build a strong centre with special powers to protect the rights of the linguistic minorities. "The proper approach, in our opinion," he maintained, "is to strengthen the Centre. The Union Government should have wider concurrent powers and be given direct responsibility in certain matters, such as protecting the legitimate rights of linguistic minorities in the States. The Union Government should have the powers and the will to arbitrate in inter-State disputes quickly and firmly...."

The Punjab delegates to the Bhavnagar Congress Session supported the idea of a non-official resolution recommending the division of India into five Zones superseding the existing constituent States. Recently, a few more have spoken up and asked for a reversal of the policy of linguistic states. Virendra Patel, the Chief Minister of Mysore, has suggested the formation of Zonal States; earlier S. Nijalingappa, the Congress President, had spoken of the disintegrating impact of linguism on India's unity. V.V. Giri, as Vice-President of India, expressed the opinion that linguistic States must go. The Working Committee of the Jan Sangh on April 24, 1969, demanded constitution of a States Reorganisation Commission to examine in its entirety the question of redemarcation of State boundaries to reconcile the regional aspirations with the paramount need of national unity and security.

This is, no doubt, a gigantic task and it is doubtful now if the States will agree to the redistribution of their boundaries on basis other than language or abdicate any of their powers to the Zonal Councils, as was suggested by Sanjiva Reddy. In any case the arming of the five Zonal Councils with wider powers is not likely to avert the main danger which India faces today. The threat of the disruptive forces at work, and which is much wider than ever before, can be countered only by creating a national consciousness that cuts across communal, casteist and linguistic divisions.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE UNION AND THE STATES

Legislative Relations. The essence of federalism is the division of powers between the National Government and the State Governments. Within the sphere allotted to them, the National and State Governments are supreme and their authority is co-ordinate. Conflict of jurisdiction arising between the two sets of Government is decided by an independent judiciary, Federal or Supreme Court.

The scheme of distribution of powers in each federation is determined by the peculiar political conditions under which it comes into existence. In the United States when the sovereign States agreed to federate, they were anxious not to permit their complete subordination to the National Government. They would agree to vest it with certain specified powers of common concern and national importance retaining the rest for themselves. The Constitution of the United States, accordingly, contains only one List of subjects meant to be exercised by the Central Government and the residuary powers remain with the States.⁴⁷ Through interpretation of the Constitution a field of concurrent legislation has developed and the powers which have not been exclusively granted to the National Government, constitute the current field of legislation. On some matters such as bankruptcy, weights and measures, harbour regulations, etc., both Congress and the State Legislatures may legislate, but State legislation "shall take effect only in the absence of Federal legislation."⁴⁸ But the Canadian Constitution is just the other way. The Canadians had before them the experiences of the working of the American Federal system extending to nearly about a century. They had also witnessed the American Civil War of 1861, and carefully watched the long and bitter controversy over rights of the States which culminated in the tragic Civil War. It was natural, therefore, that they would have agreed to make the Centre strong and vest it with more powers. The North America Act, 1867, contains two Sections or Lists in which the powers of the Centre and the Units (Provinces) are enumerated, leaving the residuary powers to the Dominion Parliament. Besides, the Dominion Government is authorised by the opening para of Section 91 "to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the class of subjects by the Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of Provinces..." Section 93 of the Act gives the Provinces control over education subject to the intervention of the Dominion Government in some specific cases. Section 92 specifies the exclusive powers of the Provinces. There is also a small Concurrent List comprising agriculture, and immigration and in case of conflict the Dominion Law prevails. Old age pension was added in the Concurrent List in 1951, but the Dominion Law does not affect in any form the existing or any future Provincial Law. Australia broadly follows the American system, because the problem of federation there was different from that in Canada and much more like that of the United States. Political conditions prevailing there permitted its adoption. The Australian Constitution contains only one List enumerating the powers of the Federal Government and the powers of the States are residual.

47. The Tenth Amendment reads, "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited to it by the States, are reserved to the States respectively." The prohibitions imposed on the National Government are stated in Article 1, Section 9, and first ten Amendments, and the restrictions imposed on the State Governments are enumerated in Article 1, Section 10.

The Government of India Act, 1935 contained three Lists—Federal, Provincial and Concurrent—and the residuary powers were given to the Governor-General in his discretion. The method of distribution of powers adopted was neither American nor Canadian. It was necessitated by the political conditions then prevailing in India. In the three Round Table Conferences preceding the enactment of the Act of 1935, there was a substantial difference of opinion between the Hindus and the Muslims with regard to the allocation of residuary powers. The Hindus favouring a strong Centre insisted that residuary powers should be given to it whereas the Muslims favoured strong Provinces and demanded that residuary powers should go to them. To solve these conflicting claims, the device adopted was to enumerate exhaustively the exclusive powers of the Centre and the Provinces so as to reduce “the residue to proportions so negligible that the apprehensions which have been felt on one side or the other are without foundations.”⁴⁹ The Joint Parliamentary Committee explained the need for having a Concurrent List. It said, “Experience has shown, both in India and elsewhere, that there are certain matters which cannot be allocated exclusively either to a Central or to a Provincial Legislature, and for which, though it is often desirable that Provincial Legislature should make provision, it is equally necessary that the Central Legislature should also have a legislative jurisdiction, to enable it in some cases to secure uniformity in the main principles of law throughout the country, in others to guide and encourage provincial efforts, and in others, again to provide remedies for mischiefs arising in the provincial sphere but extending or liable to extend beyond the boundaries of a single province.”⁵⁰

The scheme and principle of distribution of powers in the Constitution of India substantially remain the same as it was under the Government of India Act, 1935. There are three Lists: the Union List, the State List and the Concurrent List. Parliament has the exclusive power of making laws with respect to matters which are enumerated in the Union List and contains 97 subjects. The State Legislatures have the exclusive powers of making laws with respect to matters enumerated in the State List and contains 66 subjects. As regards matters which are enumerated in the Concurrent List, 47 in number, both Parliament and State Legislatures have concurrent powers with the provision that, in case of a conflict, the Central Law must, to the extent of repugnancy, prevail over the State Law. If, however, the State Law has been reserved for, and received the President's assent, it will prevail over the Central Law⁵¹ unless and until Parliament passes a new law overruling the provisions of the State Law.⁵²

The residuary powers, the Constitution gives to Parliament.⁵³ This is unlike the Government of India Act, 1935 which vested residuary powers in the Governor-General who could in his discretion assign to the Centre or the Provinces legislative power regarding subjects not mentioned in any List.

The enumeration of subjects in the three Lists is extremely detailed and an attempt has been made to exhaust all the activities of ordinary Government.

While the Constitution confers exclusive jurisdiction upon the State Legislatures to make laws with respect to matters enumerated in the State List,⁵⁴ Articles 249—253 provide certain cases in which Parliament is empowered to legislate on subjects contained in the State List. Normally, such a jurisdiction to Parliament is forbidden. Article 249 empowers Parliament to legislate with respect to a matter in the State List whenever the Rajya Sabha (Council of States) passes a resolution supported by a two-thirds majority present and voting that such legislation by Parliament is necessary or expedient in the national interest. Laws so made by Parliament remain in force for a period not exceeding one year unless continued under a fresh resolution and shall cease to have effect on the expiration of a period of six months after the resolution has ceased to be in force.

The division of powers in the American Constitution is rigid and no change can be made thereto without amending the Constitution. In Australia, too, amendment of the Constitution is required for transferring to Commonwealth Parliament any of the powers substantially given to the State by the Constitution. In Canada, the Dominion Parliament is competent to make laws on matters provincial or local when they assume a national importance. But it has no power to legislate on a matter which comes directly within the exclusive Provincial List. Whenever any matter assumes a national importance, the Dominion Parliament can legislate for "the peace, order and good Government of Canada"⁵⁵ and it is for the Courts, and not Parliament, to determine whether necessity for such assumption of powers by Parliament exists or not. In India, on the other hand, one of the Houses of Parliament determines that a subject has assumed national importance and when the Rajya Sabha passes a resolution to that effect with the requisite majority, Parliament becomes competent to invade the State List to the extent that the resolution goes. The power of Parliament in this respect is, no doubt, temporary, yet it is indicative of the tendency of the Constitution towards unitariness. No other federal Constitution makes a similar provision as it is not in conformity with the federal principle.

The Constitution reserves in the Union the power to invest itself with overriding powers in emergencies. Article 250 empowers Parliament to legislate with respect to any matter in the State List during the operation of the Proclamation of Emergency. The Proclamation of Emergency may be issued, if the President is satisfied that the security of India is threatened either by war or internal disturbance or even if the threat of either of these exists.⁵⁶ It is for Parliament, and not for Courts, to determine the expediency of Proclamation of Emergency. And once the Proclamation of Emergency comes into operation, the Constitution, for the period of Emergency, becomes in effect unitary and parliament can legislate on any matter in all the three Lists. The executive authority of the Union being co-ordinate with its legislative authority, during the operation of Emergency the Union Government has the power to give directions to the State Governments how they should exercise their executive authority.⁵⁷

The Constitution, also, provides for emergency powers to deal with a breakdown of the Constitution in a State.⁵⁸ If the President is satisfied, on the report of a Governor, that Government cannot be carried on in his State in accordance with the Constitution or even if a State Government disobeys the direction of the Union Government,⁵⁹ the President may issue a Proclamation transferring the legislative powers of the State to Parliament. Such a Proclamation also requires Parliamentary approval, but this will give the Proclamation validity for six months unless a further resolution of Parliament has been passed within that period.

The exclusiveness of the State List is further modified by Article 252 which empowers Parliament to legislate on any subject in the State List, if the Legislatures of two or more States resolve to make a request to Parliament to that effect. The laws so made by Parliament can also apply to other States which may adopt them after expressing their request in the same manner. Once Parliament is empowered to legislate at the request of the State Legislatures, the jurisdiction of the latter is excluded from those matters. "This power", writes Joshi, "itself shows that the federal principle was not strong; otherwise such a power could not have been granted. It further indicates the diffidence of the State Legislatures even as regards their legislative sphere. This provision is another indication of the unitariness of the Constitution."⁶⁰

Entry number 14 of the Union List confers on Parliament exclusive power to make laws with respect to "entering into treaties and agreements with foreign countries and implementing of treaties, agreements and conventions with foreign countries." Article 253 empowers Parliament to make any law for the whole or any part of the territory, of India for implementing any treaty, agreement or convention with any other country or countries or any decision made at any international conference, association or other body. Thus, in order to implement any treaty or agreement with a foreign country, Parliament's power of legislation is not confined to matters on the Union List and the Concurrent List. It can pass an Act dealing with a matter on the State List if implementation of any kind of international agreement necessitates it. And the law so passed by Parliament shall not be invalidated on the ground that it contains some provisions relating to the matters on the State List. This is really a sweeping power and it has no parallel even in Canada. In Attorney-General of Canada vs. Attorney-General of Ontario the Privy Council held that "in a federal state where legislative authority is limited by a constitutional document or is divided up between different legislatures in accordance with the classes of subject-matter submitted for legislation...the obligation imposed by treaty may have to be performed, if at all, by several legislatures; and the executive have the task of obtaining the legislative assent not of the parliament to whom they may be responsible but possibly of several parliaments to whom they stand in no direct relation. The question is not how the obligation is formed, that is the function of the executive but how is the obligation to be performed and that depends upon the authority of the competent legislature or legislatures."

ADMINISTRATIVE RELATIONS

Relation between Union and States and between States 'inter se'. Co-operation and goodwill are the two essential prerequisites which minimise friction inherent in a dual system of government and ensure smooth and proper functioning of the administrative machinery. But there are always in every federal scheme of government certain forces, seen or unseen, at work which if unchecked by law encourage disruptive tendencies and jeopardise the solidarity of the State. Provision has also to be made for meeting emergencies, which either may emerge from the actual working of the federal scheme or to meet the new conditions and circumstances which may result from differences arising between the independent functioning of authority in the two sets of government. Finally, the National Government is responsible for the peace, order, good government and security of the country as a whole. All these factors necessitate co-ordination in the administrative sphere of the Centre and the States. In fact, the success and strength of the federal polity depends upon the maximum of co-operation and co-ordination between each set of authorities and between States inter se.

Administrative relations between the Union and the States of a federation may be examined under two headings: (1) techniques of Union control over States; and (2) inter-State comity.

Techniques of Union Control over the States. During emergencies the control of the Central Government over the States in India is complete in all respects, and the Constitution will work as if it were a unitary government. During normal times the Central Government exercises control over the States through different methods and agencies. This may be examined under the following heads: (i) directions to the State Governments, (ii) delegation of functions, and (iii) all-India services.

(i) Directions to the State Governments. The idea of the Central Government giving directions to the State Governments is foreign and repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The framers of the Indian Constitution borrowed it from the Government of India Act, 1935,

The Constitution, accordingly, gives the Union Government the power to give directions to the State Governments.

(a) A constitutional obligation is placed on the State Governments (1) to ensure compliance with the laws made by Parliament,⁶¹ and (2) not to impede or prejudice the exercise of the executive power of the Union within their respective territories.⁶² In either case the Union Government may give for the purpose such directions to a State as may appear to it to be necessary. When both these provisions are put together they unprecedentedly widen the authority of the Government of India, for they restrict, both positively and negatively, the executive authority of the States and give ample scope to the Government of India for exercising its executive functions unrestricted in any way. The sanction behind the directions of the Government of India is the provision of Article 365 which reads, "where any State has failed to comply with, or to give effect to, any directions given in the exercise of the executive power of the Union under any of the provisions of this Constitution, it shall be lawful for the President to hold that a situation has arisen in which the Government of the State cannot be carried on in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution." It means that if a State has failed to comply with the directions of the Union, the President may declare that there has taken place a breakdown of the Constitution in the State under Article 356 and he may assume to himself all or any of the functions of the Government of the State.

But Kerala Government refused to comply with the provisions of the Essential Services Maintenance Ordinance 1968, and regretted its inability to issue instructions to district authorities to take suitable action, including arrest of and institution of cases, against persons instigating employees who were willing to work. The attention of the Kerala Government was thereupon invited to Article 256 of the Constitution. The State Government informed the Government of India that all action necessary and found suitable was being taken, keeping in view the provisions of Article 256. Clarifying the position taken by the Kerala Government, the Chief Minister, E.M.S. Namboodripad said that his Government had only used its discretion in the application of the Ordinance in regard to arrest and prosecution of those inciting or taking part in the September 19, 1968, token strike. The attitude of the State Government left no option for the Government of India but to post Central Reserve Police without previously intimating the State Government.

(b) The Union may give directions to a State as to the (1) construction and maintenance of the means of communications declared to be of national or military importance, and (2) measures to be taken for the protection of the railways in the States, provided that in either case compensation shall be paid to the States in respect of the extra cost incurred for the purpose.

Communications, generally, are a State subject, vide Entry 13, List II—State List. Article 257 (2) empowers the Union Government to give directions to a State to construct and maintain means of communication which the former may declare to be of national or military importance. It means, that while the Government of India may itself construct and maintain means of communication necessary for the exercise of its powers over naval, military and air force works [Entry 4, List I—Union List and proviso to Article 257 (2)], it may also direct the States to construct and maintain such means of communication which may be important from the national or military standpoint.

61. Article 256.

62. Article 257.

Similarly, railways are a Union subject and Police, including Railway Police, is a State subject. The executive power of the Union to give directions to a State for the protection of the railways includes the power of the Government of India to give directions to a State Government to employ its police force for the proper protection of the railways and their property and, if necessary, to employ additional police subject to contribution by the Union as provided for in Article 257 (4).

(ii) Delegation of functions. Article 258 provides that the President may with the consent of the Government of a State entrust either conditionally or unconditionally to that Government or its officers functions in relation to any matter to which the executive power of the Union extends. Parliament may also by law entrust functions to the State Government or its officers in relation to any matter over which the State Legislature has no jurisdiction. In such a case there shall be paid to the State compensation for the extra cost of administration incurred by the State in connection with the exercise of those powers and duties.

According to Article 258-A, inserted by the Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act, 1956, the Governor of a State may, with the consent of the Government of India, entrust to that Government or its officers functions in relation to any matter to which the executive power of the State extends. The Constitution, thus, provides for inter-level delegation of functions.

Mention may also be made that Article 355 imposes a duty on the Union to protect every State against external aggression and internal disturbance and to ensure that the Government of every State is carried on in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution.

(iii) All-India Services. As under a dual polity there are two sets of Government, it follows that there shall be two separate public services, one for the States and the other for the Union to administer their respective laws. The Constitution of India provides for separate public services to administer their respective affairs. But the Constitution also provides that the Indian Administrative Service and the Indian Police Service are common services to the Union and the States. Parliament is further empowered, under Article 312, to create more of such all-India Services whenever it is expedient in the national interest to create them.⁶³ This is an extraordinary feature of the Indian Constitution. Dr. Ambedkar explained the reasons for creating all-India services and his reasons also explained the extent of control which the Union Government can exercise over the administration of the States. Dr. Ambedkar said. "The dual polity which is inherent in a federal system is followed in all federations by a dual service. In all federations, there is a Federal Civil Service and a State Civil Service. The Indian Federation, though a dual polity, will have a dual service, but with one exception. It is recognised that in every country there are certain posts in its administrative set-up which might be called strategic from the point of view of maintaining the standard of administration....There can be no doubt that the standard of administration depends upon the calibre of the civil servants who are appointed to these strategic posts....The Constitution provides that without depriving the States of their right to form their own civil services there shall be an all-India service recruited on an all-India basis with common qualifications, with uniform scale of pay and members of which alone could be appointed to these strategic posts throughout the Union."

The service conditions of All-India Services are regulated by Central Rules and Regulations, and their ultimate responsibility lies to the Government of India. But they hold key posts in both Central and State Governments and, thus, help to ensure integration of administration throughout the Union of India. It is, accordingly, a device to exercise certain control over the State Government so that they do not "run in flat contradiction to the spirit of the constitution or the important national policies."⁶⁴

Grants-in-aid. The general principle of federal finance is that both the Union Government and the State Governments should be independent of each other as regards their financial resources. But such a rigid application of this principle is not possible and every federal constitution provides for the division of the proceeds of certain taxes between the federal government and the federating governments. Even such an arrangement has not been found adequate to meet the ever-expanding needs of the federating governments and they have to rely upon the grants-in-aid from the Central Government. Article 275 of the Constitution authorizes Parliament to make such grants as it may deem necessary to any State which is in need of assistance and such sums of grants are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India. Apart from the general power of making grants by Parliament to States in need of financial assistance, the Constitution itself provides for specific grants on two matters: (1) grants-in-aid charged on the Consolidated Fund of India for schemes of development, for the welfare of the Scheduled Tribes and for raising the level of administration of Scheduled Areas, as may have been undertaken by a State with the approval of the Government of India; and (2) grants-in-aid to the State of Assam for the development of the Tribal Areas in that State.

Financial assistance or the grants-in-aid are a prolific source of Central control and direction. They are made subject to conditions and are followed by regulatory authority of the Union Government. It is a matter of common experience that one who gives money has a loud voice in calling the tune.

Inter-State Comity. Though the federating units are autonomous within their own territorial limits, no unit can lead an unconnected and isolated life from the rest. In fact, the very exercise of its autonomy requires recognition of certain principles of mutual co-operation. All federal Constitutions, accordingly, lay down certain rules of comity which the units must observe in their relation to one another. The Constitution of India empowers Parliament to provide for the adjudication of any dispute or complaint with respect to the use, distribution, or control of the waters of, or in, any inter-State river or river valley. Parliament may by law also provide that neither the Supreme Court nor any other Court shall exercise any jurisdiction in respect of any such dispute or complaint.⁶⁵ Provision has also been made for the creation of Inter-State Councils.⁶⁶ If at any time it appears to the President that public interests would be served by establishing an Inter-State Council charged with the duty of (a) inquiring into and advising upon disputes which may have arisen between States; (b) investigating and discussing subjects in which some or all the States, or the Union and one or more of the States, have a common interest; or (c) making recommendations upon any such subject and, in particular, recommendations for the better co-ordination of policy and action with respect to that subject, it shall be lawful for the President to establish such a Council and define its duties, its organisation and the procedure to be followed therein.

Article 261 provides that full faith and credit shall be given throughout the territory of India to public acts, records and judicial proceedings of the Union and every State. But Parliament lays down by law the mode of proof and the effects of such acts and proceedings in other States. It is further provided that final judgments or orders delivered or passed by civil courts in any part of India are executable anywhere within India according to law.⁶⁷

The Constitution prescribes that trade, commerce and intercourse throughout the territory of the Union shall be free.⁶⁸ But like all other freedoms, the freedom of trade, commerce and intercourse is also not absolute. Parliament is empowered to impose restrictions that it deems necessary in public interest.⁶⁹ Article 303 prohibits Parliament and State Legislatures from enacting legislation giving preference to one State over another or making discrimination between one State and another by virtue of any entry relating to trade and commerce in any of the Lists in the Seventh Schedule. But the same Article also authorises Parliament to make any law giving preference to one State over the other or making discrimination between States if it is declared by such law that it is necessary to do so to meet a situation arising from scarcity of goods. It may be noted here that while this Article empowers Parliament to give preference or make discrimination, provided it is necessary for the purpose of dealing with a situation arising from scarcity of goods in any part of the territory of India, there is no exception in the case of a State Legislature on the ground of scarcity of goods. There is a definite and specific prohibition upon the State Legislature against preference and discrimination.

But State Legislatures have the power to impose by law non-discriminatory taxes on goods imported from other States and Union Territories provided goods manufactured or produced in that State are subjected to such taxes.⁷⁰ It may also impose such reasonable restrictions on the freedom of trade, commerce or intercourse with or within that State as may be required in public interest. No Bill or amendment for this purpose, however, can be introduced or moved in the State Legislatures without the previous sanction of the President.⁷¹ These provisions are analogous to the American doctrine of "police powers" of the States to impose restrictions on inter-State commerce.⁷² But the power of the States in America is authorised by Courts and, therefore, it emanates from the judicial doctrine. In India, on the other hand, it carries the constitutional sanction. Moreover, the provisions of the Indian Constitution are much wider in scope than the application of the doctrine of "police power" in the United States.

Article 307 empowers Parliament to establish such authority as it considers appropriate for enforcing the provisions of the Constitution with regard to inter-State trade and commerce and confers on it such duties as it thinks fit. Such an authority in India, when established, will be similar to the Inter-State Commerce Commission of the U.S.A.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS

Fiscal autonomy of the units. The system of federal finance essentially differs from the one obtainable under a unitary system of government. The essence of federalism is the distribution of functions, but the distribution of functions must be accompanied with distribution of resources if those functions are to be adequately and efficiently performed. The first requisite of a federal finance, therefore, is that the national government and the governments of the units constituting the federation must have under their independent control financial resources adequate to perform functions assigned to their executive jurisdictions. Each government should command the fullest possible freedom "of initiative and operation", in tapping its resources and meeting its expenditure. Financial authority, in brief, like political authority, under a federal scheme of government, must be fully decentralised as "financial independence is a large part of general independence." Without fiscal autonomy of the units there can be no political autonomy for them. The proper relation between the national government and governments of the States should only be that of co-ordination and control. Professor Adarkar, dealing with this complex problem of federal finance, says: "Freedom of operation must be extended to both the federal and State governments in order

70. Article 304 (a).

72. In Canada, too, it has been held that the Provincial Legislature has power to make police or municipal or sanitary regulations of merely local character though Parliament has wide power to regulate trade and commerce.

that they do not suffer from a feeling of cramp in the discharge of their normal activities and in the achievement of their legitimate aspirations for the promotion of their social and economic advancement.⁷³

But no federation has followed the rigid application on this principle. It has been so modified as to meet the particular economic and financial needs of the country concerned. The recent developments in the theory of federalism, too, have necessitated modification in its application. The basis of distribution of financial resources, accordingly, differs from federation to federation. In the United States, Congress has the power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States and to borrow money on the credit of the United States. In Canada, the Union Parliament has the power to raise money by any mode or system of taxation and to borrow money on public credit. In Australia, the Centre and the States have concurrent powers of taxation except that the imposition of duties of customs and excise belong exclusively to the Commonwealth.

The Drafting Committee had recommended that in view of the unstable conditions prevailing in India in 1948, the existing distribution of the sources of revenue under the Government of India Act, 1935, should continue for at least five years after which a Finance Commission be appointed to review the position. The Constitution makes a provision for the appointment within two years of the inauguration of the Republic, or thereafter at the expiration of every fifth year or earlier, a Finance Commission consisting of a Chairman and four other members. The duties of the Commission are to recommend to the President the distribution of the taxes which are distributable between the Centre and the units, and the principles on which grants should be made out of the Union revenues to the States.⁷⁴ The Constitution of India, thus, provides for a new solution to the problem of distributing the public revenues. It is a flexible method and the whole division comes under review after every fifth year and even earlier. The First Finance Commission, with K.C. Neogy as Chairman, was appointed in November 1951, and submitted its report in February 1953. The Second Finance Commission, with K. Santhanam as Chairman, was appointed in 1956. The Third Finance Commission was set up in December 1960, with A.K. Chanda as Chairman and submitted its report in December, 1961. The Fourth Finance Commission was constituted in 1964 with Dr. P.V. Rajamannar as Chairman and submitted its report in August, 1965. Again, in 1967 another Commission was set up under the Chairmanship of Mahavir Tyagi and it has since submitted its report.

Allocation of Revenues. The taxes on the Legislative Lists remain much the same as under the 1935 Act. The States are absolutely entitled to the proceeds of taxes on the State List and the Union takes the proceeds of taxes on the Union List and of any tax not mentioned in any List. There are no taxes on the Concurrent List. While the proceeds on the taxes within the State List are entirely retained by the States, the proceeds of some of the taxes in the Union List are to be assigned, or may be assigned wholly or partly to the States. The residuary taxing authority rests with the Union. The Constitution distinguishes four categories of Union taxes which are available, whole or in part, to the States.

(i) Duties levied by the Union but collected and wholly appropriated by the States: Stamp duties in respect of bills of exchange, cheques, promissory notes, bills of lading, letters of credit, policies of insurance, transfer of shares, debentures, proxies and receipts, and excise on medicines and toilet preparations containing alcohol.⁷⁵

(ii) Taxes levied and collected by the Union but whose net proceeds are wholly assigned to the States. These include.⁷⁶

- (a) duties in respect of succession to property other than agricultural land;
- (b) estate duty in respect of property other than agricultural land;
- (c) terminal taxes on goods and passengers carried by railway, sea or air;
- (d) taxes on railway fares and freights;
- (e) taxes other than stamp duties on transactions in stock exchanges and future markets;
- (f) taxes on the sale or purchase of newspapers and advertisements published therein; and
- (g) taxes on the sale and purchase of goods in the course of inter-State commerce and trade.

(iii) Taxes levied and collected by the Union but whose net proceeds are shared between the Union and the States. The only tax which comes under this category is the Income Tax. The Corporation Tax is not shared, but belongs exclusively to the Union. Agricultural Income Tax is a State subject and, therefore, does not come under this category. After deduction of sums attributable to the Union Territories and to Union emoluments, the net proceeds of Income Tax are divided between the Union and the States, and among the different States as prescribed by the orders of the President after considering the report of the Finance Commission.⁷⁷

Parliament may, for Union purposes, impose surcharges on those taxes which are available for distribution,⁷⁸ but it may not alter the rates of taxes in which States are interested except on the recommendation of the President.⁷⁹

(iv) Taxes which are levied and collected by the Union but whose net proceeds are shared between the Union and the States. Under this category come Union excise duties other than those on medicinal and toilet preparation.⁸⁰ The excise duties on medicinal and toilet preparations are wholly, as said in item (i), assigned to the States.⁸¹

Grants-in-aid. The Constitution provides for three kinds of grants to the States from the Union resources. Under Article 273 the States of Assam, Bihar, Orissa and West Bengal are given grants in lieu of export duty on jute and jute products. The sums of such grants-in-aid may be those as prescribed by the President. These sums are to be paid to the States so long as the export duty on jute and jute products continues to be levied by the Government of India or until the expiration of ten years since the inauguration of the Republic, whichever is earlier.

There is a general provision of grants to the States in Article 275. Parliament is empowered to make such grants as it may deem necessary to give financial assistance to any State which is in need of assistance. It is for Parliament to determine the extent of the grant and it may vary according to the needs of the different States. Apart from this, it is the constitutional duty of the Union to finance schemes it has approved for the welfare of the Scheduled Tribes and for raising the level of administration of the Scheduled Areas. There is a special provision for a grant to Assam in respect of its tribal areas.

Under Article 282 the Union and the State Governments are given the general power to make grants for any public purpose even if it is not within their respective legislative competence.

Exemption from Taxation. The Constitution also follows the general provisions of the Government of India Act, 1935 and exempts the property of one Government from taxation by another. Article 285 provides that unless Parliament declares otherwise, Union property is not subject to State taxation, but shall continue to pay existing dues to local authorities until Parliament stops it. A State may not tax electricity supplied to the Government of India or a railway unless permitted to do so by Parliament.⁸² Without the consent of the President, a State may not tax water or electricity supplied or controlled by any authority established for regulating or developing any inter-State river or river-valley.⁸³

The property and income of a State are exempt from Union taxation, but this exemption does not extend to a trade or business carried on by the Government of a State, unless Parliament declares by law such trade or business incidental to the ordinary functions of Government.⁸⁴

Powers of Borrowing. Generally, the power of borrowing is only incidental to the powers of the Government and no specific provision is made in a Constitution as regards the limits and modes of borrowing. But the Constitution of India makes a specific provision in this respect. The Union Government is empowered to borrow upon the security of the Consolidated Fund of India, subject to the limits and conditions as Parliament may impose.⁸⁵ Thus, the power of borrowing of the Union is subject to the limits as prescribed by an Act of Parliament. But the Constitution itself imposes limitations on the borrowing powers of the States in addition to conditions which the State Legislature may impose. A State can borrow only within India and cannot raise a new loan without the consent of the Union Government if there is outstanding any part of a previous loan guaranteed by the Union or owed to it. The Union Government may make loans to States subject to the conditions made by Parliament, or may guarantee loans to States, provided that the limits set by Parliament to Union loans are not exceeded.⁸⁶

Financial Emergency Powers. The Financial Emergency powers, as provided for in Article 360 and to which a detailed reference has already been made, has as far reaching effects as those relating to legislative and administrative spheres. A Proclamation of Financial Emergency may leave the States with no other resources than those available from taxes on the State List, for the President may, while the Proclamation is in operation, suspend any of the provisions of the Constitution relating to grants and to the sharing of Union taxes.⁸⁷ If the President is satisfied that the financial stability of India or any part thereof is threatened, he may issue a proclamation empowering the Union to give directions controlling a State's financial activities,⁸⁸ and requires State Money Bills to be reserved for consideration by the President.⁸⁹

Control by the Comptroller and Auditor-General of India. The Comptroller and Auditor-General of India is appointed by the President,⁹⁰ and Parliament may impose such duties and grant him such powers in relation to State accounts as it may prescribe.⁹¹ Without any such legislation the Comptroller and Auditor-General of India, with the approval of the President, prescribes the form in which State accounts are to be kept.⁹²

THE STATE EXECUTIVE

Appointment of a Governor. The Governor of a State is appointed by the President by warrant under his hand and seal. His term of office is five years, but he holds it at the pleasure of the President. The Provincial Constitution Committee, appointed by the Constituent Assembly, had recommended that the Governor should be elected by the people. But the Drafting Committee did not accept the proposal as, it remarked, "the co-existence of a Governor elected by the people and a Chief Minister responsible to the Legislature might lead to friction."¹ The Committee suggested an alternative mode of appointing Governors: "the Legislature should elect a panel of four persons (who need not be the residents of the State) and the President of the Union should appoint one of the four as Governors."² The Constituent Assembly rejected both these proposals in favour of nomination by the President.

The Governor is, thus, an appointee of the Union Government and is removable from office at any time by the same authority. This is a clear departure from the federal principle underlying the Constitution of the United States of America. The State Governor in the United States is directly elected by the people of the State and he is not subject to removal except by impeachment by the State Legislature. The Governor of an Australian State is appointed by the Crown on the advice of the British Cabinet. But the British Cabinet before tendering such an advice consults the Prime Minister of the State concerned. The Governor holds office during the pleasure of the Crown and is in no way responsible to the Governor-General. The Governors of the Australian States, therefore, are as much representatives of His Majesty for State purposes as the Governor-General of the Commonwealth is for Commonwealth purpose. The Lieutenant-Governors of the Canadian Provinces, on the other hand, are appointed by the Governor-General in Council, that is, by the Governor-General acting on the advice of the Dominion Ministry, and may be removed by the Governor-General "for cause assigned." Although the Lieutenant-Governor is appointed by the Union Government and is removable by the same authority, yet he is not the "executive servant of the Dominion or the passive instrument of the Dominion Cabinet."³ Once appointed by the Union Government his position becomes similar to the Governor of an Australian State. He is the representative of the Crown and not the agent of the Union Government and exercises complete authority for "carrying on the Government of the Province in accordance

1. Draft Constitution of India, p. vii.

2. Ibid.

3. Liquidators of Maritime v. Receiver General, with the established principles of the parliamentary system of government. The mode of appointment of the Provincial Head, therefore, "does not impair the federal principle in Canada."

The Constitution of India follows Canada in providing for appointment of the Governor of a State by the Head of the Union. But, unlike Canada, the Governor of an Indian State feels himself and acts in many respects as an agent of the Union Government. Even the convention that in appointing the Governor, the Union Government consults the Chief Minister of the State for which appointment is made, does not change the situation. The Governor cannot be made to forget that he is the appointee of the dominant Party at the helm of affairs in the Union, and that his normal term of five years is subject to holding his office during the pleasure of the President, which for all intents and purposes means the pleasure of the Union Ministry. The Ministry can secure the removal of a Governor even during his normal term on a ground which may as well be political for no cause need be assigned for such removal. The Constitution also vests in the Governor the power to decide in his discretion.⁵ The Governor, being a nominee of the Central Government, may act at variance with his Council of Ministers particularly in cases of conflict of interests between the State and the Centre. Article 356 clearly emphasises the responsibilities of the Governor as an agent of the Centre when on the report of the Governor the President may declare the failure of the constitutional machinery in the State.

It was unequivocally made clear in the Constituent Assembly that the Governor would not be an instrument of the Central Government. The Drafting Committee, too, expected the same as is evident from the speech of T.T. Krishnamachari which he made in the Constituent Assembly. He said, "I would at once disclaim all ideas. . . . that we in this House want the future Governor to be nominated by the President to be in any sense an agent of the Central Government. I would like that point to be made very clear, because such an idea finds no place in the scheme of government we envisage for the future."⁶ But the future could not sustain Krishnamachari's claim. The unusual procedure adopted in Commander Nanavati's Case in suspending the sentence passed by the Bombay High Court pending the disposal of his application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court proves that the Governor and the State Ministry, when it belongs to the same ruling Party, may be made to succumb to the wishes of the Central Government. When the representatives of Commander Nanavati appealed to the Bombay Government to suspend his sentence, it felt that it was an unusual procedure and decided to seek Centre's advice. The opinion given by the Centre might not be interpreted as a direction, and it might not have even violated any legal or constitutional provisions, but it does show how the Centre can dictate its mind. When the Bombay Government was hesitant to adopt the unusual procedure, the Centre should have given its thought, whatever considerations might have weighed with it, to that aspect of the matter before tendering the necessary advice. The Full Bench of the Bombay High Court held that the order of the Bombay Government suspending the life sentence on Commander Nanavati had not been shown to be "unconstitutional or contrary to law." All the same, the Court expressed its profound regret at the use of extraordinary powers in the Nanavati Case.

The essential idea of having a nominated Governor is to have a person as the Head of the State who should maintain himself at a higher plane and should hold the scales even without any political considerations, and, if necessary, to stand up on his own against the State Government as well as against the Central Government. The Governor "is the representative not of a party," rightly observed the Chairman of the Drafting Committee, "he is the representative of the people as a whole of the State. It is in the name of the people that he carries on the administration. He must see that the administration is carried on a level which may be regarded as good, efficient, honest administration." The Governor is, therefore, neither expected to be a puppet in the hands of the State Ministry nor should he become a mere instrument in the hands of the Central Ministry. "But how far party men specially if they happen to be candidates defeated at parliamentary elections," pertinently puts Dr. N.R. Deshpande, "can stand squarely against Cabinets whether in the States or at the Centre, particularly against the latter, is highly problematical." Hitherto, barring a few appointments, Governors have been appointed purely on party considerations. And, then, Governorship is interchangeable with the State Chief Ministership or Ministership at the Centre at any time when deemed politically expedient.⁹

Qualifications and conditions of office. A Governor must be a citizen of India and at least thirty-five years of age. He must not be a member of either House of Parliament or of the House of the Legislature of any State. If he is a member of any Legislature he automatically vacates his seat on assuming office. Nor shall the Governor hold any other office of profit. He is entitled, without payment of rent, to the use of his official residences and is also entitled to such emoluments, allowances and privileges as may be determined by Parliament by law. Until provision is so made by Parliament the salary of the Governor has been fixed by the Constitution at Rs. 5,500 per mensem plus such allowances and privileges as the Governor of the corresponding Province was entitled to immediate-

Jawaharlal Nehru expressed the fear that the election of Governors would encourage "a narrow, provincial way of thinking and functioning in each State." It would be infinitely better, he said, if a Governor was not intimately connected with the local politics and functions in a State, but was a more detached figure, acceptable to the State no doubt, but not known to be a part of its party machine. Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. VIII, pp. 454-56. c

ly before the commencement of the Constitution.¹⁰ His emoluments and allowances are not to be diminished during his term of office.¹¹

Two conventions are now well established with regard to the appointment of the Governor. In the first place, the Governor must be acceptable to the State to which he is likely to be appointed. The practice is that the Union Government consults the Chief Minister of the State concerned prior to the appointment of a new Governor. Secondly, the person selected must normally be an outsider, that is, resident of another State. So far there had been only two exceptions to this practice, the late Governor of West Bengal, H.P. Mukerjee and the Governor of Mysore, who was formerly the ruler of the Mysore State and later Rajpramukh of the State of Mysore.

Every Governor and every person discharging the functions of the Governor has, before entering upon his office, to make and subscribe in the presence of the Chief Justice of the High Court of the State concerned an oath or affirmation in the prescribed form.¹²

The Governor is not answerable to any Court for the exercise and performance of the powers and duties of his office or for any act done by him in the exercise and performance of those powers and duties. No criminal proceedings can be instituted or continued against the Governor of a State in any Court during his term of office. Nor any process for the arrest or imprisonment of the Governor shall be issued from any Court during his term of office. No civil proceedings shall be instituted against a Governor in any Court in respect of any act done in his personal capacity, during his term of office, until the expiration of two months after a notice in writing has been delivered to him stating the nature of the proceedings, the cause of action, the name of the party intending to sue him, and the relief claimed.

A Governor holds office for a period of five years and it is subject to extension. But he may resign sooner and may be removed earlier.¹³ In

They are further entitled to customs privileges in respect of articles imported by them for their use. In most States Governors enjoy the privilege of disbursing money placed at their disposal and this they do at their discretion. A sum varying between Rs. 10,000, as in the case of Punjab, and Rs. 1,13,000, as in the case of Bombay, has been fixed for furnishing the Raj Bhavans (Government Houses).

13. The West Bengal Cabinet demanded for the immediate recall of the Governor, Dharam Vira, before the formal inauguration of the new Legislative Assembly on March 6, 1969. The Government of India categorically rejected the demand. Since the Governor himself had requested the Prime Minister towards the end of October '968 for a change on personal grounds Dharam Vira proceeded on leave and afterwards appointed Governor of Mysore. To yield to case of a casual vacancy the President may make such provision as he thinks fit. The Provincial Constitution Committee had proposed for the appointment of a Deputy Governor in each State but the Drafting Committee did not accept the proposal. It was thought that it was not necessary "to make any provision for Deputy Governors, because a Deputy Governor will have no function to perform so long as the Governor is there. At the Centre, the position is different, because the Vice-President is also the ex-officio Chairman of the Council of States; but in most of the States there will be no Upper House and it will not be possible to give the Deputy Governor functions similar to the Vice-President." The Drafting Committee was of the view that it would be sufficient to include a provision in the Constitution enabling the State Legislature, or the President if the Governor was to be appointed by him, to make the necessary arrangements to discharge the functions of the Governor in an unforeseen contingency and, accordingly, inserted a provision to this effect in the Draft Constitution. The Committee made a specific suggestion that it could be laid down in advance that the Chief Justice of the State would fill in the casual vacancy.¹⁴ It is now a well-established convention to appoint the Chief Justice of the High Court of the State where the vacancy suddenly occurs. But Sri Prakasa regards it a bad convention.¹⁵

The Constitution (Seventh) Amendment Act, 1955, makes provision, in Article 153, of the appointment of one Governor for two or more States if necessary. The States with a common Governor retain their own separate Legislatures and Councils of Ministers, and they function separately of each other. The Common Head is the only link between them so far as their individuality is concerned. The President may also appoint the Governor of a State as the administrator of an adjoining Union Territory, and in this case the Governor shall act as administrator independently of his Council of Ministers.¹⁶ Except in the case of Assam and Nagaland and for some time for the States of Punjab and Haryana, a common Governor for two or more States has not been appointed. The Nagaland Legislative Assembly has since passed a resolution for the appointment of a separate Governor for that State.

POSITION OF THE GOVERNOR

Constitutional position of the Governor. The form of Government in the States, as in the Centre, is parliamentary. The Constitution provides that there shall be a Council of Ministers "to aid and advise the Governor in the exercise of his functions except insofar as he is by or under this Constitution required to exercise his functions or any of them a demand for recall virtually amounts to the exercise of a right to dismissal of the Governor by the State Government. In terms of the Constitution the Governor holds office during the pleasure of the President, not that of the Ministry of the State.

in his discretion.¹⁷ The Constitution makes no attempt to define the discretionary powers of the Governor except for the only instance that the Governor of Assam is to act in his discretion in respect of administration of certain frontier tracts,¹⁸ which he is required to administer as the agent of the President, and in respect of any dispute as to the share of mining royalties between the Government of Assam and the District Council of a Tribal Area.¹⁹ At the same time, the Constitution provides that whether the Governor is entitled to act in his discretion in any matter is decided by him in his discretion and his decision is final. The validity of anything done by the Governor cannot be called into question on the ground that he ought or ought not to have acted in his discretion.²⁰

Here the position of the President of India and the Governor of a State differs, although the pattern which appears in the structure of the Union is apparently reproduced in the States. Whereas the President acts on the advice of his Ministers and the Constitution does not empower him to exercise any function in his discretion, the Constitution authorises the Governor to act in his discretion and in the exercise of his discretionary functions, the Governor is not required to act according to the advice of his Ministers or even to seek their advice. There is, for instance, no provision for a Presidential take-over of the Union Government, in case the constitutional machinery fails or breaks down at the Centre. It is doubtful if the President can dismiss his Council of Ministers in the manner the Governor can the State Ministry. And it would seem the President cannot omit passages from the address he delivers to Parliament placed in his hands by the Prime Minister.²¹ The use of the phrase "in his discretion" is reminiscent of the similar phrase in the Government of India Act, 1935. But the Act of 1935 clearly specified the discretionary field of the Governor whereas the present Constitution does not do so. On the other hand, it vests in the Governor the power to decide whether any matter should be decided by him in his discretion and his decision in that respect is final. It has generally been observed that no other Governor, except of Assam, has any authority to act in his discretion and the discretionary authority of the Governor of Assam, too, is limited to matters relating to the administration of the Tribal areas in respect of the share of mining royalties. Durga Das Basu, accordingly, maintains, "To a certain extent, therefore, the retention of the words 'in his discretion' in the present Article (163) may be said to be a drafting anomaly."²²

The passages which he skipped over contained some strongly worded criticism of the Governor and of the Central Government for dismissing the United Front Ministry, for inducting a minority Government and, finally, for dissolving the Assembly instead of reinstating the United Front Government when the minority Government had collapsed. The Governor of Punjab, Dr. D.C. Pavate, on the other hand, read the address as a whole although it contained passages criticising him for inducting Lachhman Singh Gill's minority Government and the manner in which the Budget was passed.

22. Commentary on the Constitution of India, p. 475.

The Calcutta High Court in Sunil Kumar Bose and others v. The Chief Secretary to the Government of West Bengal observed, "The Governor under the present Constitution cannot act except in accordance with the advice of his ministers. Under the Government of India Act, 1935, the position was different. The Governor could do certain acts in his discretion, that is, without asking for the advice of any minister; he could do certain acts in his individual capacity, that is, only after consulting his ministers but he was not bound when acting in his individual capacity to follow the advice of his ministers. Under the present Constitution, the power to act in his discretion or in his individual capacity has been taken away and the Governor, therefore, must act on the advice of his ministers. This is the constitutional position as explained to us by the Advocate-General and we accept this view." The opinion expressed by the Calcutta High Court was upheld by the Travancore-Cochin High Court in 1953. The Court declared that the "retention of the words in Articles 163 and 166 may be said to be a drafting anomaly, as no Governor, except the Governor of Assam acting under Sections 6 paras 9(2) and 18(3) has any authority to act in his discretion."²³

But this is not the exact position. Under the Government of India Act, 1935, the Governor was required to comply with the instructions of the Governor-General in the exercise of his discretionary functions. The Constitution of India, too, contemplates many sets of circumstances in which the Governor will receive instructions from the President which he must carry out whatever advice his Ministers may offer in that connection. The Governor, as K.M. Munshi puts it, "is the watchdog of constitutional propriety and the link which binds the State to the Centre thus securing the constitutional unity of India."²⁴ Jawaharlal Nehru, too, emphasised the importance of this link between the States and the Centre. Discussing the mode of appointment of the Governor, Nehru said in the Constituent Assembly that "An elected Governor would to some extent encourage that separatist provincial tendency more than otherwise. There will be far fewer common links with the Centre."²⁵ That the Governor is an instrument of Central vigilance and control and, accordingly, in possession of certain discretionary powers was authoritatively elaborated by Dr. Ambedkar in the Constituent Assembly. He said, "The provincial Governments are required to work in subordination to the Central Government, and, therefore, in order to see that they do act in subordination to the Central Government, the Governor will reserve certain things in order to give the President the opportunity to see that the rules under which the provincial governments are supposed to act according to the Constitution or in subordination to the Central Government are observed."²⁶

26. Mahavir Tyagi said in the Constituent Assembly, "These Governors are not to be there for nothing. After all we are to see that the policy of the Centre is carried out. We have to help the States linked together and the Governor is the agent or rather he is the agency which will press for and guard

It is the constitutional duty of the Governor, as a representative of the President, to send a report to the President if any serious emergency including the breakdown of the Constitution appeared. What that serious emergency can possibly be, it is for the Governor to determine and report to the President, without consulting his Council of Ministers and keeping the report secret, and to act in accordance with the instructions issued by the President thereupon. No doubt the President can proclaim emergency in a State if he is "otherwise"²⁷ satisfied, but, the report of the Governor is decisive as he is the President's representative on the spot.

Sri Prakasa, who himself had been a Governor, says "that a Governor has four main duties to perform."²⁸ "A Governor's first duty", he says, "is to know that he is the representative of the Centre," and that he must keep the Centre informed of the affairs of his State whenever he should feel that such things are going on which can endanger the unity of the country." He further adds, "In any case, whether right or wrong, the Governor must tell the Centre what his own reactions are over the events that he sees around him. It would be the Centre's duty to act or not to act in the peculiar circumstances as presented by the Governor." The second duty of the Governor "is to look after the interests of the State", which he heads, "and if he feels that the Centre must step in to help in this way or in that, to meet any difficulty which the State itself is in no position to do, then he must tell the Centre as much. The Governor's third duty is "to stand in human form, as the symbol of the State before representatives of foreign people... A Governor must be prepared to meet them on their own level, however high they may be, and represent his own State and country in the best light possible." Finally, "in case the Constitution should break down—whatever the reasons may be—he must be prepared to take charge of the administration of the State."

Dr. Kailash Nath Katju, who had been for four years Governor the central policy. The Governor being the agency of the Centre is the only guarantee to integrate the various provinces or States. The Governor must remain as the guardian of the central policy on the one side, and the Constitution on the other." Constituent Assembly Debates, Vol. VIII, pp. 494-95.

27. The expression 'otherwise' in Article 356 of the Constitution did not occur originally in the corresponding Article (278) of the Draft Constitution. It was inserted later on, and Dr. Ambedkar justified its insertion. He said in the Constituent Assembly, "with regard to Article 278, the first change that is to be noted is that the President is to act on a report from the Governor or otherwise. The original Article 188 provided that the President should act on the report made by the Governor. The word 'otherwise' was not there. Now it is felt that in view of the fact that Article 277-A which precedes Article 278 imposes a duty and an obligation upon the Centre, it would be improper to restrict and confine the action of the President, which undoubtedly will be taken in fulfilment of the duty, to the report made by the Governor of the Province. It may be that the Governor does not make a report. Nonetheless, the facts are such that the President feels that his intervention is necessary and imminent. I think as a necessary consequence to the introduction of Article 277-A, we must also give liberty to the President to act even where there is no report by the Governor and when he President has got certain facts within his knowledge on which he thinks he ought to set in fulfilment of his duty."

of two States, Bihar and Orissa, sidetracks the issue while dealing with the constitutional position of the Governor. He wrote, "It is said that every Governor of a State has to watch the course of political events and of administration in the State and keep the Central Government informed of what is happening there. That may be perfectly correct. But I think the Governor has much more to do. Governors are invited to social and ceremonial functions."²⁹ Dharam Vira, whose tenure as Governor of West Bengal saw many controversies involving constitutional and other issues, is of the opinion that in normal times the Governor is a mere constitutional head. "However, when a Governor takes the oath of office, he undertakes to safeguard and protect the Constitution. Therefore in certain circumstances, particularly in emergency, the Governor's duties in regard to safeguarding and protecting the Constitution make it imperative for him to act in his discretion, of course, within the four corners of the constitutional provisions."³⁰

The exact constitutional position of the Governor figured prominently in the deliberations of the Constituent Assembly. While none advocated that he should be an autocrat, it was widely felt that he should be invested with adequate powers to ensure the maintenance of high standards of Government. This view was upheld by Jawaharlal Nehru and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel.

In his Memorandum on the Principles of a Model Provincial Constitution prepared by the Constitutional Adviser, it was provided that there "shall be a Council of Ministers to aid and advise the Governor in the exercise of his functions except in so far as he is by or under this Constitution required to exercise his functions or any of them in his discretion."³¹ In a Note appended thereto, B.N. Rau observed that, while for the most part the Governor would act on the advice of his Ministers, there were certain functions which even a responsible Head had to exercise in his discretion, namely the choice of the Prime (now Chief) Minister, the dissolution of the Legislature (in certain events), and so on.³² The Memorandum on the Principles of a Model Provincial Constitution presented to the Constituent Assembly by Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel on July 15 1947,³³ envisaged the conferment of "special responsibilities"³⁴ on the Governor, besides discretionary powers.³⁵ Calling the attention of the Assembly to the dilemma of the Constitution-makers, Sardar Patel said that if the Governor was granted discretionary powers it would amount to a derogation from the powers of the Ministry.³³ And yet it was felt imperative to clothe the Governor with adequate authority. He pointed out that, in view of the conditions obtaining in the country "some special provision should be made for giving special responsibilities (to the Governor), to meet the difficult situation." He recalled that many Prime Ministers of the Provinces and others with long experiences in administration considered it dangerous not to provide for an emergency. Jawaharlal Nehru fully subscribed to this point of view.

That it was not the intention of the Constitution-makers that a Governor should be a "rubber-stamp" of his Ministry is clear from the opinion expressed by Dr. Ambedkar in the Constituent Assembly on June 1, 1949. He said, "the retention in or vesting the Governor with certain discretionary powers is in no sense the negation of the responsible Government." The Constitution, therefore, vests in the Governor the following discretionary powers:

- (1) The appointment of the Chief Minister;
- (2) Dismissal of the Council of Ministers;
- (3) Dissolution of the Assembly;
- (4) Requiring the Chief Minister to submit information relating to legislative and administrative matters;
- (5) Requiring the Chief Minister to submit for the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister but which has not been considered by the Council of Ministers;
- (6) Withholding the assent to a Bill passed by the Legislature and sending it back for re-consideration;
- (7) Reserving a Bill duly passed by the State Legislature for the assent of the President;
- (8) Seeking instructions from the President before promulgating an ordinance dealing with certain matters;
- (9) Submission of a Report to the President advising breakdown of constitutional machinery in the State;
- (10) In the case of Governor of Assam, certain administrative matters connected with the Tribal Areas and settlement of disputes between the Government of Assam and the District Council of an autonomous district with respect to mining royalties.

But acting in discretion does not mean acting arbitrarily or capri-ciously. Discretion in its ordinary meaning signifies unrestricted exercise of choice or will; freedom to act according to one's own judgment. "But when applied to public administration, it means a power or right conferred upon them by law, of acting officially in certain circumstances according to the dictates of their own judgment or conscience uncontrolled by the conscience or judgment of others. Discretion is to discern between right and wrong, and therefore whoever hath power to act at discretion is bound by the rule of reason and law."³⁷ Discretion, thus, must be exercised honestly on judicial grounds and substantial reasons. The Constitution meant the Governor to act generally on ministerial advice but reserving to himself certain discretionary powers to be exercised by him untrammelled by ministerial control. At the recent Governors' Conference, Mrs. Indira Gandhi cryptically remarked, "You can be the guide, philosopher and friend to your respective governments, while also discharging your constitutional responsibilities." Some of these responsibilities are in expressed terms whereas others flow ineluctably from the Governor's position as a constitution Head of the State functioning under a Parliamentary system.

POWERS OF THE GOVERNOR

Keeping in view his constitutional position, the powers of the Governor may be divided under the usual four heads: (1) Executive Powers; (2) Legislative Powers; (3) Financial Powers; and (4) Judicial Powers.

(1) Executive Powers. The executive power of the State is vested in the Governor and is exercised by him either directly or through officers subordinate to him, and according to the Constitution. All executive action of the State shall be expressed to be taken in the name of the Governor. Orders and instruments made and executed in the name of the Governor shall be authenticated in such manner as may be specified in rules made by the Governor, and the validity of such an order or instrument shall not be called in question in any Court on the ground that it is not an order or instrument made or executed by the Governor.³⁸

The Governor appoints a Council of Ministers with the Chief Minister at the head to aid and advise him in the exercise of his functions except in matters where the Governor acts in his discretion.³⁹ It is for the Governor to decide whether any matter should be decided in his discretion. His decision is final and the validity of such a decision cannot be questioned in a Court of Law.⁴⁰ The advice tendered by the Council of Ministers is confidential and cannot be enquired into by any Court.⁴¹ The Governor also makes rules for the more convenient transaction of the business of the Government of the State and for the allocation amongst Ministers of the said business.⁴² The Ministers hold office at the pleasure of the Governor, though in actual practice, it means the pleasure of the State Legislative Assembly (Vidhan Sabha).

The Constitution provides that it shall be the duty of the Chief Minister to communicate to the Governor all decisions of the Council of Ministers relating to administration of the affairs of the State and proposals for legislation.⁴³ He may also call for such other information relating to administration of the affairs of the State and proposals for legislation as he may deem necessary.⁴⁴ He can direct the Chief Minister to submit to the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister but which has not been considered by the Council of Ministers.⁴⁵

The Governor does not appoint the Judges of the High Court, but he is entitled to be consulted before the President makes such appointments.⁴⁶ He appoints the Advocate-General of the State, and members of the State Public Service Commission, if there is one.

(2) Legislative Powers. The Governor is a part of the State Legislature just as President is a part of Parliament. The Governor has the right to summon the House or each House of the State Legislature, if it has two Chambers, to meet at such time and place as he thinks fit, but six months shall not intervene between its last sitting in one session and the date appointed for its first sitting in the next session. He may prorogue the House⁴⁷ or either House and dissolve the Legislative Assembly. He may address the House or both Houses assembled together. He may also send messages to the House or Houses on a Bill pending in the Legislature or otherwise. The House to which a message is sent shall with all convenient dispatch consider any matter required by the message to be taken into consideration. He must address the Assembly or, in case there is a Council, both Houses assembled at the commencement of the first session after each general election and at the commencement of the first session of each year.

After a Bill is passed by the House or the Houses of the State Legislature, it is presented to the Governor for his assent. He may assent to the Bill or withhold it or may reserve it for the consideration of the President. He may return the Bill (if it is not a Money Bill) for the reconsideration of the House or Houses, but if it is again passed with or without amendments he must give his assent thereto.

The Governor has a similar power of making ordinances, as the President has, during the recess of the Legislature. The ordinances so promulgated cease to operate at the expiration of six weeks from the reassembly of the Legislature or earlier, if a resolution disapproving such an ordinance is passed by the Legislative Assembly and agreed to by the Legislative Council, if any. The Constitution, however, provides that the Governor shall not without instructions from the President promulgate any such ordinance: (1) if a Bill containing the same provisions would have required the previous sanction of the President for introduction into the Legislature; or (2) if the Governor would have reserved a Bill containing the same provisions for the President; or (3) if an act of the State Legislature containing the same provisions would have been invalid unless, having been reserved for the consideration of the President, it had received the assent of the President.

(3) Financial Powers. The Governor has the same responsibilities and powers with regard to Money and Financial Bills as the President. No Money Bill or other Financial Bills can be introduced in the Legislative Assembly except on the recommendations of the Governor. Amendments making provision for financial matters, also, cannot be moved except on the recommendations of the Governor. But no such recommendation is necessary to amendments making provision for the reduction or abolition of a tax.

The Governor is required, in respect of every financial year, to see that the annual financial statement or Budget of the State is laid before the House or Houses of the Legislature. No demand for grant can be made except on the recommendation of the Governor. The Governor has also been empowered to ask for supplementary, additional, or excess grants from the Legislature.

(4) Judicial Powers. The Governor has the power to pardon, commute and suspend sentence of any person convicted of any offence against any law relating to matters to which the executive power of the State extends. The right of the Governor's power to pardon, commute and suspend sentence of any person was considered by the Bombay High Court in Commander Nanavati's case. The Court held that this power vested in the Governor is similar to the power of pardon, reprieve, and clemency both in its nature and effect as was possessed by the Sovereign in Great Britain and the President in the United States. This power, therefore, in the opinion of their Lordships, could be exercised by the Governor either before, during or after trial. At the same time, their Lordships said that wide and unfettered as the powers referred to in Article 161 were, they were not intended to be exercised arbitrarily and except for good and sufficient reasons.

Miscellaneous functions. The Governor receives the annual report of the State Public Service Commission and sends it to the Council of Ministers for comments. After the comments have been received, he transmits both the documents to the Speaker of the Assembly for being placed before the legislature. Similarly, the Governor deals with the report of the Auditor-General regarding the income and expenditure of the State. Prof. Sri Ram Sharma suggests that it would be in the fitness of things if the High Court were to send to the President for transmission to the Governor a report on the judicial appointments, particularly the appointments of the District Judges who are supposed to be appointed on the recommendation of the High Court.⁴⁸

Role of the Governor. The role of the constitutional Head of the State is self-evident. Bagehot's exposition has now become classical. In his oft-quoted phrase, the Sovereign has "three rights: the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, and the right to warn." And "a King of great sense and sagacity", he further adds, "would want no others. He would find that his having no others, would enable him to use these with singular effect."⁴⁹ The same truth was stated by Sir Winston Churchill. He said, "under the British constitutional system the Sovereign has right to be acquainted with everything for which his Ministers are responsible and has an unlimited right of giving counsel to his government."⁵⁰ Dr. Ambedkar, too, expressed like opinion with regard to the functions of a Governor in India. He pointed out two types of duties a Governor was to perform. In the first type, he assigns him the duty to see "whether and when he should exercise his pleasure against the ministry," that is, the Governor has to see that the Ministry continues to run the administration. Secondly, it is the duty of a Governor to advise his Ministers, to warn them, to suggest an alternative and to ask the Government to reconsider the whole issue.⁵¹

The Governor being not a representative of a party, but as Dr. Ambedkar said, "the representative of the people as a whole in the State," should keep himself off politics. As an impartial umpire his work is to see that the game of politics is played according to rules; leaving the politicians fight out the disputes amongst themselves. He should not conduct himself in a manner which suggests that he is inclined to support one party at the expense of another.⁵² "After all, the ruling set up of the State should hold at least one functionary to whom all parties and interests can look up for disinterested advice and impartial support. And no one can perform this function better than the Governor whose office, in some of its responsibilities, has been conceived and created for this purpose." Generally speaking, a Governor is an elderly person who has had experi-

52. In the General Elections of 1957 no Party could secure a majority in the Orissa State Legislature. The Jharkand Party promised continued support to the Congress Party and the Governor, Bhim Sain Sachar, called upon Dr. H.K. Mahatab to form the Government. During the swearing-in ceremony, the Governor was reported to have made a 'political speech'. According to Surendranath Dwivedi, Chairman Utkal Praja-Socialist Party, the Governor had said that he would watch with "personal interest" the endeavours of the Chief Minister for securing a maximum of co-operation of others besides his present supporters. The Hindustan Times, New Delhi, April 16, 1957. The Governor of Orissa, Y.N. Sukthekar, in 1958 in his anxiety to keep the Congress Party in office kept the resignation of Mahatab Ministry under consideration and subsequently allowed Dr. Mahatab to withdraw the resignation of his Ministry. The Governor had asked the Leader of the Opposition to produce a list of the members of the Assembly who would support him. He, then, went to New Delhi to meet the President, the Prime Minister and the Home Minister to apprise them fully and give them his views on the situation and, finally, rejected the claim of the Leader of the Opposition that he commanded a majority on the ground that no names of his supporters were supplied. The Hindustan Times, New Delhi, May 25, 1958.

ence of life in various departments of national activity, and who is ordinarily capable of giving advice. Dr. Kailash Nath Katju succinctly said, "Non-possession by you of any political powers makes no difference at all. I think the Governor of a State under the Constitution can easily gain that respect and affection from the people under his care, if he himself leads an extremely dedicated life."⁵³ Being the Head of the State, the Governor is everybody's man, and, accordingly, he should hold himself at the disposal of and be available to all people of his State regardless of what they are and regardless of their political alliances or affinities. "From my experience", to quote Dr. Katju again, "I can say that the Governor should take no active interest in the day to day politics of the State, and should not interfere with what I may call service matters and should only be anxious by his advice and by his conduct and experience to assist the Chief Minister and his colleagues in removing all people's grievances and in bettering the administration."

The role of the Governor, as a positive and effective role, under normal conditions, may thus be summed up:

1. The first task of the Governor is to see that the stability and efficiency of administration, which really means good and honest administration, is assured. The Constitution empowers the Governor to call for any information relating to administration and proposals for legislation.

2. Then, he must give his consent, though it is just a formality, to all decisions of the Council of Ministers relating to affairs of the administration of the State and proposals for legislation. He can direct the Chief Minister to submit to the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision had been taken by a Minister, but which has not been considered by the Council of Ministers.

3. The Governor is the custodian of the interests of the minorities and it is his duty to bring it to the serious notice of the State Government if some genuine grievance of theirs remains unredressed. In a sense it is the constitutional duty of the Governor. The Governor is required by the Oath of his Office to "preserve, protect and defend the Constitution" and the Constitution aims to promote Justice, Liberty, Equality and Fraternity.

4. In the nation-building schemes, the Governor can play a vital role by providing a non-partisan leadership. He is the one functionary to whom all parties and interests can look up for disinterested advice and impartial support.

Article 160 of the Constitution, which is seldom noted, highlights the potentialities of the office of the Governor. It provides that the President may make such provisions as he thinks fit for the discharge of the functions of the Governor of a State for any contingency not provided for by the Constitution. In the hands of an astute Governor all these powers can assume great significance. The Governor is, thus, "at once the conscience-keeper of the Chief Minister and the eyes and ears of the President. It is unenviable position."⁵⁴

But during the past few years much discussion has agitated the public mind on the place of a Governor in the constitutional structure of India. It is suggested that he plays no useful role, and he is a non-entity; the office may as well be abolished. In Parliament, in State Legislatures, in the Press and in the public meetings much criticism has also been directed towards the extent and equipment of Raj Bhavans (Government Houses), and the elaborate arrangements that are made for a Governor when he goes out on tour. The position becomes more embarrassing when open criticism comes from ex-Governors and the Chief Ministers of the States. Mrs. Vijaya Lakshmi Pandit, who resigned from the Governorship of Maharashtra, expressed her views in an Article which was widely published in the press. She thinks that the office of the Governor is entirely useless and should be abolished and feels that the only thing that can induce a person to accept a Governorship is the salary that it carries. She also expresses her dissatisfaction with everything that the Governor and the Raj Bhavan stand for. Sometimes the criticism has been indecorous. A Chief Minister once described the Governors "nothing but expensive irritations." Sri Prakasa rightly said, "It is the duty of us all to maintain the self-respect of one another. If anyone should think that he maintains his self-respect when he insults someone, then he is making a serious mistake."⁵⁵ Commenting upon the observations of Mrs. Pandit, Sri Prakasa says, "it would indeed be a pity if any office is maintained in a democracy that serves no useful purpose and it will be a greater pity if the only thing that can induce any person to accept the office is its salary."⁵⁶ He also rebuts the criticism directed towards the extent and equipment of the Raj Bhavans and says, that "the Governor draws a salary which after the deduction of income-tax is really not very much higher than that of a Judge or a Secretary. If, therefore, the Governorship is abolished and all the paraphernalia maintained, then the saving to the public exchequer will be very little, if at all.

There are others who plead for the enlargement of Governors' political activities and scope of their functions. Sri Prakasa is one of them. He maintains that Governors should have defined functions so that they may be able to play effective part in the State administration. Two of the former Governors, K.N. Katju and N.V. Gadgil, are not in favour of granting more powers to the Governor, although Gadgil's statement is sophisticated. In the course of the Press interview before relinquishing the Punjab Governorship, Gadgil was asked if there were limitations on the powers of the Governor? He said, "In a sense they are not. In a sense they are." Elaborating his point, he said, "The Constitution provides that the Ministers should hold office during the pleasure of the Governor, that means full power to deal with the Ministers individually and collectively, but he must see that he is given sufficient support by the President if he (Governor) takes the extreme steps."⁵⁷ In practice, however, Gadgil added, "there are limitations and the exact extent of limitations depends on the particular issue and the circumstances in which it has arisen." Gadgil had been a controversial figure throughout his stay in the Punjab and he was probably the first Governor since the inauguration of the Constitution to have resigned for political reasons. Dr. K.N. Katju, on the other hand, was of the opinion that "the Chief Minister and his associates in the Ministry are subordinate to the people and are liable to dismissal by them. There is no such power of dismissal in the people over the Governor. That being so, no power of responsibility can be or should be assigned to the Governor. He should have merely advisory functions."⁵⁸

Dharam Vira, who had been the Governor of Punjab and West Bengal and now occupies the Raj Bhavan of the Mysore State, says, "In the early period after independence, when there were one-party stable governments all over the country, the responsibilities of the Governor were merely those of a constitutional head. But in the present context when political loyalties are shifting fast and when multi-party Governments and Governments different politically from that operating at the Centre are functioning his responsibilities have greatly increased."⁵⁹ He, therefore, suggests that in the present context it would be desirable to define more precisely the powers of the Governor. This would obviate to a great extent conflicting reaction by different Governors on identical circumstances. "There can, however, be no guiding lines," he says, "which can cover all situations and in these circumstances a Governor will have in any case to exercise his own discretion and judgment. While it should not be necessary at all for a Governor to exercise his discretion in any matter other than that of the formation of a Government, under the present conditions it has become necessary for him to do so because of certain lacuna either in the Constitution or in the rules or conventions governing the working of the Governments." Dharam Vira's proposal is that if a number of constitutional experts and jurists sit together and think over the problem, they may be able to work out the various circumstances under which it would be necessary to have greater clarity in regard to the functions and duties of a Governor. Sri Prakasa goes to the extent as to maintain that "the only official emblem today of the unity of the country is the Governor. I have a feeling that even the President is not so."⁶⁰

The question of abolition of the office of the Governor does not arise. Even if it is abolished the day to day duties pertaining to the office of the Head of the State, that is, the 'dignified' functions will have to be fulfilled by some one. The Governor's office is really one of the important offices in the Indian Constitution. In the beginning things went smoothly and the relations between the Governors and the Chief Ministers were happy and cordial. The Central authorities too extended to the Governors the regard and consideration consistent with the dignity of their office. The people at large gave them the same respect and courtesy as in the past. But soon they were relegated to a position derogatory to their power and position.⁶¹ The Governorship was converted into the last refuge of politicians who were either rejected at the polls or pushed out of leadership by more dynamic rivals in the Party. The Governorship was also treated as a sort of cold storage for politicians who could be brought back to active politics when expedient. If Governors become active politicians and even partisans, like Ajit Prasad Jain, Governorship forfeits popular confidence and the dignity of the office disappears.⁶² Sri Prakasa has rightly maintained that however irksome the limitations of the office of Governor may be to a person who had been an active politician for more than 45 years, "he has to submit to them. Though one can sympathise with Mr. Jain, one cannot help feeling that it was not proper on his part to participate in controversial politics while he held the office of Governor."⁶³

61. Sri Prakasa gives a matter of fact analysis of the change. He says, "...things began to change. Jawaharlal Nehru was the Prime Minister. He quickly grew to be a world figure during his office, and with his personality and influence, he could carry everything before him. In fact, he became the virtual and all-powerful ruler of the land. Even the President had to take a second place not only in matters pertaining to administration, but also in official and social celebrations. It was given out, for instance, that the highest in the station should take the salute on ceremonial occasions, but on Independence Day it was always the Prime Minister who took it at the Red Fort in Delhi. The President, Dr. Rajendra Prasad, who should ordinarily have done so, used to leave Delhi on that day, and receive the salute at a State capital instead. The position of the Governors also deteriorated...." Sri Prakasa, "Governor's Lot worsening: Reappraisal overdue." The Tribune, Chandigarh, April 27, 1969.

62. Ajit Prasad Jain, Governor of Kerala, took active part in canvassing for Mrs. Indira Gandhi for the Prime Ministership as against Morarji Desai, the other candidate for the office. Jain realised the anomaly of his position and sent in his resignation. There was a wave of indignation in the whole country. Under the caption 'Impropriety Plus', the Statesman wrote editorially, 'It is difficult to find any mitigating circumstances in the affairs of Mr. Jain's resignation from the Governorship of Kerala, except for its prompt acceptance by the President... The fact remains that Shri AP. Jain was canvassing for a contender in the contest for the Prime Ministership while still the Governor of a State; if this is not a deplorable departure from the non-existent but widely understood code of conduct for Governors, it would be interesting to know what it is. Mr. Jain crowned his grave impropriety with something indistinguishable from irresponsibility. He took the plane to Delhi at a time when the rice ration for the people of Kerala had come down to four ounces a day, which is well below subsistence level. Distress was spreading fast; and this was the moment chosen by Mr. Jain, the Chief Executive under President's Rule, for political work in the capital; not even party political work but partisan political work.'

N.V. Gadgil, Punjab Governor, publicly made certain remarks deploring the movement of direct action against the Communist Government in Kerala. The Tribune, Ambala Cantt., July 7, 1959. The Punjab Governor also said that the Communist Government in Kerala was entitled to continue in office for five years unless it was voted out or it resigned of its own accord. Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru said in his Press conference on July 7, 1959, that some of Governors who had led an active political life before their appointment and are familiar with the responsibilities and limitations which their office entails, set up "unhappy precedents". The Hindustan Times, New Delhi, July 8 1959. On another occasion Gadgil publicly criticised the creed of the Swatantra Party and the Chairmen of the Punjab organisation of the Party criticised in the press the Governor's participation in active politics.

63. Sri Prakasa, State Governors in India, p. 66.

When "the defeated Generals of a victorious army" are raised to the position of authority and dignity as a consolation for their electoral and other discomfiture, it is small wonder that such men are least concerned with their duties and obligations and readily surrender themselves to the domineering Chief Ministers in their respective States and to their benefactors in New Delhi. Sri Prakasa says that Jawaharlal Nehru "not only dealt with the Chief Ministers over the heads of the Governors, but in some cases, to my personal knowledge, he gave authority to non-officials—particularly ladies—to do things in the Raj Bhavans which were the Governor's residence, and over which he was supposed to have full authority—without as much as consulting or even informing the Governor."⁶⁴ Sri Prakasa takes another instance. He says, "In the beginning, the Central Ministers took the place of the old Executive Councillors of the Viceroy whose place in the warrant of precedence was below that of the Governors. The Prime Minister, however, decreed that the Governors, except in their own States, were lower than the Central Cabinet Ministers."⁶⁵

It is on record that many of the Chief Ministers ignored their constitutional obligations under Article 167 to keep their Governors fully informed about the affairs of their States. Complaints to Jawaharlal Nehru "about their high-handedness" yielded no results. Every time, writes Dr. K.M. Munshi, "the matter was mentioned at the Governors' conference, Jawaharlal Nehru laughed it out." In one State, the Chief Minister sent direct to the President, mercy petitions from condemned prisoners, although it was incumbent upon him, before rejecting or forwarding them, to obtain the verdict of the Governor. The Chief Ministers were, thus, if not encouraged certainly they were allowed to keep in direct touch with the Central authorities on the heads of the Governors.

Thus, the whole purpose of the Governorship was nullified. With the coming into power of non-Congress coalition of parties consisting of eight or nine units even fourteen, and professing different ideologies and pursuing different objectives, after the General Elections in 1967 in a good many States, and more especially after what had happened in Bengal, it is of the utmost importance that the role of the Governor should be precisely appreciated. One of the former Union Ministers, who was also the Governor of a State, has asked the Governors "to recover their constitutional status" as the Centre and the States are no longer controlled by a single Party. Dharam Vira, now the Mysore Governor, has also said that it is the responsibility of the Governor to see that the Government of the State "is run in accordance with the letter as well as with the spirit of the Constitution. When political complexions of political parties change on account of shifting loyalties it becomes very necessary that the Governor should be very vigilant in order to ensure that the government is run by a party or collection of parties which have the majority in their favour. He has to ensure that by taking shelter behind certain constitutional lacuna a minority government does not continue to function indefinitely. He has also to exercise considerable discretion at the time of the formation of a government. If there are multi-party groups coming together this discretion has to be exercised very carefully to ensure that the group or the party which wants to form the Government is really in a majority and can form a stable Government.^{70G}

65. Ibid."

The constitutional position of the Governor has been reinforced by the recent decisions of the West Bengal High Court and the Supreme Court. Mr. Justice B.C. Mitra, rejecting the application filed by M.P. Sharma challenging the West Bengal Governor's order dismissing the United Front Ministry and appointing a Ministry headed by P.C. Ghosh, declared that the Governor had absolute, exclusive, unrestricted and unquestionable discretionary power to dismiss a Ministry and appoint a new Council of Ministers.⁶⁷ The Supreme Court, in the State of Punjab vs. Baldev Prakash and Satpyal Dang, held that "the Governor's powers being untrammelled by the Constitution and an emergency having arisen, the action (of the Governor) was perfectly understandable" and, consequently, the resumption of the Legislature by the Governor was a step in the right direction and upheld the constitutional validity of the two Appropriation Acts of the Punjab which the Punjab and Haryana High Court had earlier struck down.

The makers of the Constitution had anticipated emergencies to happen in the life of the nation and the history of India was their practical guide. They had, accordingly, adequately provided for that. As is clear from the debates of the Constituent Assembly, particularly rivetting on Article 163(2), it was not their intention to make it obligatory on the Governor under all circumstances to act on the advice of his Council of Ministers. Had they attempted it, they would have irreparably undermined the federal basis of Indian polity. Their one aim was to make the Centre strong which should be capable of arresting aggressive assertion of State rights to the point of even breaking away from the Federal Centre. This tendency is very much in evidence since the 1967 General Elections. The Deputy Chief Minister of West Bengal, Joyti Basu, declared at the 44th session of All-Bengal Teachers Annual General Conference on April 13, 1969, that the Government would place their demands before the Central Government and if they refused to provide "adequate funds to meet our special problems, there will be agitation in West Bengal." The Deputy Chief Minister also said, "we will need your (teachers) help and co-operation in the event of an agitation against the Centre."⁶⁸ A few days earlier the United Front Government had officially sponsored West Bengal Bandh on the plea that the incident at Cossipore was part of a political conspiracy by a malevolent Centre to bring it into public disfavour and eventually to pull it down.⁶⁹ The Chief Minister of Kerala and the Deputy Chief Minister

69. The security guards at the Cossipore Gun and Shell Factory opened fire when a violent mob of workers tried to force entry into the premises, after the gates for the morning shift were closed, and seized a rifle from one of the security personnel. Five persons were killed in the resultant firing. The State of West Bengal later publicly declared that their Governments would wreck the Constitution from within. It is, under the circumstances, the vigilance of the Governor and his assertiveness which can protect the Constitution and save the country from disintegration. Parliamentary democracy does not rule out the existence of discretionary powers in the Head of the State and the exercise of these powers under exceptional circumstances does not make him a despot. After all the Governors are appointed by the Centre and they are answerable to that authority and the Centre derives its authority and strength from the people. Public opinion is sure to become assertive if any Governor tries to become an autocrat. Let it be made clear that the Governor exercises his special and discretionary powers only under exceptional circumstances.

But it must be emphasised that if the Governor is to judiciously exercise his powers, the President should appoint only those persons who are truly worthy of the office. He should be knowledgeable and energetic with a mind of his own. In the Constituent Assembly it was proposed that the State Legislature might elect a panel from out of which alone the President would select and appoint a Governor. The proposal was not accepted as it would have given a virtual veto to the States. The appointment of the Governor by the President was widely favoured as he has to act on behalf of the Centre on many matters and situations. But in view of the appointments which the Centre has generally made, it is necessary that the Governor's appointment should not be left to the caprice of the Union Home Ministry. Nor should it be left to the predilections of the State Chief Minister. Nath Pai, a Member of Parliament, has recently suggested that the appointment of a Governor should be subject to the ratification by Parliament. The proposal merits serious consideration though the Central Government does not seem to be in a mood to accept it. In the alternative, it may be suggested that there should be a real consultation with the President and others whose advice is considered valuable and is respected by the people.

THE COUNCIL OF MINISTERS

The Council of Ministers. The Constitution provides that there shall be a Council of Ministers with the Chief Minister at the head to aid and advise the Governor in the exercise of his functions except insofar as he is by or under the Constitution required to act in his discretion.⁷⁰ The Constitution, as said before, does not attempt to define the discretionary powers of the Governor except in the case of Assam Governor who acts in his discretion, in respect of the administration of tribal area, as the agent of the President. But what matters fall within his discretion are decided by the Governor in his discretion and his decision in final.

Government produced another set of facts and alleged that the firing was unprovoked and unwarranted. The Central Government ordered a judicial inquiry into the incident. This too was criticised by the State Government and indicated that it might set up a separate Inquiry Commission of its own. The West Bengal Government organised a massive agitation against the Central Government and officially declared West Bengal bandh day a closed day.

The Governor appoints the Chief Minister and other Ministers are appointed by the Governor on the advice of the Chief Minister.⁷¹ While the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to the Legislative Assembly of the State, Ministers hold office during the pleasure of the Governor.⁷² There is no provision in the Constitution for individual responsibility of the Ministers to the Legislative Assembly. Individual responsibility is covered by the provision that Ministers hold office during the pleasure of the Governor and the pleasure of the Governor really means the pleasure of the Chief Minister. When a Minister does not agree with the policy of the Council of Ministers, or he does anything else which compromises the solidarity and stability of the Government, constitutional propriety as well as a duty demand that he should immediately resign when a hint is given by the Chief Minister. If he does not resign, then, it is the right of the Chief Minister to advise the Governor his dismissal. Dr. Ambedkar emphasised this point in the Constituent Assembly.

Joint responsibility is the first necessity of a responsible Government and the most essential fact for a successful democratic administration. The Ministry is one and indivisible and its solidarity demands a "common front" both within and outside the Legislature. A Minister differing from the policy determined by the Cabinet must resign from the Government. If he does not resign, then, the decision of the Cabinet is as much his decision as that of his colleagues even if he protested against it in the Cabinet. It means that the Minister cannot rebut the criticism of his opponents on the plea that he did not agree in the decision when the matter was being discussed in the Cabinet. And for that matter all Cabinet secrets must be most scrupulously guarded. This strict discipline the system of responsible Government insists if mature, rational and independent contribution to the policy-making is desired from men who are engaged in a common cause and who come together for the purpose of reaching an agreement. "It is, however, not unusual in our country", says K.M. Munshi, "to find a differing Minister's views appearing in the daily papers on the morning after a Cabinet meeting."⁷³ In the States differences among the Ministers and among some Ministers and the Chief Minister are more frequent and pronounced than at the Centre. "Faction among State parliamentary parties", observes Prof. Sri Ram Sharma, "have been a rule rather than an exception. Intrigues against other colleagues and the Chief Minister have followed factious struggles. In almost all the States these have been furthered by the rift between the head of the political party in the State and the Chief Minister."⁷⁴ When Ministers contradict each other, cracks appear in the Government fabric which are injurious and possibly fatal to good government. When intrigues and factious struggle amongst the Ministers enter the body politic that is the end of responsible government and this is the hard lesson Indians have learnt by years of experience.

The number of the Ministers is not fixed. It is for the Chief Minister to determine the size of the Council of Ministers and he does so as the requirements of the occasion may demand. The only constitutional requirement is that in the States of Bihar, Madhya Pradesh, and Orissa the Council of Ministers must have a Minister in charge of Tribal welfare and the same Minister may also be entrusted with the welfare of the Scheduled Castes and Backward Classes in the State.⁷⁵

It has often been complained that the Councils of Ministers in the States are unduly large and it heavily burdens their exchequers.⁷⁶ Prior to 1962, this criticism was untenable. Their number was nowhere larger than the actual needs of a good and efficient administration. The necessities of a Welfare State incredibly expand the functions of Government and correspondingly the number of the departments of the government. Responsible Government demands that all departments must be presided over by a political chief to see the proper implementation of policy and be answerable to the Legislature for its work. But not in the manner which coalition Governments, after 1967 General Elections, have done in a good number of the States. In a new and small State like Haryana, for instance, every legislator was an aspirant for Ministership and he defected from his parent party to be sworn-in the same day. In fact, Ministership was a bait to defect and crossing of floor had become a normal feature of the political life of the State raising the total number of the Council of Ministers to a staggering figure of 34 out of a total State Assembly membership of 81.

Before a Minister enters upon his office, the Governor shall administer to him the Oaths of Office and Secrecy according to the prescribed form in the Third Schedule. A Minister must be a member of one or the other House, if there are two Chambers, of the State Legislature. If he is not, he ceases to be a Minister after the expiration of six months.⁷⁷ The salaries and allowances of Ministers are to be such as the State Legislature may determine by law. The question whether any, and if so what, advice was tendered by Ministers to the Governor cannot be inquired into by any Court.⁷⁸ The question of ministerial advice, as such, cannot be brought before Courts. This provision also establishes that the relations between the Governor and his Ministers are confidential.

The Constitution nowhere mentions, both in respect to the Union and the States, the word Cabinet. It provides for a Council of Ministers at both the levels. But the Cabinet has an extra-constitutional growth at the Centre. The Council of Ministers so far formed at the Centre made definite distinction between 'Ministers of Cabinet' and 'Ministers of Cabinet rank', that is, Ministers of State. No such distinction was made in the States till after 1962 General Elections. Now this categorisation of Ministers of different status is complete in the States too. Even Deputy Chief Ministers have been appointed in some of the States. But it is the Cabinet Ministers alone who meet in a body, deliberate and formulate policy and constitute a Cabinet. The Cabinet Ministers preside over the different Departments of Government and see that the policy collectively determined by the Cabinet is properly implemented. If a Minister of State (Minister of Cabinet rank) holds an independent charge of a Department, he attends the meetings of the Cabinet and participates in its deliberations when problems relating to his Department are under discussion. Deputy Ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries have no berth in the Cabinet. The Deputy Ministers have no charge of a separate Department and they receive lesser salary than the Cabinet Ministers and Ministers of Cabinet rank. Their task is to assist the Ministers, with whom they are attached, in their administrative and Parliamentary duties. The Parliamentary Secretaries are neither Ministers nor do they exercise any powers. They are assigned duties as the Minister in charge of the Department to which they are attached may consider necessary. But all of them, who make the Council of Ministers, are members of the State Legislature, belong to the majority party of the Legislative Assembly and are collectively responsible to it. They remain in office so long as they can retain the confidence of the Legislative Assembly.

Dismissal of Ministry. Dismissal of a Ministry by the Head of the State is not an accepted axiom of Parliamentary Government under normal conditions. But if the Governor is convinced that the Ministry was indulging in political manoeuvring to keep itself in office thereby jeopardising the interests of the State, or that it was engaged in activities which were likely to endanger national security or unity, the Governor can in his discretion dismiss such a Ministry. Dr. B. R. Ambedkar's clarification on the issue leaves no room for controversy. Speaking on June 2, 1949, he said, "My submission is that although the Governor has no function still, even the constitutional Governor, that he is, has certain duties to perform. His duties, according to me, may be classified in two parts. One is, that he has to retain the Ministry in office. Because the Ministry is to hold office during his pleasure, he has to see whether and when he should exercise his pleasure against the Ministry...." Rejecting the application filed by M.P. Sharma under Article 226 challenging the West Bengal Governor's order dismissing United Front Ministry headed by Ajoy Mukherjee, Mr. Justice B.C. Mitter held that withdrawal of "pleasure" was entirely at the discretion of the Governor. The provision of Article 164(2) that the Ministers should be collectively responsible to the Legislative Assembly of the State, Justice Mitter declared, did not in any manner fetter or restrict the Governor's power to withdraw the "pleasure" during which the Ministers held office. Collective responsibility contemplated in Article 164(2), in his Lordship's opinion, meant that the Council of Ministers was answerable to the Legislative Assembly of the State.⁷⁹

79. As reported in The Statesman, New Delhi, February 8, 1968. This is how Dharam Vira, the then Governor of West Bengal, gives the explanation of his dismissing Ajoy Mukherjee Ministry. He says, "so far as the formation of a new Government the discretion of a Governor is more or less absolute. But difficulty arises when a Government in power through some reason or the other

After a careful consideration of the constitutional position the Kerala Enquiry Committee of the Indian Commission of Jurists⁸⁰ opined, "where, therefore, the Governor is satisfied that the Ministerial orders are in violation of the law, it is not only his right, but his duty as the guardian of the Constitution, which he has sworn to preserve, protect and defend, to correct and rectify, and, in the last resort, to dismiss the Ministry, if recalcitrant. A Governor who fails in his duty, must be deemed to be privy to the violation of the law; and his position would become wholly untenable. It may be that on the dismissal of the Ministry, the Governor might be unable to find an alternative Ministry commanding a majority in the Legislature. But, in that event, he has the right to order a dissolution of the Legislative Assembly and direct fresh elections."

The opinion expressed on November 11, 1967, by a spokesman on behalf of the Union Government on the point is perfectly sound. He said, "when in his judgment, the Governor is duly satisfied that the Chief Minister no longer commands support of the Majority of the MLAs, he would be justified in the exercise of his discretionary functions to dismiss the Council of Ministers. In such a case there can be no question of his acting on the advice of his Council of Ministers. This action, he elaborated, can be taken on the basis of any material or information available to him, even if such material or information might be extraneous to the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly. The Home Minister asserted in the Rajya Sabha that the discretion of a Governor was not justiciable.⁸¹ The Union Law Minister endorsed in the Lok Sabha the opinion expressed on behalf of the Home Ministry and opined that in dismissing the Ajoy Kumar Mukherjee Ministry in West Bengal, the Governor had acted "in the interest of the country, the democracy and the Constitution."⁸²

The Presiding officers of the Legislative bodies of India assembled in a conference on April 6-7, 1968 at New Delhi, adopted a resolution recommending to the Government of India to take urgent and suitable steps to evolve conventions in regard to the powers of the Governors to summon or prorogue the Legislatures and to dismiss Ministries. By implication the resolution had disapproved of the action of the Bengal Governor in assuming to himself the power to judge the support of the Ministry. The resolution stated that the question whether a Chief Minister has lost the confidence of the Assembly shall, at all time, be decided in appears to have lost its majority. Normally it should be for the Assembly to decide as to whether the Government enjoys majority support or not, but in order to decide the point it should also be possible for the Assembly to be called at the earliest possible date." the Assembly.⁸³ The resolution of the conference runs contrary to the stand of the Union Home Ministry that a Chief Minister holds office at the pleasure of the Governor. But the constitutional competence of a Governor's action in dismissing an elected government is not open to question today. Both the West Bengal High Court and, later, the Supreme Court—which dealt with similar questions arising from the Governor-Speaker controversy in Punjab—clearly upheld the Governor's actions in the two situations as constitutionally competent.

The Chief Minister.. At the head of the Council of Ministers in a State is the Chief Minister. He is appointed by the Governor, but other Ministers are appointed by the Governor on the advice of the Chief Minister. The advice of the Chief Minister is really the selection of his colleagues and the Governor simply endorses his choice. The appointment of Ministers by the Governor, therefore, is only technical. The Council of Ministers, as a body, is responsible to the State Legislative Assembly, but individual Ministers can be dismissed by the Governor which again, as said before, means the right of the Chief Minister. The Chief Minister, like the Prime Minister of India, is the keystone of the State Constitution, central to the formation of the Council of Ministers. He can make or unmake it or he may shuffle his pack as he likes and whenever it pleases him.

This simple analysis of the functions and position of the Chief Minister conforms to the working of the Cabinet system of government in its traditional form and as obtainable in Britain. These practices have been, to a considerable extent, followed in the working of the Union Government in India, and the position of the Indian Prime Minister, like the Prime Minister of Britain, is unchallengeable which no other colleague of his can rival. But the Chief Ministers in a majority of the States do not enjoy that unique position of exceptional and peculiar authority. Members of the majority party in the State Legislatures and the Ministers have not exhibited sufficient discipline of solidarity and team work. Personal differences, intra-party conflicts, clamour for offices, favouritism and even communalism, casteism and regionalism are so prominently in operation that the career of a Ministry is always in jeopardy. So long as one single-party reigned supreme in nearly all the States major splits between the groups within the Party were avoided by the stern hand of the Congress Central Parliamentary Board. But after the 1967 General Elections, when the stronghold of the Congress loosened, the splits hitherto curbed violently re-appeared. In fact, there was an open revolt. Even ambitious veterans left the Congress either to form a new party or joined hands with other groups with whom they had nothing in common except to oust the Congress from power. One of the main factors responsible for the disintegration of the Congress was the mighty hand of the Central Parliamentary Board which always dictated and imposed its decisions on the State Legislative Party. The Board seldom allowed the Party to elect its leader to become a Chief Minister and select his colleagues. The Chief Ministers were very often directed in the replacement of Ministers and even the Chief Minister. For instance, in Punjab Bhim Sain Sachar was replaced by Pratap Singh Kairon. Ram Kishen was not the State Party's choice and the Chief Minister ad nauseam proclaimed that he was the "driver" of the High Command. The practices established by the Congress neither helped to uphold the authority of the Chief Minister nor sustained collective responsibility. In reality it helped to aggravate group manipulations and created conditions of schism in the Cabinet utterly damaging the authority and prestige of the Chief Minister. A Party must freely elect its own leader and the leader should be free in shaping his Government according to his own view of what is likely to work best. An imposed leader from above cannot command the spontaneous esteem and loyalty of his colleagues and his colleagues in the Capital should be only those who owe to their chief personal as well as party allegiance.

83. The Statesman, New Delhi, April 8, 1968.

Governor's power to appoint a Chief Minister. The conventions of responsible Government in respect of appointment of Ministers are clear and matter of fact. The Head of the State summons the accredited leader of the majority party and commissions him to form the Ministry. The choice is obvious when there is one single party commanding a majority in the Legislature and it has a leader. If no party commands a real majority, the choice of the Chief Minister is not easy and the Head of the State exercises some discretion. If the government is defeated on a hostile vote in the representative Chamber, the Head of the State summons the leader of the Opposition and commissions him to form the Government. It is, also, a well-settled convention that the Chief Minister must belong to the Chamber to which the Ministry is responsible. The reasons for it are convincing and of practical utility.

Referring to the discretion of the King in Britain in the choice of the Prime Minister when no party commands a real majority in the House of Commons or when a Prime Minister dies in office or retires or when a political party has, at the crucial moment, no recognised leader, Herbert Morrison says, "The Sovereign's choice in these conditions has much constitutional significance. The choice may be a very delicate one and involve embarrassing complications. The Sovereign would, of course, take all relevant considerations into account, and be at great pains not only to be constitutionally correct, but make every effort to see that the correctness is likely to be recognised."⁸⁴ It means that acting in discretion in this respect must be according to the rules of reason and justice and not according to private opinion. Discretion must be exercised within the limit, to which an honest man competent to the discharge of his office ought to confine himself.⁸⁵ But there have been glaring violations of the conventions of responsible government in some of the States in India in respect to the appointment of the Chief Ministers and ministerial imbroglia in Orissa produced unsavoury repercussions generally on the political life of the country and on the evolution of democratic practices and traditions.

In Madras the outgoing Congress Ministry, which did not command a majority in the new State Assembly, after the general elections of 1952, recommended to the Governor to nominate C. Rajagopalachari, a member of the Legislative Council, under Article 171(3)(e) and (5) of the Constitution. After nominating him a member of the Legislative Council, the Governor invited Rajaji, who was then the "prospective head" of the Congress Party in the State Legislature, to form the Government. The appointment of Rajaji, as Chief Minister, was widely criticised and the enraged political opinion sought the intervention of the State High Court through two petitions challenging the validity of his nomination. In Bombay, too, the Chief Minister was a nominated member of the Legislative Council. But the nomination of Morarji Desai and his appointment as Chief Minister was an utter violation of constitutional conventions and even constitutional propriety inasmuch as Morarji Desai had been defeated in the General Elections as a candidate for the Legislative Assembly seat.

What happened in Travancore-Cochin is yet another example of the working of responsible government in India. The State suffered in 1953, a breakdown of its Congress Party Government. The Chief Minister asked the State Assembly for a vote of confidence which was refused by a vote of 56 to 51. The leader of the Opposition asked the Head of the State (the Rajpramukh) to allow him to form a Coalition Government of the United Front of Leftists, excluding the Praja Socialist Party. The Rajpramukh did not agree and dissolved the Assembly. No party could get an absolute majority at the elections and the Rajpramukh had to decide which of the three major parties in the Assembly should form the government. His choice fell upon the Praja-Socialist Party, the smallest among the three, with 19 members out of a total membership of 118 in the Assembly. This was bad enough, but the Governor's action in commissioning Achyuta Menon, a member of Parliament, to form a ministry after the resignation of the Namboodiripad's Ministry in November 1969 was a worse constitutional impropriety.

The formation of the Congress Ministry in Orissa after the general elections of 1957 and the swearing in ceremony speech of the State Governor, which was characterised as a promise for an effort to secure a continued support of the Congress Ministry, has already been referred to. Reference has also been made to the action of the Orissa Government in April, 1958 to keep the Mahatab Government in office, although the Chief Minister had submitted to the Governor the resignation of his Ministry and expressly suggested to him the dissolution of the Assembly under Article 174. Summing up the whole issue of the resignation of Mahatab Ministry and its subsequent withdrawal, the Leader of the Opposition could well claim that "The fortnight-old political stalemate and constitutional deadlock was ended at last over the graveyard of constitutional principles, proprieties and conventions."⁸⁶ The conventions of the Constitution, Burke wrote, "determine the manner in which the rule of law, which they pre-suppose, is applied, so that they are, in fact, the motive power of the Constitution." He further added that "these conventions are always directed to secure that the Constitution works in practice in accordance with the prevailing constitutional theory."⁸⁷

86. The Hindustan Times, New Delhi, May 25, 1958.

87. As quoted by H.J. Laski in his Parliamentary Government in England, p. 52.

After the 1967 General Elections a piquant situation arose in some of the States. In these States no single Party could claim a clear majority to form the Government, although the Congress had emerged as the largest single Party. It has been contended that under such circumstances, the Governor must invite the Opposition to form the Ministry. If Opposition fails to form the Ministry after being called upon to do so first, the Governor should next carry out his "soundings" as to who will command the requisite majority in the Legislature. This is not a correct approach. The discretion of the Governor so far as the formation of a new Government is concerned is more or less absolute. Dharam Vira rightly says, "If there are multi-party groups coming together, this discretion has to be exercised carefully to ensure that the group or the party which wants to form a government is really in a majority and can form a stable government."⁸⁸

Duties of the Chief Minister. The Constitution prescribes⁸⁹ that it shall be the duty of the Chief Minister:

- (a) to communicate to the Governor all decisions of the Council of Ministers relating to the administration of the affairs of the State and proposals for legislation;
- (b) to furnish such information relating to the administration of the affairs of the State and proposals for legislation as the Governor may call for; and
- (c) if the Governor so requires to submit for the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which decision has been taken by a Minister but which has not been considered by the Council.

But once the matter so referred is approved by the Council of Ministers it becomes binding on the Governor. The Constitution nowhere empowers the Governor to re-open any decision already taken by the Council of Ministers. It is only the decision of an individual Minister that can be referred to the consideration of the Council of Ministers. It has been asserted that the provision empowering the Governor to direct the Chief Minister to submit for the consideration of the Council of Ministers any matter on which a decision has been taken by a Minister is not in accord with the principle of collective responsibility. But it is not exactly so. So long as one single party commands a clear majority in the State Legislature and the Council of Ministers is a homogeneous team, the possibility of a Minister taking a decision on any matter of policy independently of the Council of Ministers or taking an action on an important matter upon which there is no Cabinet decision or his acting contrary to the decision already taken by the Cabinet, is very rare. But when it is a coalition Government, in which many groups combine without having any common basis of policy, such an eventuality may happen, as it did happen in Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh and West Bengal, when a Minister takes action on an important matter upon which there is no Cabinet decision or makes a declaration of policy which may be contrary to the decision of the Cabinet. It is only here that the intervention of the Governor will be needed to safeguard the principle of collective responsibility enshrined in the Constitution. Dealing with this aspect K.M. Munshi said in the Constituent Assembly, "there is no harm, but there is great advantage if the Governor exercises his influence over his Cabinet. As I have said we have single parties in the provinces now but a time might come when there will be many parties, when the Premier might fail to bring about a compromise between the parties and harmonious policies during a crisis. At that time the value of the Governor would be immense and from this point of view, I submit, that the powers that are given here are legitimate powers given to a constitutional Head and they are essential for working out a smooth democracy and they will be most beneficial to the Ministers themselves, because then they will be able to get confidential information and advice from a person who has completely identified himself with them and get accessible to other parties."⁹⁰

THE STATE LEGISLATURE

The State Legislature. The Legislature of a State consists of a Governor and a House or two Houses as the case may be. Originally, Bihar, Bombay, Madras, Punjab, Uttar Pradesh and West Bengal among Part A States and Mysore among Part B States had bicameral Legislatures. Of the fourteen reorganised States ten were to have a bicameral legislature: Andhra Pradesh, Bihar, Bombay, Madhya Pradesh, Madras, Mysore, Punjab, Uttar Pradesh, West Bengal, and Jammu and Kashmir. But the second Chamber has not yet been constituted in Madhya Pradesh. With the creation of Maharashtra and Gujarat States in 1960, Gujarat opted for a single Chamber and so did Haryana on the division of Punjab in 1966. In Punjab and West Bengal the Legislative Councils were abolished in 1969 and early 1970 respectively. At present¹ bicameral Legislatures exist in Andhra Pradesh, Bihar, Jammu and Kashmir, Maharashtra, Mysore, Tamil Nadu (Madras) and Uttar Pradesh, seven in all.

Bicameral Legislature. The Memorandum on the principles of a model Provincial² Constitution circulated on May 30, 1947, by the constitutional Adviser provided for a single Chamber, called the Legislative Assembly in all the States. The note added to the Memorandum pointed out that under the Government of India Act, 1935, the Provinces of Assam, West Bengal, Bihar, Bombay, Madras and the United Provinces had bicameral Legislatures and whether any State was to have a bicameral Legislature or not would probably have to be left to the decision of the representatives of that State in the Constituent Assembly. In case any State decided to have two Chambers, the second Chamber would be called the Legislative Council.

The Provincial Constitution Committee decided that as a general rule, there should be only a single Chamber Legislature in all the States. But the Committee agreed that two Chamber Legislatures might be constituted in States where special circumstances existed.³ In a note added to the Report, the Committee proposed that the members representing the different States in the Constituent Assembly should meet separately and come to a final decision whether to have a second Chamber for their State or not.⁴ A sub-Committee consisting of B.G. Kher, Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya, P. Subarayan, and Dr. Kailash Nath Katju was constituted to determine the composition and the mode of representation of the members of the Legislative Council in case a State decided to have a second Chamber. The sub-Committee recommended that the membership of the second Chamber in a State which decided to have one should not be more than a quarter of the total membership of the Legislative Assembly, and that there should be, within certain limits, functional representation on the lines of the Constitution of Ireland. It was, accordingly, recommended that the composition of the Legislative Council should be: one-half to be elected on functional representation on the Irish pattern, one-third to be elected by the Legislative Assembly of the State by the method of the proportional representation, and one-sixth to be nominated by the Governor on the advice of his Ministers.⁵

These proposals of the sub-Committee were accepted by the Provincial Constitution Committee.⁶ The Constituent Assembly discussed the recommendations of the Provincial Constitution Committee on July 18 and 21, 1947 and were adopted with some amendments.⁷ The Constitution, thus, provides for a divergent practice of bicameral Legislature in the States. It also provides for the abolition of the Legislative Council in a State which has one, or for its creation in a State without one. The abolition or creation of the Legislative Council does not involve the amendment of the Constitution. The change can be brought about by the law of Parliament, passed like an ordinary law, in deference to the wishes of the State Legislative Assembly expressed in a resolution passed by a majority of the total membership and by two-thirds majority of those present and voting.⁸ That is to say, if the Legislative Assembly of a State expresses in a resolution, passed by a majority of its total membership and by two-thirds majority of those present and voting, a desire either for the creation or the abolition of the Legislative Council, Parliament will enact a law accordingly. The procedure regarding the creation or abolition of the Legislative Council is similar to the one provided in the Government of India Act, 1935. Dr. Ambedkar, while explaining the reasons for adopting this procedure, maintained, "The provisions of this Article follow very closely the provisions contained in the Government of India Act, Section 60, for the creation of the Legislative Council and Section 308 which provides for the abolition. The procedure adopted here for the creation and abolition is that the matter is really left with the Lower Chamber, which by a resolution may recommend either of the two courses that it may decide upon. In order to facilitate any change made either in the abolition of the Second Chamber or in the creation of a Second Chamber provision is made that such a law shall not be deemed to be an amendment of the Constitution, in order to obviate the difficult procedure which has been provided in the Draft Constitution for the amendment of the Constitution."⁹

Utility of the Legislative Councils. Whatever reasons might have weighed with the Provincial Constitution Committee to recommend such a procedure for the adoption of bicameralism it is, undoubtedly, clear that the makers of the Constitution were themselves uncertain of the utility of the Legislative Councils. By providing for their abolition they gave the Councils only a very subordinate and tentative place in the scheme of State Government. The Legislative Councils are not only Second Chambers, but also secondary Chambers. They have practically no control over Money Bills. A Money Bill must originate in the Legislative Assembly and having passed therefrom, it is transmitted to the Legislative Council for its recommendations. The Council must return the Bill to the Legislative Assembly within fourteen days of its receipt either with or without its recommendations. But the recommendations of the Council are not binding on the Assembly. If the Assembly rejects those recommendations or the Council does not make any recommendation within fourteen days, the Bill becomes law on receiving the assent of the Governor. All that the Council can do is to delay the Money Bill for fourteen days. Nor are its powers effective with respect to non-Money Bills. The Council can only delay the passage of a non-Money Bill for a period of four months. The Constitution does not even make a provision for joint sittings in case of disagreement between the two Houses of the State Legislature. The views of the Legislative Assembly must ultimately prevail.

There are many staunch advocates of bicameral Legislatures in the States.¹⁰ Bicameralism they do not regard a futile institution. They argue for it as a democratic necessity; a check on the hasty and ill-considered legislation. Legislative Councils, they say, adequately fulfil this purpose. From the performances of the Legislative Councils from the various States of India, they authenticate their usefulness as revisory Chambers. The amendments proposed to the bills by the Councils, they assert, have generally been accepted by the Legislative Assemblies and the speeches of elder statesmen and veteran politicians, who compose the membership of the Councils, are heard with keen attention and respect. Their opinions help to mould public opinion and the Government cannot remain oblivious of their views. In India, respect to age, experience and maturer judgment, they emphasise, is a heritage and their impact on public opinion is immense.

The atmosphere in the Councils, it is further maintained, is serene and it is particularly suited for initiating non-controversial legislation. Passions do not run high there and political antagonism does not assume so much bitterness as in the popular Chamber because the Legislative Council cannot bring a crisis in the Government. The result is a high order of debates and full consideration of the pros and cons of the legislation under discussion or matter under review. In financial matters, too, Legislative Councils have their own contribution to make which by no means is negligible. The Constitution provides that the Annual Budget is to be laid before both the Houses of the Legislature of a State if it is bicameral. It is discussed in both Houses. The report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General is also required to be laid before both Houses. The Second Chamber is also represented in the Public Accounts Committee.

10. Refer to Sri Prakasa, "Abolition of Upper Houses: The other side of Issue," The Tribune, Chandigarh, June 6, 1969.

But the critics of bicameral legislature in the States assert that the Councils are composed of diverse elements, differently elected and including nominated members. A Chamber so heterogeneously constituted, they urge, can neither properly serve the purpose of a revising Chamber nor can it act as an effective brake against the hasty and ill-considered legislation. It is further argued that there is dearth of representatives for both the Houses in every State and the Legislative Councils being what they are have not been able to attract whatever talent and experience is available. Moreover, the Party in power has used Legislative Council as a spring-board for its own power and patronage rather than to establish it as a forum of talent and eminence. Sometimes nominations are made to enable certain persons to become Ministers or even Chief Ministers, for instance, C. Rajagopalachari in Madras, Morarji Desai in the erstwhile Bombay State and Gyani Gurmukh Singh Mussafir in the re-organised Punjab State in 1966. The installation of Mr. Mandal as Chief Minister of Bihar after the defeat of M.M. Sinha's Ministry was rather dramatic. In a majority of cases nominations have seldom fulfilled the requirements of the Constitution that the members nominated shall consist of persons having special knowledge or practical experience in respect of such matters as literature, science, art, co-operative movement and social service.¹¹

If the Legislative Councils do not fulfil the democratic demands of a double Chamber it is a sheer hoax of democracy to continue with them. As far back as 1953, the Bombay State Assembly voted for the abolition of its Legislative Council by 182 votes to 31. Conformably to the United Front's 32-point programme the West Bengal Government announced its intention in March 1969 to seek the abolition of the Legislative Council. A similar announcement of intention was made in Punjab Governor's speech after the mid-term elections of 1969. No one, including the Opposition, in the West Bengal Legislative Assembly had a good word for the West Bengal Legislative Council and the resolution for its abolition was passed unanimously. It now stands abolished. Similar had been the fate of the Punjab Legislative Council. Many other States, in which Legislative Councils exist, have begun to appreciate that the scheme of bicameralism is completely out of accord with any sense of constitutional proportion or propriety. It is an expensive experiment and an unnecessary drain on the meagre resources of the States.¹² The Secretary, Punjab Legislative Council, an admirer of bicameralism in States, says, "If the Second Chamber is to fulfil its desired object it should be the endeavour of all parties to return therein men of eminence who have long and varied experience of life and maintain a good position in society and have got the strength of character and also capacity to render service to the nation."¹³ For its proper functioning, he further adds, "its programme of business should be properly planned so that the attention may be given by every member to every matter coming up for consideration." But that has not happened. Unfortunately, the Legislative Councils have been largely used as a dumping ground either for politicians who could not get elected to the Legislative Assembly or for politically discarded individuals who had to be shown some consideration. The blame for abusing the Upper Chambers in this way lies mainly on the Congress Party which controlled the lever of power in almost all the States for two decades after Independence. The Congress bosses seemed to look upon the Councils as a source of patronage. It is significant that in 1967 while the United Front Government in Punjab initiated moves for abolishing the Legislative Council, D.P. Mishra, Chief Minister of Madhya Pradesh, sought to saddle the State with an Upper Chamber.

Composition of the Councils. The Constitution simply lays down the maximum and the minimum limits for the membership of the Legislative Council of each State. Originally, the Constitution provided that a Legislative Council must not have less than forty members and its maximum membership must not exceed one-fourth of the number of the members in the State Legislative Assembly. The Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act, seeking to carry out a number of amendments to the Constitution, principally arising out of the reorganisation of States, provided that the total number of members in the Council shall not exceed one-third of the total number of members of the Legislative Assembly of that State and in no case less than 40. It means that the strength of a Legislative Council for a State depends upon the number of members of the Legislative Assembly of that State. The composition of the members is as follows:

(1) One-third of such number of the members of the Legislative Council are elected by the members of the Legislative Assembly of the State who are not members of the Assembly.

(2) One-third are elected by electorates consisting of members of municipalities, district boards and other local authorities in the State which Parliament may by law specify;

(3) One-twelfth are elected by electorates consisting of persons residing in the State who have been for at least three years graduates of any University in India;

(4) One-twelfth are elected by electorates consisting of persons who have been for three years engaged in teaching in schools not lower in standard than that of a secondary school; and

(5) The remainder to be nominated by the Governor from among persons having special knowledge or practical experience in respect of matters such as literature, science, art, co-operative movement and social service.

The system of election prescribed for all such categories is that of proportional representation by means of a single transferable vote.

A candidate for election to the Legislative Council must be a citizen of India, not less than thirty years of age and should possess all such other qualifications as may be prescribed by Parliament. A member of the Legislative Council who remains absent for a period of sixty days from all its meetings without permission vacates his seat.

Organisation of the Legislative Council. The Legislative Council is a permanent body and is not subject to dissolution. One-third of its members retire every second year and, thus, the term of an individual member comes to six years. The Council along with the Assembly must be summoned at least twice a year and not more than six months should intervene between the last sitting and the first sitting in the next session. The Governor prorogues the Legislative Council. He may address the Council separately or both the Houses together and may require the attendance of members for that purpose. He may send messages to the Council either in respect of a Bill pending before it suggesting any changes or modifications which he deems necessary and such messages must be considered at the earliest possible opportunity. At the first session after the General Elections to the Legislative Assembly and at the commencement of the first session of each year, the Governor has to address the Assembly or, in the case of a State having a Council, both Houses assembled together and inform the Legislature of the causes of its summons. The Council is required to provide in its rules for the allotment of time for discussion of the matters referred to in such address. Every Minister and the Advocate-General for a State has the right to speak in, and otherwise to take part in the proceedings of both Houses and any Committee of the Legislature of which he may be named a member. But a Minister is entitled to vote only in that House of which he is a member.

The Legislative Council choose its own Chairman and a Deputy Chairman. The Chairman and the Deputy Chairman vacate their offices if they cease to be members of the Council. They can also be removed from office by a resolution of the Council passed by a majority of all the then members of the Council. All questions at a sitting of the Council are decided by a majority vote of the members present and voting other than the Chairman. The Chairman exercises a casting vote in case of equality of votes.

Legislative functions of the Council. A Bill, other than a Money Bill or Finance Bill, may originate in either House of the State Legislature which has a Legislative Council. A Bill is not deemed to have been passed by the State Legislature having a Legislative Council unless it has been agreed to by both the Houses. But if a Bill (except a Money Bill) passed by the Legislative Assembly and transmitted to the Legislative Council is (a) either rejected by the Council or (b) more than three months elapse from the date of the receipt of the Bill by the Council without the Bill being passed by it, or (c) a Bill is passed by the Council with such amendments to which the Assembly does not agree, the Legislative Assembly may again pass the Bill with or without amendments suggested by the Council and then, transmit the Bill as so passed to the Legislative Council. If now the Legislative Council either (a) rejects the Bill for the second time, or (b) is not passed within one month from the date of the receipt of the Bill by the Council, or (c) is passed by the Council with such amendments to which the Assembly does not agree, then, the Bill shall be deemed to have been passed by both the Houses of the Legislature in the form in which it was passed by the Assembly. There is no provision for a joint sitting of both Houses in case of disagreement. The Legislative Council can only delay the passage of the Bill for a period of four months.

The original Draft of the Constitution provided for a joint sitting of both Houses in cases of difference,¹⁴ but it was dropped in the Constituent Assembly. Dr. Ambedkar explaining the amendment said that they were following the procedure of the British Parliament according to the Parliament Act of 1911. He maintained that the procedure laid down in the Parliament Act for the resolution of differences between the House of Commons and the House of Lords was more appropriate for the resolution of differences between the two Houses in the State of the Indian Union. The Article itself (197) was modelled on Article 57 in the Australian Constitution.

Financial Functions of the Council. The functions of a Legislative Council with respect to Money Bills are similar to those of the Council of States (Rajya Sabha). No Money Bill shall be introduced in a Legislative Council. After a Money Bill has been passed by the Legislative Assembly, it is transmitted to the Legislative Council for its recommendations. The Legislative Council is required within fourteen days of the receipt of the Bill to return the Bill to the Legislative Assembly with its recommendations. The Assembly may either accept or reject the recommendations of the Council. If it rejects, the Bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses in the form in which it was passed by the Legislative Assembly. If the Bill is not returned to the Assembly with its recommendations within fourteen days of its receipt by the Council, it is deemed to have been passed by both the Houses at the expiration of the said period in the form in which it was passed by the Assembly.

It will, accordingly, appear that in money or financial matters the Legislative Council has neither the initiative nor any effective voice. It can only make recommendations and it is for the Legislative Assembly to accept those recommendations or not. If the Council makes no recommendations within fourteen days after receiving the Bill, it is deemed to have been passed by both the Houses of the Legislature in the form as it was passed by the Legislative Assembly. The real power in money matters belongs to the Assembly.

Administrative Functions of the Council. The Council does not control the Ministry. The Constitution definitely provides that the Council of Ministers is collectively responsible to the Legislative Assembly. The Council can, however, put questions and supplementaries on matters connected with public administration, move, discuss and pass resolutions on any matter of public importance and relating to the administration of the State.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

Composition of the Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly is the popular Chamber and the real centre of power in a State. It is composed of members directly elected by the people in territorial constituencies in which the State is divided. The suffrage is universal, that is, every adult citizen of twenty-one and above irrespective of his race, caste, creed or sex has the right to vote, provided he is not otherwise disqualified on the ground of non-residence, unsoundness of mind, crime or corrupt or illegal practice. The electoral rolls are prepared and revised annually under the direction and supervision of the Election Commission.

The Constitution provides that the maximum strength of a Legislative Assembly must not exceed 500 or its minimum strength fall below 60. The actual work of delimiting the constituencies is left to Parliament. After the completion of each census representation of the several territorial constituencies must be readjusted by such authority and in such manner as Parliament may by law determine. The demarcation of territorial constituencies is to be done in such a manner that the ratio between the population of each constituency and the number of seats allotted to it is, as far as practicable, the same throughout the State.

Apart from these general provisions, the Constitution makes special provisions regarding the representation of the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes except the Scheduled Tribes in the Tribal Area of Assam and the reservation of seats for the Autonomous Districts in the Legislative Assembly of the State of Assam.¹⁵ Provision has also been made for the nomination of the members of the Anglo-Indian community. If the Governor is of the opinion that the Anglo-Indian community¹⁶ is not adequately represented in the Legislative Assembly, he may nominate such number of members of the community to the Assembly as he may consider appropriate. Originally, all such reservations of seats for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes and the representation of the Anglo-Indian community by nomination were to cease after ten years from the commencement of the Constitution.¹⁷ But the Constitution (Eighth Amendment) Act extended all such reservations and nominations to the various State Assemblies for another ten years. The original Bill amending the Constitution sought to restrict the nomination of the Anglo-Indians to the State Assemblies. It provided that not more than two members in the case of West Bengal and one in the case of other States could be nominated to the State Legislature, but this provision had to be deleted as it failed to secure the requisite representation. The number of Anglo-Indians to be nominated was left, as before, to the discretion of the Governor. The Constitution (Twenty-third) Amendment Act now extends the reservations and nominations to another ten years.

Qualifications for Membership of the Legislative Assembly. The conditions of eligibility for membership of the Legislative Assembly are the same as for members of the House of the People (Lok Sabha). Candidates should be citizens of India, not less than twenty-five years of age and possess such other qualifications as may be prescribed by Parliament. No person can be a member of both Houses of the State Legislature, if there is a Legislative Council. No person can also be a member of the Legislatures of two or more States. The House may declare vacant the seat of any member who absents himself from all meetings for sixty days without the permission of the Legislative Assembly.

A person is disqualified for being chosen as, and for being a member of the Legislative Assembly of a State: (a) if he holds any office of profit under the Government of India or the Government of any State other than an office declared by the State Legislature by law not to disqualify its holder; (b) if he is of unsound mind and stands so declared by competent Court; (c) if he is an undischarged insolvent; (d) if he is not a citizen of India, or has voluntarily acquired the citizenship of a foreign State, or is under any acknowledgement of allegiance or adherence to a foreign State; (e) if he is so disqualified by or under any law made by Parliament. A person shall not be deemed to hold an office of profit under the Government of India or the Government of any State by reason only that he is a Minister either for the Government of India or for any State Government. If any question arises as to whether a member of the State Legislature is subject to any of the disqualifications aforementioned, the decision of the Governor shall be final. But before giving any decision on any such question, the Governor must obtain the opinion of the Election Commission and he is required to act according to such opinion.³⁰ The decision of the Governor, therefore, is really the opinion of the Election Commission.

The term of the Legislative Assembly is five years, unless sooner dissolved from the date of its first meeting. But its life may be extended, while the Proclamation of Emergency is in operation, by a law of Parliament for a period not exceeding one year at a time. Such an extension, however, must not be extended beyond six months after the Proclamation of Emergency has ceased to operate.

Sessions, Prorogation and Dissolution. The Governor summons the State Legislature to meet at such time and place as he thinks fit. But not more than six months should intervene between its last sitting in one session and its first sitting in the next session. The Governor prorogues the Legislature and may dissolve the Assembly even before the expiry of its normal term of five years.

The Governor may address the Assembly or, in the case of a State having a Legislative Council, either House or both Houses assembled together. He may send messages to either House, on a Bill pending in the Legislature suggesting any changes or modifications which he deems necessary and it is the duty of the House to which such a message is sent to consider it with all possible dispatch. The Constitution imposes a duty on the Governor to address the new Legislature after the General Elections and at the commencement of its first session every year and inform the Legislature of the causes of its summons. The Legislature is required to provide in its rules for the allotment of time for the discussion of the Governor's address. The debate and voting on the address, in fact, constitutes an annual vote of confidence in the Council of Ministers.

Every Minister and the Advocate-General for a State have the right to speak in both Houses, if there is a Legislative Council, and to take part in their proceedings as well as in their Committees. But a Minister is entitled to vote only in that House of which he is a member.

The quorum to constitute a meeting of a House of the State Legislature is ten members or one-tenth of the total number of members of the House, whichever is greater, until the State Legislature by law otherwise provides.

The Speaker. Every Legislative Assembly of a State chooses two of its members as the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker. In case of vacancy in the office of the Speaker or in the Deputy Speaker the Assembly has to choose another member to fill the office. A member holding office as Speaker or Deputy Speaker vacates his office if he ceases to be a member of the Assembly. He may, also, resign his office at any time. If the Speaker resigns, the letter of resignation is required to be addressed to the Deputy Speaker, and if the Deputy Speaker resigns, then, it is addressed to the Speaker. He may be removed from office by a resolution of the Assembly passed by a majority of all the then members of the Assembly after fourteen days' notice of the intention to move such a resolution. But the Speaker does not vacate his office on the dissolution of the Assembly. He continues to be the Speaker until immediately before the first meeting of the Assembly after the dissolution. While the office of the Speaker is vacant, the Deputy Speaker performs his duties. If the offices of both the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker are vacant, the Governor appoints a member of the Assembly to perform the duties of the office for the time being. If the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker are both absent from any sitting of the Assembly, such person as may be determined by the rules of the Assembly acts as Speaker. If no such person is present, then, any other person which the Assembly may determine acts as Speaker. The Speaker or the Deputy Speaker is not to preside at any sitting of the Assembly while any resolution for his removal is under consideration. But he has the right to be present in the House and take part in its proceedings and is entitled to vote in the first instance on such a resolution. That is, he votes on such an occasion like an ordinary member and, consequently, he has no casting vote. The Speaker and the Deputy Speaker are paid such salaries and allowances as may be fixed by the State Legislature by law and are charged on the Consolidated Fund of the State.

The duties and powers of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker of a Legislative Assembly are, broadly speaking, the same as those of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker of the House of the People (Lok Sabha). The Speaker is an 'independent and impartial' presiding officer and he has been vested with all the powers consistent with dignity of the Chair and necessary to ensure the orderly conduct of the business of the Assembly. He is empowered to admit questions, resolutions and motions and allots time to the different kinds of business before the Assembly. He determines, in consultation with the Leader of the House, the order of business and fixes the time-limits to speeches. He maintains proper order and decorum in the House and has the power to ask a member to withdraw from the House for any violation of the rules of the House or to suspend him for a whole session if his conduct is grossly disorderly or is in flagrant disregard of the authority and the rulings of the Chair. In the event of grave disorder the Speaker may adjourn the House or suspend its session.

The Speaker nominates the panel of Chairmen and the Chairmen of the Select Committees on Bills as well as of other Committees of the Assembly. He interprets the rules of the Assembly and decides all points of order and questions of procedure. His ruling cannot be contested, it is final.

The Speaker, in brief, is the impartial custodian of the rights of the members of the House. But the high traditions of the office and the great reverence with which the members hold the Speaker of the House of Commons are altogether absent in the States of India. The Speaker in the House of Commons, says Herbert Morrison, 'has no bell with which to restore order, not even a gravel. When he rises in his place and says 'Order, Order', it is rare for the House not to come to order at once. And if some members should be noisy a large proportion of the House will aid the Speaker by crying 'Order, Order', until the noisy, and disorderly ones are quietened, or a member standing at the same time as the Speaker rises resumes his seat.'¹⁹ But in India, exchanges of hot words between the Speaker and some members are not infrequent. There have been some good number of cases in which a member who is "named" has refused to apologise or quit the Chamber on being called upon by the Speaker to do so. In some cases the services of the Marshal have also been requisitioned to make a recalcitrant member to leave the House in obedience to the instructions of the Speaker. The Uttar Pradesh Vidhan Sabha provided the unprecedented instance on September 8, 1958, in which the Marshal was compelled to requisition the help of the armed constabulary to turn out the leader and members of the Socialist group who defied the Speaker's order to quit. But what happened in West Bengal's Vidhan Sabha on September 21, 1959 was recklessly disgraceful. Not only did members of the Congress Party and the Opposition, notably the Communists, indulged in shouting down one another, but also hurled shoes at one another. As if this was not enough three mikes were pulled from their sockets and thrown at the occupants of the Treasury benches. Two members challenged each other on the floor of the House and later exchanged blows at the lobbies until they were separated by the sober colleagues.²⁰ A Pakistani correspondent, who was present in the Vidhan Sabha to report the proceedings, whispered to an Indian correspondent, "I was there when the Deputy Speaker was murdered in the East Pakistan Assembly."²¹

The Opposition members of the Jan Sangh and Socialist Parties of the Uttar Pradesh Vidhan Sabha again lost balance on September 27, 1962 when they continually thumped their tables to obstruct the business of the House at the consideration stage of the Land Holding Tax Bill. They gesticulated, they raised their hands and their voices and changed their tactics of obstruction as it suited them. The Speaker named five Jan Sangh and two Socialist members and suspended them for a month for defying his authority.²² Such a kind of demonstration has become all too frequent a feature of the proceedings of the U.P. Vidhan Sabha. And the Socialist members of that House, as also of others including Parliament, have been specializing in this variety of parliamentary performance. They dare offer an insult to the President of India and the Governor, when the former addressed Parliament and the later U.P. Legislature, on the opening day of 1963 Budget Sessions. The duty of the Opposition, no doubt, is to oppose. In doing so, it may find scope for guerilla tactics. But all this must be done in accordance with the rules of the parliamentary game. Otherwise, the whole parliamentary process will be reduced to a farce, nay, even to fascism or anarchy. There is no rule of the game more vital than the one which enjoins obedience to the Chair.

The Speakers, too, have very often not acted with due discretion. The Speaker of the PEPSU Legislative Assembly was saved from removal from office by the prorogation of the House by the Rajpramukh. Another Speaker apologised to the House when his conduct was sought to be discussed by a privilege motion. Yet another tried to explain away the offending remarks and even offered to expunge them from the proceedings. In Andhra Pradesh the leave to move the resolution against the Speaker was refused because the requisite support of the members, under the rules, was not forthcoming.

But what happened in West Bengal and Punjab perhaps shall ever remain unprecedented. The Speaker of the West Bengal Assembly, Bijoy Kumar Banerjee, adjourned the House sine die soon after it met on November 29, 1967. Speaker Banerjee said in his ruling, "This House meets under extraordinary circumstances. I am prima facie satisfied that the dissolution of the Ministry headed by Mr. Ajoy Kumar Mukerjee, the appointment of Dr. P.C. Ghosh as Chief Minister and the summoning of this House on his advice are unconstitutional and invalid since it has been effected behind the back of this House."²³ In an interview Speaker Bijoy Kumar Banerjee said in Calcutta on November 30, 1967 that he might again adjourn the Assembly sine die, if it was re-convened by the Governor "unless, of course, I change my view that the appointment of Dr. P.C. Ghosh as Chief Minister and the summoning of the House on his advice is unconstitutional and invalid."²⁴ The Speaker did for the second time when the House met for the Budget Session.

In Punjab, the Minority Party supported by the Congress Party formed the Government headed by Lachman Singh Gill. On behalf of the United Front, Satya Pal Dang questioned the legality and constitutionality of the new Government. Speaker Joginder Singh Mann upheld the constitutional validity of the Gill Government in a ruling delivered in the Punjab Assembly on December 5, 1967. But during its Budget Session, when the Annual Financial Statement had already been laid before the House and the financial business was about to be gone through, the Speaker adjourned the House for two months as he had to face two motions expressing no-confidence in himself. This was palpably done to escape or evade the consequences of no-confidence motions.

Later, the Governor prorogued the House and issued an Ordinance directing the House to transact the financial business without any adjournment. Former Finance Minister Baldev Prakash and Satyapal Dang, another former Minister, challenged the validity of the subsequent proceedings of the House as well as the Governor's ordinance in the High Court. They contended that the Governor could not issue an Ordinance when the House was in session. A special Bench of the High Court of Punjab and Haryana unanimously held that the two Appropriations Acts, passed after the Governor re-summoned the House, were unconstitutional and void.

The Punjab Government appealed to the Supreme Court. Referring to the Speaker's ruling that the adjourned House could only be reconvened by him, the Supreme Court, in its unanimous judgment, held that it was based on a wrong assumption. The Court said, "If ever there was an occasion for regulation of financial business by law, it was this. The Legislature could not be allowed to hibernate for two months while financial business languished and constitutional democracy and machinery itself were wrecked." It was declared that the Speaker was not competent to pronounce on the legality of the sitting of the House. Such a pronouncement was, therefore, null and void. The Speaker, the Court added, had asserted against the law which was binding upon him.

Has the Speaker the power to adjourn the House. The Constitution is silent on the point. It merely states that every Legislative Assembly shall choose a member to be a Speaker. Article 208 empowers a House of Legislature to make rules for "regulating its procedure and the conduct of its business". Under this Article, Rules or Standing Orders have been made and it is here that we find the Speaker being given the authority to adjourn the House from time to time. But the Speaker's power of adjournment is limited. He can control disorder in the House, but cannot adjourn for a long period in anticipation of disorderly situations. M. Ananthasayanam Ayyangar, former Speaker of the House of the People (Lok Sabha), said in an interview on the Punjab situation that it "is the privilege of the House to decide how long it should sit and what business it should transact. It, therefore, means that the governing party, which is the majority party in the House, decides the sitting or adjourning the House."²⁵ Sanjiva Reddy, the then Speaker of the Lok Sabha, aptly observed at the conference of the Presiding Officers that it was the "first duty of the Speaker to enable the Legislature to function and not to shut it out." He further observed that it was not the Speaker's function to decide on the legality of a Ministry. "This lies within the province of the country's courts."²⁶

Such actions on the part of the Speakers neither add to the dignity of the Chair nor do they help the growth of traditions associated with the office of the Speaker. India has not in the last two decades evolved any concept of non-partisan Speakerships. There have been numerous instances of Speakers becoming Chief Ministers or Ministers. One was appointed a member of the Union Public Service Commission. The result is what is happening in the Chambers of the State Legislatures. In August 1969, the Speaker of Assam Legislative Assembly was gheraoed and microphones were uprooted by some members. There at least no violence was attempted on the person of the Speaker. But just a fortnight later, in the Uttar Pradesh Assembly shoes, seat-cushions and booklets were thrown at the chair. The Speaker called the Marshal and police to enjoin Opposition members while the Deputy Speaker, who belonged to the Opposition, shouted at the police to get out of the Chamber.

POWERS AND FUNCTIONS OF THE ASSEMBLY

Legislative Functions. The State Legislatures have the power to make laws on all subjects contained in the State List and it is their exclusive jurisdiction. Some of the important subjects in the State List are: Public Order, Police, Administration of Justice, Prisons, Reformatories, Borstal Institutions and other institutions of a like nature, Local Government, Public Health and Sanitation, Pilgrimages, Relief of the Disabled and Unemployable, Education, Libraries, Communications, Agriculture, Preservation, Protection and Improvement of Stock, Water, Land, Forests, Regulation of Mines and Mineral Development, Industries, Markets and Fairs, Weights and Measures, Public Works, Land Revenue, Excise, etc.

In addition to the subjects contained in the State List, the jurisdiction of the State Legislatures to make laws extends to matters included in the Concurrent List. Some of the important subjects in the Concurrent List are: Criminal Law, Criminal Procedure, Preventive Detention, Marriage and Divorce, Contracts, Trust and Trustees, Civil Procedure, Vagrancy, Lunacy and Mental Deficiency, Adulteration of Foodstuffs and other Goods, Drugs and Poisons, Economic and Social Planning, Trade Unions, Welfare of Labour, Vocational Training, Legal, Medical and other Professions, Relief and Rehabilitation of Displaced Persons, Trade and Commerce, Price Control, Factories, Electricity, etc. Both Parliament and the State Legislatures have the right to make laws on subjects contained in the Concurrent List, but if Parliament passes a law on a matter given in the Concurrent List, the State Legislature is not competent to pass law on the same subject. If the State Legislature, on the other hand, has passed a law on a subject given in the Concurrent List, Parliament, too, can pass a law on the subject and the State law becomes inoperative to the extent it is repugnant to the Union law. The State law, however, prevails notwithstanding such repugnancy, if the State law was reserved for the President and had received his assent.

The Constitution also imposes following restrictions on the powers of the State Legislatures even within their exclusive sphere:

(1) Some State laws will be invalid unless they are reserved for consideration of the President and are assented to by him, for example, laws passed by the State Legislatures for the acquisition of property;²⁷ laws in respect of concurrent matters which are repugnant to earlier legislations of Parliament;²⁸ laws providing for the imposition of taxes on the sale or purchase of commodities declared by Parliament to be essential for the life of the community.²⁹

(2) Some Bills require the previous sanction of the President before they can be introduced in the State Legislatures, for instance, Bills seeking to impose restrictions in the public interest on the freedom of trade, commerce or intercourse within or without that State.³⁰

(3) Parliament is also empowered to legislate with respect to a matter in the State List if the Council of States declares by a resolution supported by a two-thirds majority that it is expedient in the national interest for Parliament to do so.³¹ But such a resolution remains in force for a limited period.

(4) While a Proclamation of Emergency is in operation Parliament has the power to legislate with respect to any matter in the State List.³²

(5) In case of failure of constitutional machinery in a State, the President may suspend the State Legislature and vest its powers in Parliament.³³

A Bill, other than a Money Bill, may originate in either House of the State Legislature, if there is a Legislative Council. A Bill is deemed to have been passed by the Houses of the Legislature when it is agreed to by both the Houses, which for all intents and purposes means the Legislative Assembly. The Council cannot force its decisions on the Assembly. It can simply delay the passage of a Bill for four months. In brief, all legislative power of the State, subject to the power of issuing ordinances by the Governor, when the Legislature is not in session, is concentrated in the Assembly.

Financial Functions. The control of the Legislative Assembly is complete over the finances of the State. All Money Bills must originate in the Assembly and its verdict must prevail in all respects. In case there is a Legislative Council, it must return a Money Bill to the Assembly within fourteen days of its receipt with or without recommendations. If it is not returned within that period, or its recommendations are not acceptable to the Assembly, the Bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses in the form in which it was passed by the Legislative Assembly. The Annual Financial Statement or the Budget is required to be laid before the House or the Houses of the State Legislature. All proposals for expenditure, except the expenditure charged on the revenues of the State which can be discussed but not voted upon by the State Legislature, are submitted to the Legislative Assembly in the form of demands for grants. The voting of grants is the exclusive privilege of the Assembly and it has the power to pass or reject a demand or to reduce its amount, though it has not the power to increase the amount. It is, further, provided that no tax will be levied in a State without the sanction of the Legislative Assembly.

32. Article 250 (1).

33. Article 356 (b).

Control over Administration. The control of the Assembly over the administration of the State is a logical conclusion of the Parliamentary system of Government. The Council of Ministers is formed out of the majority party in the Assembly and it is collectively responsible to it. No one can continue to remain a Minister for more than six consecutive months without a seat in the one or the other House of the Legislature. The salaries and allowances of the Ministers are voted by the Assembly.

The Assembly can seek information from the Government on any matter of public administration by means of questions and supplementaries. It can also move and pass resolutions recommending to the Government steps which should be taken on matters of public importance. The Assembly may censure the Government if it does not approve its policy and pass a vote of no-confidence, entailing the resignation of the Ministry.

Electoral Functions. The Legislative Assembly forms part of the Electoral College for electing the President.

LEGISLATIVE PROCEDURE

Legislative Procedure. The Constitution prescribes the most important rules of procedure of the State Legislatures and they are covered by Articles 196—201. The less important and detailed rules have been left for the determination by the State Legislatures themselves. The rules prescribed by the Constitution similar to the rules prescribed for Parliament, vide Articles 107—111, and the rules framed by the State Legislatures follow the model of Parliament as incorporated in its Rules of Procedure and Conduct of Business.

Legislative Bills. According to the legislative procedure a Bill other than a Money or Finance Bill, may originate in either House of the State Legislature which has a Legislative Council. A Bill shall not be deemed to have been passed by the Houses of the Legislature of a State having a Legislative Council unless it has been agreed to by both Houses, either without amendment or with such amendments only as are agreed to by both Houses. The prorogation of a House or Houses does not involve the lapse of a Bill pending in the State Legislature. Bills pending in the Council but which have not been passed by the Assembly do not lapse on a dissolution of the Assembly. The dissolution of the Assembly causes the lapse of any Bill which is pending in it, or which has been passed by it but is pending in the Legislative Council.

In case of disagreement between the Legislative Assembly and the Legislative Council over a Bill, the Constitution does not provide for a joint sitting of both Houses, as it is in the case of the Union Parliament,³⁴ for the resolution of such disagreements. Disagreements between the two Houses of the State Legislature are resolved by the simple expedient of the Assembly passing the disputed Bill for the second time. The Constitution says, if a Bill has been passed by the Legislative Assembly and transmitted to the Legislative Council and (a) is rejected by the Legislative Council, or (b) more than three months elapse from the date of its receipt by the Legislative Council without the Bill being passed by it, or (c) a Bill is passed by the Council with amendments to which the Legislative Assembly does not agree, then, the Assembly may pass the Bill again either in its original form or with such amendments as suggested by the Council and agreed to by the Assembly. When the Assembly passes the Bill for the second time, it is transmitted to the Legislative Council and if (a) the Bill is, again, rejected by the Council, or (b) more than one month elapses from the date of its receipt by the Council without the Bill being passed by it, or (c) the Bill is passed by the Council with amendments to which the Assembly does not agree the Bill is deemed to have been passed by both the Houses of the State Legislature in the form in which it was passed by the Legislative Assembly for the second time.

When a Bill has been passed by the State Legislature it is presented to the Governor for his assent. The Governor may either give his assent to the Bill or may withhold his assent therefrom or may reserve the Bill for the consideration of the President or he may return the Bill with a message for reconsideration in whole or in part, or may suggest amendments thereto. In the last case if the Bill is again passed with or without amendments, the Governor must give the assent thereto.

Different Stages in the Passage of a Bill. A Bill, other than a Money Bill, in order to become a law has to pass through three readings in each House, if the State has a Bicameral Legislature. The first reading covers the introduction of the Bill. The motion for leave to introduce a Bill is a formal business. The member asking for leave makes a short speech. By convention no debate takes place at this stage and the Speaker immediately puts the question. If the House grants the leave, the mover of the Bill rises to say, "Sir, I introduce the Bill." No speech is made on the contents of the Bill nor does any other members speak on the motion or the Bill. If a motion for leave is opposed, the Speaker permits the member moving the Bill to make a brief explanatory statement and so does the member opposing it. Then, the question is put to the House. But if the Opposition attacks the Bill on the ground of the incompetency of the Legislature to consider it, the Speaker permits a full discussion thereon.

After the Bill has been introduced, it is immediately published in the Gazette. The Speaker may permit the publication of the Bill in the Government Gazette before the motion for leave to introduce the Bill has been made. In that case, it is not necessary to move for leave to introduce the Bill and if the Bill is afterwards introduced it is not necessary to publish it again. The first reading of the Bill is now complete.

The second reading of the Bill is divided into two stages. The first stage consists of a general discussion of the Bill and the second stage relates to the discussion of clauses, schedules and amendments. The first stage in the second reading begins when the member in whose name the Bill stands moves one of these motions: (a) that it may be taken into consideration either at once or at some future date to be mentioned, or (b) it be referred to the Select Committee of the House, or (c) to a Joint Committee of the two Houses, if there is a Legislative Council in the State, or (d) it be circulated for the purpose of eliciting public opinion.

It is here that the member-in-charge of the Bill explains the purpose and objects of the Bill, gives the background of the Bill, explains the circumstances in which the Bill is necessary; and gives such other material information as may be necessary in respect of the Bill. The Opposition opposes the Bill, but the discussion must be confined around the principles of the Bill and its general provisions. No amendment to the Bill can be made at this stage, except for amendments to the motion that the Bill be taken into consideration or it be referred to a Select Committee or it be circulated for eliciting public opinion.

When the motion that a Bill be referred to a Select Committee is made, the member-in-charge of the Bill indicates the names of members who would constitute the Select Committee as also the date by which the Select Committee should submit its report to the House. The Select Committee usually consists of ten to fifteen members and only such members are appointed who are willing to serve on it. The mover ascertains in advance from such members their willingness to serve on the Committee. The Speaker nominates one of the members of the Committee to be its Chairman. The Committee thoroughly examines the Bill and all its provisions, discusses it clause by clause, may ask for relevant papers and records, may hear expert evidence and representatives of special interests affected by the measure and suggest its own changes and modifications. The Chairman of the Committee, then, presents the Report to the Houses. He may make any remarks, but he has to confine himself to a brief statement of facts and there can be no debate on it. The Report and the Bill as amended by the Select Committee, are published in the Gazette.

After the Report has been presented, the member-in-charge of the Bill may move: (1) that the Bill is reported by the Select Committee be taken into consideration, or (2) that the Bill be re-committed either (a) without limitation or (b) with respect to particular clauses or amendments only, or (c) with instructions to the Select Committee to make some particular additional provision in the Bill. If the member-in-charge of the Bill moves that the Bill be taken into consideration, any member may move as an amendment that the Bill be re-committed. Then, follows the final stage and the third reading of the Bill when a motion is made that the Bill be passed. After such a motion has been made no amendment, except that which is formal, verbal or consequential to an amendment to the Bill, can be made. The discussion on a motion that the Bill be passed is confined to either in support or for the rejection of the Bill as a whole.

After the House has passed the Bill, it is transmitted to the other House, if there is one, where it undergoes the same process. When the Bill has been passed by the House or Houses it is submitted to the Governor for his assent and if it is assented to by him or by the President, when reserved for his consideration, it is published in the Government Gazette as an Act of the State Legislature.

Money Bills. A Money Bill or Financial Bill must originate in the Legislative Assembly. It cannot be introduced in the Legislative Council if the State has one. If any question arises whether a Bill is a Money Bill or not the decision of the Speaker of the Assembly thereon is final and the Speaker shall endorse a certificate on such a Bill that it is a Money

Bill when it is transmitted to the Legislative Council or to the Governor for assent. A Money Bill cannot be introduced or moved except on the recommendation of the Governor. After a Money Bill has been passed by the Assembly, it is transmitted to the Legislative Council, if the State Legislature is bicameral, for its recommendations. The Council is required, within fourteen days of its receipt, to return the Bill to the Legislative Assembly with its recommendations. The Assembly may accept or reject the recommendations so made. If the Assembly does not accept any of the recommendations, the Money Bill is deemed to have been passed by both Houses in the form in which it was originally passed by the Legislative Assembly. If the Legislative Council does not return the Bill with its recommendation within the prescribed period of fourteen days, it is deemed to have been passed, at the expiration of the said period, in the form in which it was passed by the Legislative Assembly.

FINANCIAL PROCEDURE

Financial Procedure. The principles underlying the financial procedure in the State Legislatures are the same as in the Union Parliament and they are in complete accord with the system of representative government and a sound system of public finance. The Government has, in the first place, the exclusive right to initiate financial legislation. Secondly, the Legislative Assembly has alone the power to make grants and to appropriate funds for different items of expenditure and to impose taxes and authorise borrowing by the Government. Finally, statutory authorization is necessary for all expenditure out of the Consolidated Fund and for all taxes imposed.

Annual Financial Statement. In every financial year the Governor shall cause to be laid before the State Legislature an Annual Financial Statement or Budget. The Annual Financial Statement must clearly show separately the expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund and other expenditure proposed to be made from the Consolidated Fund, and must also distinguish expenditure on revenue account from other expenditure. The following expenditure is charged on the Consolidated Fund:—

- (1) the emoluments and allowances of the Governor and other expenditure relating to his office;
- (2) the salaries and allowances of the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker of the Legislative Assembly, and of the Chairman and the Deputy Chairman of the Legislative Council in the case of States with bicameral Legislatures;
- (3) the interest, sinking fund charges and other debt charges of the States;
- (4) the salaries and allowances of the Judges of the High Court;
- (5) sums required to meet any judgment, decree or award of any Court or arbitral tribunal;
- (6) any other expenditure declared by the Constitution or by the State Legislature by law to be so charged.

It may be noted that the Constitution declares the following sums also to be expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund of the State:

- (a) the administrative expenses of a High Court including all salaries, allowances and pensions payable to the officers and servants of the Court [Article 229(3)];
- (b) sums necessary to meet the expenses of the State Public Service Commission, including any salaries, allowances and pensions payable to the members or staff of the Commission (Article 322).

The expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund of the State is not subject to the vote of the State Legislature. But the Legislature can discuss the estimates of the expenditure. The other expenditure is submitted in the form of demands for grants to the Legislative Assembly. The Assembly has the power to discuss, assent or refuse to assent to any demand, or reduce the amount of the demand. It cannot, however, either propose new grants or increase the amount of the demand. No demand for a grant can be made except on the recommendation of the Governor, that is, on the responsibility of the Ministry.

Stages in Financial Legislation. There are five stages in the passage of the Annual Financial Statement or the Budget. The first stage covers the presentation of the Annual Financial Statement by the Finance Minister to the State Legislature. The presentation of the Annual Financial Statement is accompanied by an explanatory speech. After a few days there is a general discussion on the proposals and members of the Legislature express their opinion on the policy of the Government. A fixed number of days, usually three or four, are allotted for this purpose, and it finishes the second stage. In the third stage voting of grants takes place. A separate demand is made for each department by the Minister-in-charge and it is here that the department comes under full scrutiny. A vote to reject or reduce the demand may be made by any member, but it is not within the competency of members to propose either new grants or an increase in the amount demanded. About twenty days are usually allotted for the voting of grants. On the last date and one hour before the adjournment of the sitting of the Assembly all demands which have not been disposed of till then are put to vote. No amendment or discussion is allowed on such demand. They must be accepted or rejected by the Assembly.

The next stage is the Annual Appropriation Bill which must be passed into a statute. After the grants have been made by the Assembly, a Bill is introduced to provide for the appropriation out of the Consolidated Fund of the State of all moneys required to meet (a) the grants so made by the Assembly, and (b) the expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund of the State. No amendment, which will have the effect of varying the amount or altering the destination of any grant so made, can be proposed in the Bill. The decision of the Presiding Officer whether an amendment is admissible or not is final.

The Appropriation Bill having passed through all stages is finally voted upon and if passed by the Assembly, it is certified by the Speaker as Money Bill and transmitted to the Legislative Council, if there is one in the State.

Another step in the completion of the Annual Financial Statement is the passage of the Finance Bill. A Bill which sets out the ways and means by which revenues necessary for meeting the expenditure of the State for the ensuing year are to be raised is called the Finance Bill. The Finance Bill is presented to the State Legislature at the same time as the Budget and the procedure followed is that of a Money Bill. The Bill must be passed before the end of April, but the financial proposals become operative immediately after the presentation of the Budget under the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act, 1931.

CHAPTER X

THE STATE JUDICIARY

✓ The High Court. The High Courts had been functioning in India for nearly ninety years when India became independent and these High Courts had an eminent record of independence and impartiality. But all the Provinces of pre-Independent India did not have High Courts. The Calcutta High Court exercised jurisdiction over Assam and the Patna High Court over Orissa. The United Provinces had two High Courts, the Allahabad High Court and the Chief Court with its Headquarters at Lucknow. Both these Courts exercised appellate jurisdiction. By July 1948, every Province had a High Court of its own. Separate Courts were established for Assam and Orissa and the Chief Court at Lucknow was amalgamated with the High Court at Allahabad.

Originally, the Constitution provided for a High Court in each Part A and Part B States. Parliament was also empowered to create a High Court in a Part C State, or give any Court in Part C State any of the powers of a High Court, or extend the jurisdiction of the High Court of a neighbouring Part A or Part B State to a Part C State. There were, as such, 18 High Courts, one for each Part A and Part B State, 7 Judicial Commissioner's Courts, one for each Part C State other than Coorg and Delhi. The reorganisation of the States reduced the number of the States which necessarily involved the abolition of the High Courts of Hyderabad, Madhya Bharat, Patiala and East Punjab States Union, and Saurashtra and the Courts of the Judicial Commissioners for Ajmer, Bhopal, Kutch and Vindhya. Now every State, except Punjab and Haryana which have a common High Court, has a High Court operating within its territorial jurisdiction. Among the Union Territories Delhi alone with its jurisdiction extended to Himachal has a High Court the rest have Judicial Commissioner's Courts.

The position of the High Courts in India materially differs from that of the State Courts in most other federations, notably that of the United States of America. In America the State Courts are constituted under the State Constitution and consequently they have no connections with the federal judicial system. The method of appointment of Judges, their service conditions and the jurisdiction of the State Courts differ from State to State. In India all High Courts are constituted under one Constitution with uniform jurisdiction and appointment and conditions of service of the Judges. The State Governments have no control over the High Courts. Nor can they alter the Constitution or organisation of the High Courts. That can be done only either by amending the Constitution or the law of Parliament.

A High Court consists of the Chief Justice and such other Judges as the President may from time to time deem it necessary to appoint. Originally, proviso to Article 216 empowered the President to appoint as many Judges as he might deem necessary from time to time, and also fixing from time to time the maximum strength of each High Court. The Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act omitted the proviso, as it was considered to be of little significance from the practical point of view since the order could be changed from time to time.

Appointment of Judges. The Constitutional Adviser suggested in his Memorandum of May 30, 1947, on the Provincial Constitution that the High Court Judges might be appointed by the Governors with the approval of two-thirds of the members of the Council of State.¹ The proposal to set up a Council of State was abandoned and the Provincial Constitution Committee, accordingly, recommended that Judges should be appointed by the President in consultation with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the Governor of the Province and the Chief Justice of the High Court of the Province, except when the Chief Justice himself was to be appointed. Explaining the proposal in the Constituent Assembly, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel said that the proposal was designed to ensure fair appointments to the High Courts so that the Judiciary should be above the suspicion of party influence.² The Constituent Assembly accepted the proposal.

The President appoints the Chief Justice of a High Court by warrant under his hand and seal after consultation with the Chief Justice of India and the Governor of a State. But in making the appointments of Puisne Judges, the President consults in addition the Chief Justice of the High Court to which they are being appointed. A Judge of a High Court must be a citizen of India and (a) must have held for, at least, ten years a judicial office in the territory of India, or (b) must have been for, at least, ten years an advocate of a High Court. The Constitution does not provide for the appointment of non-practising lawyers as Judges of a High Court. But a person is qualified for appointment as a Judge of the Supreme Court if he is, in the opinion of the President, a distinguished jurist.

The original Article 224 made provision for the attendance of retired Judges at sittings of the High Court, similar to the one in the case of the Supreme Court. But the Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act, 1956 conferred on the President the power of making appointments of temporary additional and acting Judges. Additional Judges may be appointed for a period not exceeding two years when it appears to the President that the increase in the business of the High Courts or by reason of arrears of work such appointments are necessary. A duly qualified person may be appointed by the President as an acting Judge when a permanent Judge is absent from the duties of his office or is acting as a Chief Justice.

Originally, Judges held office until they attained the age of sixty years. The Constitution (Fifteenth Amendment) Act, 1963, raises the age of retirement from 60 to 62 years. But a Judge may resign office or may be removed from his office by the President in the same manner as a Judge of the Supreme Court may be removed. Judges of the High Courts, accordingly, enjoy a security of tenure similar to that of the Judges of the Supreme Court. They can be removed only on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity by the President on an address of Parliament adopted separately by each House by a majority of its total membership as well as by a two-thirds majority of those present and voting.

The Constitution originally provided that a person who had retired as a Judge of a High Court could not plead or act in any Court or any authority within the territory of India. The Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act, 1956, partially modified the bar on retired High Court Judges. The amended Article 220 now permits a retired High Court Judge to practise before the Supreme Court and any High Court other than the one in which he was a permanent Judge. But the Law Commission has criticised this provision and recommends for its abolition.

Salaries, etc., of the Judges. The Chief Justice and Judges of High Courts get a salary of Rs. 4,000 and Rs. 3,500 per mensem respectively. The salaries of the High Court Judges cannot be varied and neither Parliament nor State Legislatures have any power in this matter. The President, however, is empowered to reduce the salaries of the Judges during the operation of the Proclamation of Emergency. Allowances and rights in respect of leave of absence and pension of the Judges are determined by an act of Parliament. Neither the allowances of a Judge nor his rights in respect of leave of absence or pension shall be varied to his disadvantage after his appointment.³ Salaries and allowances of the Judges have been charged on the Consolidated Fund of the State and hence are not votable. Their pensions are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India.⁴

The President may, after consultation with the Chief Justice of India, transfer a Judge from one High Court to another High Court. According to the original provisions of Article 222 Judges transferred by the President from one High Court to another were entitled to a compensatory allowance. This was considered to have no justification and the Constitution (Seventh Amendment) Act, 1956, amends Article 222 to that extent.

Independence of High Court Judges. The Constitution has made adequate provisions to ensure autonomy of the High Courts and the independence of the Judges in the performance of their duties. These may be summarised as below:

(1) The appointment of Judges of the High Court are made by the President and, accordingly, these are Union appointments and not State appointments made by the Governor. They are made in the case of the Chief Justice in consultation with the Chief Justice of India and in case of Puisne Judges also in consultation with the Chief Justice of the High Court concerned.

(2) Judges have security of tenure and their age of retirement is fixed by the Constitution. Removal before the age of retirement can take place on the grounds and in accordance with the procedure prescribed in the Constitution and it is similar to that of the Supreme Court Judges.

(3) A retired Judge of the High Court is prohibited from practising in Courts or before any authority in India except the Supreme Court, and other High Court of which he had not been a Judge.

(4) Salaries of the Judges are fixed by the Constitution. Their allowances and rights of leave and pension are determined by Parliament and these cannot be varied to their disadvantage after their appointment.

(5) The salaries of the Judges are charged upon the Consolidated Fund of the State whereas their pensions are charged upon the Consolidated Fund of India.

(6) The administrative expenses of the High Court are charged upon the Consolidated Fund of the State.

(7) Appointments of officers and servants of the High Court are made by the Chief Justice provided that the rules made by the Governor may require that in any specified cases no person, who is not already attached to the Court, shall be appointed save after consultation with the State Public Service Commission.

Jurisdiction of the High Court. The Constitution does not attempt detailed definitions or classification of the different types of jurisdiction of the High Courts. It was presumed that the High Courts which were functioning with well-defined jurisdictions at the time of the framing of the Constitution would continue with it and maintain their position as the highest Courts in the States. The Constitution, accordingly, provided that the High Courts would retain their existing jurisdiction subject to the provisions of the Constitution and any future law that was to be made by the Legislature. This was affirmed by the Supreme Court in National Sewing Thread Co., Ltd. vs. James Chadwick and Bros. Ltd. (1953).

Apart from the normal original and appellate jurisdiction, the Constitution also vests in the High Courts four additional powers: (1) the power to issue writs or orders for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights or for any other purpose; (2) the power of superintendence over subordinate Courts; (3) the power to transfer cases to itself pending in the subordinate Courts involving interpretation of the Constitution; and (4) the power to appoint officers and other servants of the High Court.

The High Courts are primarily Courts of appeals. Only in matters of admiralty, probate, matrimonial, contempt of court, enforcement of Fundamental Rights and cases ordered to be transferred from a lower Court involving the interpretation of the Constitution to its own file, they have original jurisdiction. The High Courts of Calcutta, Bombay and Madras exercise original civil jurisdictions when the amount involved is more than two thousand rupees. In criminal cases it extends to cases committed to them by Presidency Magistrates. On the appellate side they entertain appeals in civil and criminal cases from their subordinate Courts as well as from their original side. According to historical reasons and as a result of the specific provision in the Government of India Act, 1935, no High Court had any original jurisdiction in any matter concerning revenue.⁵ But the proviso to Article 225 of the Constitution of India now removes this restriction.

The jurisdiction as well as the laws administered by a High Court can be affected both by Parliament and the State Legislature. Parliament exercises exclusive power to make laws touching the jurisdiction, powers, and authority of all Courts with respect to subjects on which it is competent to legislate. It can also legislate on subjects enumerated in the Concurrent List. Similarly, a State Legislature has power to make laws touching the jurisdiction, powers and authority of all Courts within the State with respect to all subjects enumerated in the State List and in the Concurrent List. But with regard to matters in the Concurrent List the Union Law normally prevails in case of conflict.

Power of the High Courts to issue certain writs. Before the commencement of the Constitution in 1950 only the High Courts of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay had the power to issue certain prerogative writs within their original civil jurisdiction. Article 226 now empowers all the High Courts to issue prerogative writs and orders, directions and writs both for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights and for other purposes throughout the territories in relation to which they exercise jurisdiction. It will, thus, appear that in addition to the right of the Supreme Court to issue writs for the enforcement of Fundamental Rights,⁶ every High Court in India has been vested with the power to issue to any person or authority, including in appropriate cases any Government, within the territories of their respective jurisdictions, directions, orders or writs including writs in the nature of habeas corpus, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto and certiorari or any of them for the enforcement of the Fundamental Rights and for any other purpose.

Although the Supreme Court and the High Courts have concurrent jurisdiction in the matter of enforcement of Fundamental Rights, yet the Constitution does not give to High Courts the special responsibility of protecting Fundamental Rights as the Supreme Court has been given. Under Article 32, the Supreme Court is made the guarantor and protector of the Fundamental Rights whereas in the case of the High Courts, the power to enforce Fundamental Rights is part of their general jurisdiction. This special and unique position of the Supreme Court was emphasised by Mr. Justice Patanjali Sastri in Romesh Thapar v. The State of Madras. His Lordship observed, "That Article⁷ does not merely confer power on this Court, as Article 226 does on the High Courts to issue certain writs for the enforcement of the rights conferred by Part III, or for any other purpose, as part of its general jurisdiction. In that case it would have been more appropriately placed among Articles 131 to 139 which define that jurisdiction. Article 32 provides a 'guaranteed' remedy for the enforcement of those rights, and this remedial right is itself made a Fundamental Right by being included in Part III. This Court is thus constituted the protector and guarantor of Fundamental Rights and it cannot, consistently with the responsibility so laid upon it, refuse to entertain applications seeking protection against infringements of such rights."

Power of Superintendence. The High Courts have power of superintendence over all Courts or tribunals, except military tribunals within their respective jurisdictions and in the exercise of this power may call for returns, make and issue general rules and prescribe forms for regulating the practice and proceedings of such Courts.⁸ The Constitution, accordingly, vests in each High Court, as the highest court within its territorial jurisdiction, a special power and responsibility over all courts and tribunals, except military courts, so that the judicial institutions in the State function properly and discharge their duty according to law. The power of superintendence over inferior courts and tribunals conferred on the High Court is both judicial as well as administrative. The Constitution does not place any restrictions on the power of superintendence by High Courts. This point was made clear in Jodhey v. State. Mr. Justice Nasir Ullah Beg of the Allahabad High Court observed, "On a proper interpretation of this clause it is difficult to my mind to hold that the powers of superintendence are conferred only to administrative matters. There are no limits, fetters or restrictions placed on this power of superintendence in this clause and the purpose of this clause seems to be to make the High Court the custodian of all justice within the territorial limit of its jurisdiction and to arm it with a weapon that could be wielded for the purpose of seeing that justice is meted out fairly and properly by the bodies mentioned therein."

Transfer of certain cases to High Court. If the High Court is satisfied that a case pending in a Court subordinate to it involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution, it may transfer that case to itself. After that case has come to the file of the High Court, it may dispose of the whole case itself, or may determine the constitutional question involved and return the case to the subordinate Court with a copy of its judgment. The subordinate Court will, then, proceed to dispose of the case in conformity with the judgment of the High Court on the constitutional issue. The Constitution, thus, denies to a subordinate Court the right to interpret the Constitution so that there may be the maximum possible uniformity as regards constitutional decisions.⁹ It is, accordingly, the duty of the subordinate Courts to refer to the High Court a case which involves a substantial question of law as to the interpretation of the Constitution and the case cannot be disposed of without the determination of such question. The High Court may also transfer the case to itself upon the application of the party in the case.

Court of Record. The High Court is a Court of record and has all the powers of such a Court including the power to punish for contempt of itself. The two characteristics of a Court of record are that the records of such a Court are admitted to be of evidentiary value and that they cannot be questioned when produced before any Court, and that it has the power to punish for contempt of itself. Neither the Supreme Court nor the Legislature can deprive a High Court of its power of punishing a contempt for itself.

Appointment of Officers and Servants of the High Court. Article 226 empowers the Chief Justice of a High Court to appoint officers and servants of the Court for the efficient performance of its functions. The Governor may in this respect require the Court to consult the State Public Service Commission. The Chief Justice is also authorised to control the conditions of service of the High Court staff subject to any law made by the State Legislature in this respect. The administrative expenses of the High Court are charged on the Consolidated Fund of the State. In Pradyat Kumar vs. The Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court (1956), it was held that "a power of appointment includes the power to suspend or dismiss." The Chief Justice has, thus, the power to suspend or dismiss any officer or servant from the service of the High Court.

SUBORDINATE COURTS

Subordinate Judiciary. Before the transfer of power the subordinate judiciary, particularly on the criminal side, did not command the unflinching confidence of the people for its independence and impartiality. Both the Indian Statutory Commission and the Joint Select Committee on Indian Constitutional Reform dwelt on this aspect and had emphasised the paramount importance of an independent and fair-minded judiciary enjoying the confidence of the people. The Joint Select Committee laid special stress on the need for a competent subordinate judiciary and observed that it was the subordinate judiciary in India "who are brought most closely into contact with the people, and it is no less important, perhaps indeed even more important, that their independence should be placed beyond question than in the case of the superior judges."¹⁰

The Government of India Act, 1935 partially removed the existing defects on the civil side, but nothing tangible was done in the case of the magistracy on the criminal side. The District and Sessions Judges were appointed by the Governor, after consultation with the High Court, in his individual judgment.¹¹ Subordinate Civil Judges were recruited as a result of competitive examination and the Governor made rules, in consultation with the Public Service Commission and the High Court, defining the qualifications required. Their postings and promotions rested with the High Court. But in the case of District and subordinate Magistrates appointments were made by the Provincial Government under the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure and there was no obligation to consult the High Court. Nor was there any obligation to consult the High Court for their postings, transfers, promotions or in investing any of them with special criminal powers. The District Magistrate was as well the principal District Officer, and the Collector. Dr. Ambedkar correctly pointed out in the Constituent Assembly that the magistracy was intimately connected with the general system of administration.¹²

Originally neither the Draft Constitution prepared by the Constitutional Adviser in 1947, nor the one prepared by the Drafting Committee in 1948, contained any specific provision on the subordinate judiciary. The intention at that time was that services of all types should not be included in the Constitution but were to be regulated by Acts of the appropriate Legislatures. The Conference of the Federal Court and the Chief Justices of High Courts held in March 1948, prominently discussed the omission to provide specifically for the subordinate judiciary in the Constitution. The conference regarded it most essential that the members of the subordinate judiciary should not be exposed to the extraneous influence of the party in power. In a Memorandum incorporating comments and suggestions on the Draft Constitution, the Judges observed, "So long as the subordinate judiciary, including the District Judges, have to depend upon the provincial executive for their appointment, posting, promotion and leave, they cannot remain entirely free from the influence of members of the party in power and cannot be expected to act impartially and independently in the discharge of their duties. It is, therefore, recommended that provisions be made placing exclusively in the hands of the High Courts the power of appointment and dismissal, posting, promotion and grant of leave in respect of the entire subordinate judiciary including District Judges."¹³

The Drafting Committee accepted these suggestions. The Committee came to the conclusion that the time was appropriate for assimilating the civil and criminal justice and placing them equally under the control of the High Courts. The Drafting Committee, accordingly drafted new provisions and inserted a new Chapter VIII in Part VI of the Draft Constitution containing Article 209-A, 209-B and 209-C. These provisions regarding the subordinate judiciary came for discussion in the Constituent Assembly on September 16, 1949. In moving the new Articles Dr. Ambedkar made some changes. The promotion and posting of the District and Sessions Judges, which under the Draft Constitution were the functions of the High Courts, were now made the responsibility of the Governors in consultation with the High Courts. Whereas in the draft Articles, as first proposed, the High Courts were vested with full powers in regard to the posting and promotion of all members of the subordinate judiciary, the amended Articles confined this power of the High Courts to the subordinate civil judiciary alone. A new Article was added to provide that the procedure laid down for the civil judiciary would apply to the magistracy exercising criminal jurisdiction if the Governor by public notification so directed and that too subject to such exceptions and modifications as he might specify. In defending these changes Dr. Ambedkar observed, "The Drafting Committee would have been very happy if it was in a position to recommend to the House that immediately on the commencement of the Constitution, provisions with regard to the appointment and control of the civil judiciary by the High Court were also made applicable to the magistracy. But it has been realized that the magistracy is intimately connected with the general system of administration. We hope that the proposals which are now being entertained by some of the Provinces to separate the judiciary from the executive will be accepted by the other Provinces so that the provisions of Article 209-E would be made applicable to the Magistrates in the same way as we propose to make them applicable to the civil judiciary. But some time must be permitted to elapse for the effectuation of the proposals for the separation of the judiciary and the executive. It has been felt that the best thing is to leave this matter to the Governor to do by public notification as soon as the appropriate changes for the separation of the judiciary and the executive are carried through in any of the Provinces."¹⁴

The Constituent Assembly finally adopted the Articles proposed by Dr. Ambedkar and they became Articles 233 to 237 of the Constitution.

Criminal Courts. Every district in a State has both Civil and Criminal Courts. On the criminal side there is a great measure of uniformity throughout India as the Code of Criminal Procedure applies to all Courts. At the head of a district is the Sessions Court presided over by a Sessions Judge. A Judge of a Sessions Court, who sits either with a jury or with assessors, the opinion of the assessors being not binding on the Court, may pass any legal sentence, but a death sentence is subject to confirmation by the High Court. Below the Sessions Court there are Courts of Magistrates of the First, Second and Third Class. The jurisdiction of each class of Magistrate is limited to specified offences and a Magistrate of the first class may pass a sentence of imprisonment not exceeding two years or of a fine not exceeding a thousand rupees, a Magistrate of Second Class can give punishment up to six months and a fine of two hundred rupees and a Magistrate of the Third Class to one month and fifty rupees. In some States Village Panchayats have been vested with jurisdiction to try petty criminal cases, e.g., cases involving minor injury, trespass or removal of cattle, etc. The Panchayats can impose fine not exceeding a hundred rupees but they cannot pass any sentence of imprisonment. The decisions of the Panchayats are non-appealable.

The Sessions Judge and the District Magistrate both superintend the Courts of Magistrates subordinate to them and the superintendence here is also both judicial and administrative. Appeals from the Magistrates of the Second and Third Class lie to the District Magistrate whereas appeals from other Courts or Magistrates lie to the Court of Sessions. Appeals from the Court of Sessions lie with the High Court. All sentences are appealable except sentences of imprisonment not exceeding one month passed by a Sessions Court, or a sentence of fifty rupees (or two hundred rupees if the case is tried summarily by a Magistrate) passed by a Sessions Court, District Magistrate or a Magistrate of the First Class. Appeals against acquittal are also permitted, but are not common.

An aggrieved party in a criminal case has also the right to move the District Magistrate, the Sessions Court or the High Court in revision. The powers of the District Magistrate and the Sessions Court are limited in revision cases. They may, however, recommend interference by the High Court, if there is miscarriage of justice.

Criminal Courts are required to send, through the superintending Courts, periodical statements of cases disposed of to the High Court. From these statements the superintending Courts make notes and comments and return them to the subordinate Courts for their explanations or guidance. Records of the lower Courts may also be called by the superintending Court for examination and in case of any procedural flaw and non-compliance with the regulations or instructions, they are forwarded to the High Court with recommendations for interference in revision.

Civil Courts. Throughout India, excepting the 'Presidency Towns' the District Civil Court is presided over by a District Judge who is also the Sessions Judge. The Court of the District Judge is the principal Civil Court in the district and exercises both administrative and judicial powers. It exercises both original and appellate jurisdiction in civil cases and has wide powers under special Acts such as the Succession Act, the Guardian and Wards Act, the Provincial Insolvency Act, and the Divorce Act. The District Court has powers of superintendence over subordinate Courts exercising civil jurisdiction in a district.

Next to the District Court is the Court of a Civil Judge or a Senior Subordinate Judge. The Court of a Civil Judge or a Senior Subordinate Judge has jurisdiction over cases of any amount. In the States where there are Courts of Civil Judges they have no appellate jurisdiction whereas the Courts of Senior Subordinate Judges exercise appellate powers in minor cases. Below them are the Courts of Subordinate Judges or Munsiffs as they are named in Bihar, Orissa, Uttar Pradesh and Assam. Subordinate Judges or the Munsiffs may be of the First or Second Class with varying jurisdiction. Appeals from the Subordinate Civil Courts lie, in the first instance, to the District Court if the amount involved does not exceed five thousand rupees. If it exceeds five thousand rupees, appeals lie to the High Court. Rights of second appeal differ in different States, but there is a right of second appeal on a point of law, or on account of a substantial defect in procedure, or when the Court of first appeal differs on a question of fact from the Court of first instance.

Small Causes Courts have been established in big towns for the expeditious disposal of cases not involving difficult questions of law and where the amount involved does not exceed two thousand rupees, or one thousand rupees, or five hundred rupees as the State Government may determine. Small Causes Courts follow summary procedure, and the judgments are not ordinarily appealable though errors in law may be rectified in revision.

In some States Village Panchayats have been invested with power to try minor civil cases involving movable property. The decisions of the Panchayats are not appealable.

Appointment of District Judges and other Judges. The Constitution divides judicial posts into two categories.¹⁵ The higher category includes District and Sessions Judges, Judges of the City Civil Courts, Assistant District and Sessions Judge, Chief Judges of Small Causes Courts, and Chief Presidency Magistrates. The second or the lower category includes other civil judicial posts inferior to the post of a District Judge. Appointments to posts in the higher category are made by the Governor of the State in consultation with the High Court exercising jurisdiction in relation to such State.¹⁶ No person, other than already in the service of the Union or of the State, is eligible for appointment in this category unless he is an advocate or a pleader of seven years' standing and is duly recommended by the High Court for appointment.¹⁷

15. Article 236.

All appointments in the lower category, i.e., other judicial posts inferior to the posts of a District and Sessions Judge, Judge of the City Civil Court, Assistant District and Sessions Judge, Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court and Chief Presidency Magistrate, are made by the Governor of a State in consultation with the Public Service Commission and the High Court exercising jurisdiction in relation to such State.¹⁸ The practice that exists in most States is that the Public Service Commission conducts competitive examination for recruitment to the judicial service of the State. The Commission prescribes certain minimum educational and professional qualifications for candidates competing for this examination. The required vacancies are filled up from amongst the list of successful candidates in order of merit. The selected candidates are given special training for a certain period before regular appointment to the service. Thereafter they come under the superintendence of the High Court in the discharge of their responsibilities.

Control over Subordinate Courts. The control over District Courts and Courts subordinate thereto has been vested in the High Court. Article 235 provides that "the control over District Courts and Courts subordinate thereto including the posting and promotion of, and the grant of leave to, persons belonging to the judicial service of a State and holding any post inferior to the post of the District Judge shall be vested in the High Court...." The control by the High Court, accordingly, includes the control over the posting, promotion, and the grant of leave to persons belonging to the judicial service and holding posts inferior to that of a District Judge. All subordinate Courts, in brief, are placed under the administrative control of the High Court. Postings and promotions of District Judges are made by the Governor in consultation with the High Court.

Separation of the Executive from the Judiciary. The Constitution also contemplates the separation of the executive from the judiciary. At present, the administrative control over the District Magistrates and the subordinate Magistrates vests in the State Government and in the matter of their postings, promotions, and other matters the High Court has no jurisdiction. Article 237 provides for the transfer of the administrative control over subordinate criminal Courts to the High Court. The Constitution says, "The Governor may by public notification direct that the foregoing provisions of this chapter (regarding the subordinate Civil Courts) and any rules made thereunder shall with effect from date as may be fixed by him in that behalf apply in relation to any class or classes of Magistrates in the State as they apply in relation to persons appointed to the judicial service of the State subject to such exceptions and modifications as may be specified in the notifications."

17. Article 233 (2).

18. Article 234.

Article 50 on the Directive Principles of State Policy requires the State to "take steps to separate the judiciary from the executive in the public services of the State." The separation of the Judiciary from the Executive is an essential requirement for the maintenance of the liberties of the people and as Montesquieu put it, "there is no liberty, if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers." Under the old order in India the evils of the executive and judicial functions being combined in one person at the district level were in full glare. There was neither independence nor impartiality consistent with the high traditions of the judiciary. The public opinion was, accordingly, very critical of the anomaly prevailing in India and agitated for the separation of the judiciary from the executive.

The case for the separation of the Judiciary from the Executive was cogently put by Mr. Justice Meredith of the Patna High Court. His Lordship observed, "First of all, what is meant by the separation of these functions, and what does it involve? It means the establishment of the principle that the Judge who tries a case must be completely impartial, uninterested in the success of either side, and independent of outside influence.... The general principle involves two consequences, first that a Judge or Magistrate who tries a case must not be in any manner connected with the prosecution or interested in the prosecution. Second, that he must not be in direct administrative subordination to any one connected with the prosecution (or indeed the defence). Both these aspects of the matter are equally important and both these reveal defects in our present system, whereunder the Magistrate who tries a case, or hears a criminal appeal, is frequently himself a Sub-divisional Officer or District Magistrate connected with the police and the prosecution, and interested in its success, as by reason of the executive side of his duties he is responsible for the maintenance of law and order, and whereunder the Magistrate trying a case is also under the direct administrative control of the executive authorities, the Sub-divisional Officer, the District Magistrate, the Commissioner, and the executive officers of the Government, who are highly interested in the success of Crown cases.

"Quite clearly it is impossible for a Judge to take wholly impartial view of the case he is trying if he feels himself to any extent interested in or responsible for the success of one side or the other. That is the first aspect. Quite clearly, it is equally impossible for him to take an impartial view of the case before him if he knows that his posting, promotion and prospects generally depend on his pleasing the executive head of the district, the District Magistrate, who is also the head of the local police, who has frequent confidential conferences with them and generally controls the work of the Police Superintendent. Thus, the separation of functions means and involves the elimination of these two evils. That these are evils few will question."

This is a lengthy quotation from the opinion of Mr. Justice Meredith, but it is highly important for the proper appreciation of the fundamental principle of universal application, the separation of the Judiciary from the Executive. In spite of the embodiment of this principle in the Constitution itself as a Directive Principle of State Policy, there is a tendency in some quarters to think and argue that the separation of the Judiciary from the Executive has lost its importance now when India has become independent and responsible governments function in all the States. It is true that the Constitution guarantees the independence of the Higher Bench, but much is left to be desired in the case of the subordinate magisterial Courts. Concentration of powers has always corrupted those who exercise it no matter whether the country is independent and democratic or under the foreign rule, though under the latter the evils following from the combination of judicial and executive functions are bound to be greater. Lord Hewart, in his The New Despotism, says, "The public official is not independent. . . . One would have thought it perfectly obvious that no one employed in an administrative capacity ought to be entrusted with judicial duties in matters connected with his administrative duties. The respective duties are incompatible. It is difficult to expect 'in such circumstances that he should perform the judicial duties impartially. Although he acts in good faith and does his best to come to a right decision, he cannot help bringing what may be called an official or departmental mind, which is a very different thing from a judicial mind, as everybody who has had any dealings with public officials knows, to bear on the matter he has to decide. More than that, it is his duty, as an official, to obey any instructions given him by his superiors, and in the absence of special instructions to further what he knows to be the policy of his department. His position makes it probable that he should be subject to political influences."

Some of the States in India have actually separated the judiciary from the executive. A few others are experimenting with it and have appointed judicial Magistrates in a few selected districts. But it is submitted that merely changing the nomenclature to judicial Magistrates does not bring about the desired change contemplated in the Constitution. Separation of the Judiciary from the Executive can only become an accomplished fact and a matter of reality when High Courts are given full administrative control over the appointments, postings, promotions, and other matters relating to the Magistrates. It is only then, that the influence of the executive can be eliminated. Hamilton has rightly maintained that "it is peculiarly dangerous to place the judges in a situation to be either corrupted or influenced by the Executive."

CHAPTER XI

SERVICES UNDER THE UNION AND THE STATES

How the Government operates? Government, whether Union or State, operates through its Secretariat. The Secretariat, both at the Centre and in a State, is divided into Ministries or Departments among whom various subjects of governmental activity are distributed according to administrative convenience. Each Department is presided over by a Minister. In most of the Departments there is at least one Deputy Minister, who is also a member of the Council of Ministers. But a Deputy Minister does not hold a separate charge of the Department. His task is to assist the Minister with whom he is associated in his administrative and parliamentary duties and may be compared to a Parliamentary Secretary in Britain; a "Junior Minister."

Besides the political heads of various Departments of Government there are a number of permanent officials and a clerical staff. At the head of each Department is the permanent official Secretary, a member of the Indian Civil Service or Indian Administrative Service, who occupies a position of the very highest responsibility and importance. In fact, the Secretary is the key man in the Department who helps his political chief to see that the Department works efficiently and in a particular direction. The Secretaries have in most cases been so long attached to their respective Departments that they acquire complete grasp of affairs within their own spheres and provide "a permanent brain trust" to the Ministers who are amateurs in the art of administration. Then, there are in the Department, possibly a Joint Secretary, a Deputy Secretary, an Under Secretary, Assistant Secretaries, Superintendents and many others who do merely secretariat work of a purely routine character. Highest and lowest, these non-political agents of administration make up, in general, the Civil Service. Their tenure of office is permanent and they continue to function regardless of political changes. They are outside the domain of politics and this is the most important feature of the Civil Service. Lord Balfour has given a true picture of the position which Civil Servants occupy in Britain and it is similarly applicable to the Civil Service in India. The Civil Servants, wrote Lord Balfour, "do not control policy: they are not responsible for it. Belonging to no party, they are for that very reason an invaluable element in Party Government. It is through them, especially through their higher branches, that the transference of responsibility from one party or one minister to another involves no destructive shock to the administrative machine. There may be change of directions, but the curve is smooth." The Civil Servants, in brief, keep the wheels of governmental machine going and act as agents for the fulfilment of the policy of the Party in office, the policy formulated during the elections and formally endorsed by Parliament. They are a link between successive ministries, and repository of principles and practices which endure while governments come and go. Their rigid neutrality and rigorous impartiality in the party political issues is the first code of their official conduct and they serve with equal fidelity whatever be the complexion of Government. All Civil Servants owe a temporary allegiance to the party in power and its programme, no matter what their bias or personal conviction. "The first thing," observes Viscount Attlee, "a Minister finds on entering office is that he can depend absolutely on the loyalty of his staff and, on leaving office, he will seldom be able to say what the private political views are even of those with whom he has worked most closely."²

Functions of the Departments. The functions of the Departments may broadly be said to be four. First, a Department must answer for its administration to the public. Administration does not operate in a vacuum. Since it translates policy into practice, the policy, which has received the approval of the people and endorsement of the Legislature, must be capable of explaining itself. It means the accountability of administration to both the Legislature and the public. As this accountability is to be effected through those who are responsible for administration, the Department must provide to their political chief all relevant information so that he may be able to defend the actions of his Department in the Legislature and on the public platform. The work of the Department must, therefore, be conducted in such a way and its policy so framed that it should be capable of "articulate rational defence."

The second function of the Department is the drawing up of its policy. Policy, really, is formulated by the Cabinet. But all details with the working out of policy so formulated and all routine business connected therewith are left to various Departments of the Government. Very often the Department may itself suggest proposals within the framework of the policy of the Government. Such proposals may either be the outcome of the Department's own administrative experience or may be the result of the directions given to it by its political chief. Whatever be its origin, the Department prepares the draft of the scheme, works out its details in accord with the general policy of the Cabinet and consults the interests likely to be affected by it. If the scheme of the policy cannot be carried out within the framework of the existing law, then, it passes into the stage of proposals for a Bill. After its approval by the Cabinet, it is drafted as a Bill to be laid before the Legislature at the Centre or in the States as the case may be. The Bill is sponsored and piloted by the Minister-in-charge of the Department to which it relates and it is his responsibility to see it through. But the members of the Civil Service have to remain in attendance in the Legislature to assist the Minister with information and advice whenever he is under fire in the House. It will, thus, be clear that even if the inspiration of the Bill may have come from the Minister, the preparatory work is the task of the Department and in great part the result of the influence exerted by the permanent Secretary. "The second thing a Minister will discover on entering office", writes Attlee "is that the Civil Servant is prepared to put up every possible objection to his policy, not from a desire to thwart him, but because it is his duty to see that the Minister understands all the difficulties and dangers of the course which he wishes to adopt."

Most modern statutes are "skeleton legislation." Legislatures legislate in general terms only empowering the Departments to work out the detailed regulations necessary to give effect to the statutes. The rules and regulations so made have the force of law. The Department will, probably, concurrently with its preparation of the Bill work out regulations and subordinate acts of legislation and shortly after the Bill becomes law will issue them in the form drafted by the Law Department. In the application of the rules and regulations of specific cases, the Executive often assumes a quasi-judicial role. Innumerable kinds of judicial or quasi-judicial functions arise in the course of administration of public services, particularly which affect the individual welfare of large sections of the community. In fact, the switching over of the functions of the State from negative to positive has necessitated Legislatures to act along two lines especially. In the first place, Legislatures delegate certain broad rule-making authority to the administration, and, secondly, authority is conferred upon administration in certain cases to adjudicate controversies. Decisions of these kinds are not truly judicial as they do not determine legal rights. They are, however, an extremely important means by which administrators make policy and shape the nation's future within the framework of powers agreed to by Parliament.

Finally, the function of the Department is to implement policy. When the policy has been determined, presented and sanctioned, it becomes the duty of the permanent officials of the Department to see that it is faithfully carried out, even if the policy is not what they might have urged. Sir Warren Fisher has cogently explained the principles on which Civil Servants in Britain act. It will be instructive to quote them here. Fisher says, "Determination of policy is the function of Ministers, and once a policy is determined it is the unquestioned and unquestionable business of the civil servant to strive to carry out that policy with precisely the same goodwill whether he agrees with it or not. That is axiomatic and will never be in dispute. At the same time, it is the traditional duty of civil servants, while decisions are being formulated, to make available to their political chiefs all the information and experience at their disposal, and to do this without fear or favour, irrespective of whether the advice thus tendered may accord or not with the Minister's initial view. The presentation to the Minister of the relevant facts, the ascertainment and marshalling of which may often call into play the whole organisation of the Department, demands of the civil servant greatest care. The presentation of inferences from the facts equally demands from him all wisdom and detachment he can command." There is little evidence in England of Civil Servants sabotaging the policy of the responsible political head of their Department.

R.K. Ramadhyani, writing on the Role of Civil Servants,⁵ says, "The Civil Servant has thus the dual role of being the executive for the policy of a party and of being its interpreter; he is also in a good measure a maker of policy on its behalf. It is mainly in executing the policy of the party that conflict may arise; it can only be secondary in making new or subsidiary policy. A Civil Servant, exercising his democratic right of vote, may have even cast his vote against the party which has come into power. He is now called upon to implement the policy of the party and very clearly he is in duty bound to do so, as he is not a ruler by himself but a public servant. It is his duty, therefore, to try to understand the policy of the party which has the mandate of the people and to implement it in the most faithful way. If he did not do so he would not be true to the democratic form of government which requires that for the time being the rule of the majority has to be accepted by the minority."

Organisation of the Civil Service. The guiding principles of Civil Service organisation are very simple and obvious. They are three: a unified service, recruitment by open competition, and classification of posts into intellectual for policy, and clerical for mechanical work to be filled separately by separate examinations. The division of Civil Servants into these two categories is essential for the proper performance and co-ordination of functions and for making policy responsive and responsible. In the clerical category may be placed all such work as either is of a simple mechanical kind or consists in the application of well-defined regulations, decisions and practices to particular cases. In the other category—intellectual for policy—may be placed all such work which is concerned with the formulation of policy, the revision of existing practices of current regulations and directions, and the organisation and direction of the business of government.

The administrative class is the pivotal and directing class of the whole Civil Service. "They are responsible," as Dr. Finer says with reference to the British administrative class, "for transmitting the impulse from their political chief, from the statutes and declarations of policy, through the rest of the service and out to the public."⁶ On this class rests, in India as in Britain, the responsibilities for formulating Departmental policy and for controlling and directing the various Departments. They are a body of advisers who find solutions that arise outside the normal routine of Departmental work, supply suggestions which may form the ingredients of supreme policy, and interpret regulations applying to difficult cases. The Directive Principles of State Policy enshrined in the Constitution, the realization of the objective of a Welfare State on a socialistic pattern, and the prodigious effort involved in the proper execution of Five-Year Plans have created new responsibilities and onerous tasks for the whole administration and particularly for the administrative class. Their duties have become all-comprehensive and embrace planning, control and guidance of the entire economic as well as social life of the nation. "When it becomes the central purpose and justification of government," wrote Sukthankar, the then Cabinet Secretary, "while adhering to democratic values and methods to find a rich social and economic content for freedom, to bring about equality of opportunity for all and to secure the maximum development of the human and material resources of a vast country, the administration faces new and immensely vital tasks."⁷ These new and immensely vital tasks "require the proper development of new arts of what may be called social and economic engineering."⁸

For the efficient performance of these heavy and arduous duties the administrative officers must necessarily possess a trained mental equipment of a high order capable of ready mastery of complex and intricate problems. They must also possess the virtue of human sympathy. Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru reminded his audience consisting of civil servants at Kurnool, on December 9, 1955 the exact purpose of the Services. "The Services", he explained, "as their name implies are supposed to serve, obviously. Serve who?—society, the people, the country. Why I say this, because, the test, always, has to be how far the Services, whether as a whole or any individual member of them are serving the larger causes that society has, that the nation has."⁹ The qualities exactly wanted in public servants must, therefore, be: initiative and enterprise, planning and organising capacity, efficiency, honesty, loyalty, political neutrality, width of social outlook, and spirit of social service.

The British Civil Service is world famous for its political neutrality, impartiality and integrity. "The characteristic which has long been recognised in the British administrator," says the Report of the Committee on the Political Activities of the Civil Servants, "and extolled as a special virtue is his impartiality and, in his public capacity, a mind untinged by political prepossession." But this traditional concept of political neutrality is undergoing, as S. Lall rightly observed, "radical change under the impact of many factors some of which are common to all nations and others special to under-developed countries like India. The concept is being rapidly transformed, without a conscious realization, from a negative doctrine of political sterilization and neutrality to a positive, non-partisan participation in the management of country's affairs."¹⁰ The process of decision is no longer exclusively confined to the Ministers. The process of decision-making is diffused over the entire system of government. The Ministers may ultimately mould and shape the policies, but all such policies are being constantly readjusted "in a seamless web of a multiplicity of agencies. The decision making process has recently become very complex and dispersed as a result of the enormous increase in the scale and scope of governmental activities (particularly in matters of welfare and State enterprise), the pressure thrown up by the democratic processes involved in the establishment of an egalitarian society and the increasing complexity of modern society. The higher echelons of the Civil Services today not only advise and assist the Ministers in the formulation of policy; they indirectly influence decision." The dichotomy of the governmental process into politics and administration, i.e., 'decision' and 'execution' no longer exists.

Classification of Service. In countries with a federal polity, it is usual for the Central Government and the Governments of the constituent units to have separate organised services for the administration of subjects falling within their respective spheres of jurisdiction. In India, too, there are two sets of services, Central Services and State Services. The Central Services are concerned with the administration of Union subjects, such as, Foreign Affairs, Defence, Income Tax, Customs, Posts and Telegraphs, etc., and the officers of these services are exclusively in the employ of the Union Government. The subjects within the jurisdiction of the States such as Land Revenue, Agriculture, Forests, Education, Health, Veterinary, etc., are administered by the State Services and the officers of these services are exclusively in the employ of their State Governments. In addition to these two classes of Services, the Constitution also provides for the All-India Services, a form of personnel organisation which has no parallel in any other federal country, except in Pakistan. The All-India Services are common to the Union and the States and are composed of officers "who are in the exclusive employ of neither and may at any time be at the disposal of either." The Constitution names two such Services, the Indian Administrative Service and the Indian Police Service.¹¹ It is further provided that other All-India Services may also be created by Parliament, if the Rajya Sabha declares by resolution supported by not less than two-thirds of the members present and voting that it is necessary or expedient in the national interest to do so.¹² A resolution was adopted by the Rajya Sabha on December 6, 1961, to the effect that it was necessary and expedient in the national interest that Parliament should by law provide for the creation of Indian Service of Engineers, the Indian Forests Service and the Indian Medical and Health Services. Indian Economic Service was subsequently added.

Dr. Ambedkar explained in the Constituent Assembly the reasons for making this extraordinary provision for the creation of All-India Services, particularly the Indian Administrative Service. He said, "The dual polity which is inherent in a federal system is followed in all Federations by a dual service. In all Federations there is a Federal Civil Service and a State Civil Service. The Indian Federation, though a dual polity, will have a dual service, but with one exception. It is recognised that in every country there are certain posts in its administrative set-up which might be called strategic from the point of view of maintaining the standard of administration.... There can be no doubt that the standard of administration depends upon the calibre of the Civil Servants who are appointed to these strategic posts.... The Constitution provides that without depriving the States of their right to form their own civil services there shall be an

All-India Service recruited on all-India basis with common qualifications with uniform scale of pay and members of which alone could be appointed to these strategic posts throughout the Union." The members of the Indian Administrative Service, therefore, man administration both at the Centre as well as in the States. Referring to three All India Services—Engineering, Medical and Forest, the Home Minister, Lal Bahadur Shastri, said at Tirupathi on September 25, 1962, that these Services were being constituted to bring about homogeneity and unity in administration. This was one of the recommendations, Shastri added, of the States Reorganisation Commission.¹³

The Indian Administrative Service. The control and management of the Indian Administrative Service, as S.B. Bapat says, "is necessarily a joint co-operative affair."¹⁴ The Service is organised in the form of a number of I.A.S. cadres for each State. Recruitment to the Service is made by the Union Government on the results of a competitive examination conducted by the Union Public Service Commission. The officers thus recruited are allotted to the different State cadres. The strength of each cadre is so fixed as to include a reserve of officers who can be deputed for service under the Union Government for one or more "tenures" of three, four or five years before they return to their State cadre. This arrangement is claimed to have the advantage of having at the disposal of the Union Government the services of officers with first-hand knowledge and experience of conditions in the States. And the States have officers, after their return to the State cadre, who are fully familiar with the policies and programmes of the Union Government.

There is yet another distinctive feature of the Indian Administrative Service. It is a multi-purpose Service composed of "generalist administrators" who are expected, from time to time, to hold posts involving a wide variety of duties and functions. At one time they may be responsible for the maintenance of law and order, at another time for the collection of revenue, regulation of trade, commerce or industry, and still at another they may be engaged in the welfare activities like education, health, labour and development and extension work in agriculture and reconstruction. Thus, the administrators get a general training, in more or less every branch of administration. There are two definite advantages of such a system of service. According to the arguments of Macaulay and Jowett, it is a better qualification for intellectual work than a special training, and that success in such a kind of training is likely to indicate desirable qualities of character. Secondly, it accounts for the liberal outlook of the administrators.

The method of recruitment to the Indian Administrative Service combines a written examination of a high standard. The written examination includes compulsory papers and a number of optional papers selected from a group so made as to compel the candidate to go outside the range of subjects which he may have studied at the University. The written examination is followed by a searching personality test. Candidates have to obtain a certain minimum percentage of marks in the aggregate of compulsory and lower optional papers before they can be called for interview. For a period it was the rule that a candidate could be failed on personality test alone, but the interview mark is now simply added to those of written papers. This method of recruitment, says S.B. Bapat, ensures, "that the youngmen recruited to service possess not only a high level of intelligence and academic learning but also an adequate measure of the qualities of personality and character, such as, discernment, clarity of thought and expression, intellectual integrity, self-confidence, self-possession, breadth of outlook and sense of moral and social values—qualities which must be looked for in persons holding responsible administrative positions in any democratic welfare State."¹⁵

What administration really needs today is leadership. "Leadership in administration," writes K.N. Butani, "translated into practical realities, implies that leaders must have 'spring' and vitality in them to be able to top the immense potentialities of human endeavour for creative activity. By dash, enthusiasm, and zest for work, they should be able to infect the entire team they command with a pioneering spirit of endeavour and towards feats of administrative achievement."¹⁶ It, therefore, makes it imperative that men of special merit who exhibit attributes of leadership by their decisiveness and dash at interviews should be recruited in the administrative service. Mere possession of academic qualifications and to pass the written examination is not enough and hence the futility of interviews, which has now become topical for discussion, is untenable.

Recruitment and Conditions of Service. "The method of responsible Government to be successful in political working," observed the Joint Select Committee on Indian Constitutional Reform, 1933-34, "requires the existence of a competent and independent Civil Service staffed by persons capable of giving to successive Ministers advice based on long administrative experience, secure in the positions, during good behaviour, but required to carry out the policy upon which the Government and Legislatures eventually decide."¹⁷ So long as politicians can influence in any vulgar sense appointments and promotions, there is, as Dr. Jennings aptly says, "a risk of toadying, flattery and self-seeking" and the mind of the Minister will always be devoted to the need of rewarding his followers. The whole administration must, under the circumstances, deteriorate both in tone and efficiency and the services may be depleted of able, efficient, honest and experienced persons. The method of selection to the various posts in the public services and their conditions of service are, therefore, matters of supreme importance in order to secure a continuous inflow of competent men of the right type.

The Drafting Committee thought it advisable that detailed provisions relating to the services should be regulated by Acts of the appropriate Legislatures rather than by Constitutional provisions.¹⁸ The Constituent Assembly accepted this recommendation of the Drafting Committee and the Constitution lays down certain general provisions leaving the detailed rules of recruitment and conditions of service of persons serving the Union and the States to be determined by the appropriate Legislatures.¹⁹

The Constitution provides that except where a different provision is made, as in the case of the Judges of the Supreme Court and of the High Courts, the tenure of office of all persons holding Government posts under the Union, including posts connected with defence services, is during the pleasure of the President, and any person who is a member of the Civil Service of a State or holds any post under a State holds office during the pleasure of the Governor.²⁰ Dismissal or removal of a Civil Servant cannot be effected by an authority subordinate to that by which he was appointed. And no dismissal, removal, or reduction in rank of a Civil Servant can take place until he has been given a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken against him. But this requirement is not necessary:

- (i) where dismissal or reduction in rank takes place as a result of the conviction of a public servant on a criminal charge;
- (ii) where an authority empowered to dismiss or remove a person or reduce him in rank is satisfied that for some reason, to be recorded by the authority in writing, it is not reasonably practicable to give that person an opportunity of stating his case;
- (iii) where the President or the Governor, as the case may be, is satisfied that in the interest of the security of the State it is not expedient to give such an opportunity to that person.²¹

If any question arises whether it is reasonably practicable to give to any person an opportunity of showing such cause, the decision thereon of the authority empowered to dismiss or remove such person or to reduce him in rank, as the case may be, shall be final.²² No Court shall be entitled to call in question such decision.

The Constitution guarantees to persons who have been appointed by the Secretary of State to a Civil Service in India the same conditions of service as respects remuneration, leave and pension, and the same rights as respects disciplinary matters as that person was entitled to before the commencement of the Constitution.

give it that position of stability and security which is vital to its successful working as the impartial and efficient instrument by which governments, of whatever political complexion, may give effect to their policies."²³ Public Service Commissions are fundamental to the very conception of a democratic government, for they perform a very important and vital function in a democracy. Their primary objective is to establish a Civil Service free from personal and political influences and to secure to civil servants protection from victimization and injustice. They provide effective instruments by which governments professing different political faiths and pursuing different ideologies can give effect, through an efficient and impartial Civil Service, to their programmes and policies. Independence, impartiality and integrity, therefore, constitute the essential characteristic features of a true and efficient Public Service Commission.

Origin and development in India. The Government of India Act, 1919, provided for the establishment of a Public Service Commission in India. But no action was taken thereupon. The Royal Commission on Superior Civil Services (Lee Commission), 1924, gave particular attention to this matter and recommended that the statutory Public Service Commission envisaged in the Government of India Act, 1919, "should be established without delay."²⁴ It was only in October 1926 that a Public Service Commission was established at the Centre. In 1929, Madras established its own Public Service Commission. The Punjab Legislative Council enacted legislation for the establishment of a Commission, but it could not come into existence due to scarcity of finances.

The Indian Statutory (Simon) Commission recommended the establishment of Public Service Commissions in all the Provinces. "We have no doubt", the Commission observed, "of the necessity for the establishment of provincial Public Service Commissions if an efficient and loyal public service is to be maintained."²⁵ They thought that the protection of the services from political influences was an essential condition of the constitutional advances they recommended. It was, accordingly, suggested that provision should be made in the Government of India Act that, if any Provincial Legislative Council did not pass within a prescribed time an act for the establishment of a Public Service Commission, with a Constitution and functions approved by the Secretary of State in Council, the Provincial Government "shall be required (1) to conduct its recruitment through the agency of the Central Public Service Commission; (2) to submit appeals from members of the provincial and subordinate services to the same body; and (3) to accept and apply the same conventions in regard to the Commission's recommendations as are accepted by the Government of India."²⁶ The Government of India Act, 1935, accordingly, provided that "there shall be a Public Service Commission for the Federation and a Public Service Commission for each Province." Provision was also made whereby the same Public Service Commission could serve the needs of two or more Provinces jointly.

The Constituent Assembly had, thus, before it the Government of India Act, 1935 outlining the composition and functions of the Public Service Commissions together with fairly well-established traditions relating to their working. The Union Constitution Committee and the Provincial Constitution Committee did not find it necessary to go into details and recommended that the provisions regarding the Public Service Commissions should be on the lines of those in the Government of India Act, 1935. But there was one important difference in the recommendations of these Committees. Whereas the Union Constitution Committee had recommended that the appointment of the Chairman and members of the Federal Commission should be made by the President on the advice of his Ministers, the Provincial Constitution Committee had suggested that Provincial Commissions should be appointed by the Governors acting in their discretion. But in presenting the Report of the Committee to the Constituent Assembly on July 15, 1947, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel said that the appointment of the Chairman and members of the Provincial Public Service Commissions would generally be made by the Governor on the advice of his Cabinet or Ministry.²⁷

In pursuance of the Reports of the Union Constitution Committee and the Provincial Constitution Committee the Constitutional Adviser in his Draft of October 1947, included provisions for Public Service Commissions which closely followed the Government of India Act, 1935. The Drafting Committee in its Draft of February 1948, adopted the Constitutional Adviser's Draft. In May 1948, a conference of the Chairmen of all the Provincial Public Service Commissions and the Chairman and members of the Federal Public Service Commission was held and some suggestions were made for incorporation in the Constitution.²⁸ The more important of these suggestions were:

- (1) Provision should be made in the Constitution that the procedure prescribed for the removal from office of Judges of the Supreme Court and High Courts and the Comptroller and Auditor-General should be followed also in the case of the members of the Public Service Commissions.
- (2) Following the Government of India Act, 1935, the Draft had provided that not less than one-half of the number of members of a Public Service Commission should be persons who had held public office for at least ten years. The conference suggested that in order to provide for the representation of all the interests involved, this percentage should be reduced to one-third.
- (3) Provision should be made that the conditions of service of a member of a Public Service Commission should not be varied to his disadvantage during his tenure of office.
- (4) The Chairmen of Public Service Commissions, like the members, be eligible to hold office after retirement with the permission of the President or Governor as the case might be. The conference thought that while all restrictions on the future employment of Chairmen and members of the Commission should not be abrogated, the services of such experienced men should, if necessary, be available to the Government.

(5) Before the President or the Governors made regulations excluding any matter from the purview of the Public Service Commissions, the appropriate Commission itself should be consulted.

(6) While it could not be made obligatory on the government to accept the advice of a Commission in all cases, provision should be made for reports of the Public Service Commissions to be compiled annually and laid before the appropriate Legislature, and in particular for a list of cases to be placed before the Legislature where the advice of the Commission was not accepted.

These suggestions were cast in the form of draft amendments and the Drafting Committee considered them together with the views of the Ministry of Home Affairs and the Law Ministry. The amendments proposed by the Drafting Committee were considered by the Constituent Assembly on August 22 and 23, 1949. In the course of revision Articles relating to the Public Service Commissions were renumbered 315 to 323.

Public Service Commissions under the Constitution. The Constitution of India provides for a Public Service Commission for the Union and a Public Service Commission for each State. But if the Legislatures of two or more States authorize it by resolution, Parliament may establish a Joint Commission for those States. The Union Public Service Commission may perform the functions of a State Public Service Commission at the request of the Head of the State, and with the consent of the President.²⁹ All States, except Nagaland, have Public Service Commissions of their own. The Union Territories are served either by the Union Public Service Commission or by the Public Service Commission of the adjoining State.

Appointment and Terms of Office of Members. The members of the Union Public Service Commission, and of any Joint Commission are appointed by the President and the members of a State Public Service Commission by the Head of the State. One-half of the members of a Commission, Union or State, must have held office for at least ten years either under the Government of India or under the Government of a State. A member holds office for six years or until he attains, in the case of the Union Commission the age of sixty-five years and in the case of a State Commission the age of sixty years, whichever is earlier. A member of a Public Service Commission is, on the expiration of his term of office, not eligible for re-appointment to that office.³⁰ The Chairman of the Union Commission is ineligible for further appointment either under the Government of India or under the Government of a State. But a member of the Union Commission is eligible for appointment as the Chairman of the Union Commission or as the Chairman of a State Commission. The Chairman of a State Commission is eligible for appointment as the Chairman or as a member of the Union Commission or as the Chairman of any other State Commission. A member of the State Commission is eligible for appointment as the Chairman or as a member of the Union Commission or as the Chairman of that or any other State Commission. None of them, however, is eligible for any other employment either under the Union Government or under the Government of a State.³¹

The number of the members constituting the Union Public Service Commission and the conditions of their service, or of a Joint Commission, are determined by the President and in the case of State Commissions by the Governor by regulations.³² It has since been decided that there shall be six to eight members of the Union Commission and usually three for the State Commissions. The conditions of service of a member of a Public Service Commission cannot be varied to his disadvantage after his appointment.³³ The Chairman of the Union Public Service Commission receives a salary of Rs. 4,000 a month and its members Rs. 3,500. In the case of the State Public Service Commissions the salaries vary from State to State. The entire expenses of the Commission, including the salaries and allowances of its members, are charged on the Consolidated Fund of India and in the case of a State Public Service Commission on the Consolidated Fund of the State.

Removal and Suspension of a Member. A member of the Union Public Service Commission can be removed from office by an order of the President on the ground of misbehaviour.³⁴ The Constitution prescribes a procedure to prove misbehaviour. The ground of misbehaviour is referred to the Supreme Court by the President. The Supreme Court then conducts the enquiry, as prescribed under Article 145 of the Constitution and submits a report to the President. Pending enquiry by the Supreme Court, the President in the case of a member of the Union Public Service Commission and the Governor in the case of a member of the State or Joint Public Service Commission may suspend the person concerned.³⁵ The President may remove by order a member also on the following grounds:

- (a) if he is adjudged an insolvent; or
- (b) if he engages during his term of office in any paid employment outside the duties of his office; or
- (c) if he is, in the opinion of the President, unfit to continue in office by reason of infirmity of mind or body;³⁶ or
- (d) if he becomes in any way concerned or interested in any contract or agreement made by or on behalf of the Government of India or a State Government or in any way participates in its profits or in any benefit or emolument arising therefrom except as an ordinary member of an incorporated company.³⁷

31. Article 319. Employment under Government has been interpreted to mean employment which is paid for by the Government. The Universities and Public Corporations are independent legal entities with their own independent financial resources. Accordingly, employment under such bodies is not employment under Government. Some States have appointed retired persons as members of the Public Service Commissions or who had resigned therefrom or have retired or resigned from the statutory bodies. In the case of universities an interchange between Vice-Chancellorship and membership of a Commission has now become almost a regular feature.

There was no provision in the Government of India Act, 1935 for the removal and suspension of the members of the Public Service Commissions. All such matters were governed by rules framed by the Governor-General and the Governors acting in their discretion.³⁸ Article 317 of the Constitution empowers the President alone to remove the members of the Public Service Commission. He does so by his order, without any formality, when a member is adjudged an insolvent, or he engages himself in any other employment or he is deemed unfit to continue in office owing to infirmity of mind. But removal on grounds of misbehaviour involves observance of certain procedure as provided in the Constitution. Constitution also provides an instance of misbehaviour.³⁹

Functions of the Public Service Commissions. The Constitution prescribes following functions of the Public Service Commission.⁴⁰

- (1) The Union and the State Public Service Commissions shall conduct examinations for appointment to the Union and State services respectively.
- (2) To assist the States in framing and operating schemes of joint recruitment for any services for which candidates possessing special qualifications are required if two or more States make such a request to the Union Public Service Commission.
- (3) To give advice:
 - (a) on any matter referred to them relating to methods and recruitment to civil service and for civil posts;
 - (b) on the principles to be followed in making appointments, and in making promotions and transfers from one service to another;
 - (c) on disciplinary matters including petitions on such matters;
 - (d) on the claim made by any person that the costs of defending legal proceedings against him in respect of acts done or purporting to be done in the execution of his duty should be borne by the Government;
 - (e) on any claim for the award of a pension in respect of injuries sustained by a person while serving under the Government in a civil capacity and any question as to the amount of any such award.⁴¹
- (4) Any other functions as respects services conferred by Parliament in the case of the Union Commission and by the State Legislature in the case of State Commission.

Thus, normally, a Public Service Commission must be consulted in all matters relating to methods of recruitment, on the methods to be followed in making appointments, promotions and transfers, on the suitability of applicants, on disciplinary matters affecting any person in a civil capacity, on claims submitted by civil servants for payment of costs incurred in defending legal proceedings and for compensation of injuries sustained while in the execution of their duties and for the award of pensions. But the Constitution also empowers the President and the Governors to make regulations specifying the matters in which, either generally or in particular circumstances, the Commission may not be consulted.⁴² No reference need be made to the Public Service Commission on matters relating to the reservation of appointments or posts in favour of backward classes, Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes.⁴³

In 1961 an amendment was made which provided, "It shall not be necessary for the President to consult the Commission in any case where he proposes to make an order of dismissal, removal or reduction in rank after being satisfied that such action is necessary in the interest of the security of the State." In 1962 following the Proclamation of Emergency similar amendments were made curtailing the advisory functions of the Commission. All regulations made by the President or the Governor specifying the matters in which it is not necessary to consult the Commission are to be laid before the appropriate Legislature and are subject to legislative control and modification.⁴⁴

Under Article 321 of the Constitution, the functions of the Union or State Public Service Commission may be extended by an Act of Parliament or by the appropriate State Legislature as the case may be. Such an Act may bring within the scope of the functions of the Commission matters connected with the services of public institutions, such as, public corporations and local bodies, under the Union or State Government. The need for bringing such institutions within the purview of the Public Service Commission is undeniable in view of the greater emphasis on the utility of public corporations and such other institutions in the context of the increasing activities of a welfare State. These institutions employ an ever-increasing number of officials.

Guarantees to Secure Independence of the Commissions. The Constitution contains following guarantees to secure independence of the Commissions in the discharge of their duties:

(1) The Public Service Commissions in India are constitutionally created and are in no way subordinate either to the Executive or the Legislature. Parliament can neither abolish them nor alter their powers and functions, except by following the process of constitutional amendments, which is a difficult and cumbersome procedure.

(2) The term of office of a member is fixed by the Constitution and one is not eligible for re-appointment to that office on the expiration of his term. •

42. Proviso to Article 320.

43. Article 320 (4). Also refer to Articles 16 (4) and 335.

44. Article 320 (5).

(3) Removal or suspension of a member can only take place in accordance with the procedure and for reasons prescribed in the Constitution.

(4) The conditions of the service of a member cannot be varied to his disadvantage after his appointment. The salaries, and allowances of the members and staffs of the Commissions as well as expenditure incurred on their upkeep are charged on the Consolidated Fund. The Commissions are, accordingly, not subject to the vote of Parliament or State Legislature, and, consequently, not subject to the vagaries of fluctuating public opinion.

(5) In order to avoid the suspicion that promise or prospects of further employment under the Government might operate or be used to influence the judgment of the members of the Commission, the Chairman and members on ceasing to hold office become ineligible for further employment under Government except:

- (i) that the Chairman of a State Commission is eligible for appointment as Chairman or member of the Union Commission or as Chairman of any other State Commission;
- (ii) that a member of the State Commission is eligible for appointment as Chairman or member of the Union Commission, or as Chairman of that or any other State Commission;
- (iii) that a member of the Union Commission is eligible for appointment as Chairman of the Union Commission or Chairman of a State Commission.

(6) In order to ensure the reasoned judgment, their independence and impartiality, the makers of the Constitution had intended that only men of mature age and long experience should be elevated to the Public Service Commissions. The age of retirement has been, accordingly, fixed at sixty years for the members of the State Commissions and sixty-five for members of the Union Public Service Commission.

All these constitutional provisions have not fulfilled the expectations of the makers of the Constitution. In actual practice appointments to the Commissions, particularly in the States, have often been made on political considerations thereby lowering their prestige in the eyes of the public. In fact, due advantage has been taken of the absence of qualifications and mode of selection of the members of the Commissions by certain State Governments, with the result that appointment to the Public Service Commissions is deemed by many political aspirants as reward of their party services. At the Union level, except for Shivashunmugam Pillai, who was a former Speaker of the Madras Legislative Assembly,⁴⁵ no politician has been appointed on the Commission. In the States, it is just the reverse. The Law Commission had made pointed reference to the shocking state of affairs prevailing in the States. The Commission said, "Having regard to the important part played by the Public Service Commission in the selection of the subordinate judiciary, we took care to examine as far as possible the Chairmen and some of the members of the Public Service Commissions in the various states. We are constrained to state that the personnel of these Public Service Commissions in some of the States was not such as could inspire confidence, from the points of view of either efficiency or impartiality. There appears to be little doubt that in some of the States appointments to these Commissions are made not on considerations of merit but on grounds of party and political affiliations. The evidence given by members of the Public Service Commissions in some of the States does create the feeling that they do not deserve to be in responsible posts they occupy. In some of the southern States the impartiality of the Commissions in making selections to the judicial service was seriously questioned."⁴⁶ An ex-Chairman of the Madhya Pradesh Public Service Commission had said, "The constitutional independence given to the Commission is largely vitiated by vesting the appointment of members in the hands of the Governor, i.e., the Chief Minister in actual practice. The Chief Minister often appoints persons on political, communal, regional and other grounds, and not solely on merit, and human being what it is, such persons usually find it difficult to resist ministerial pressure and influence in carrying out their duties in an independent and impartial manner. . . ."⁴⁷

But what happened in Bombay (now Maharashtra) shall perhaps remain unprecedented in the history of Public Service Commissions in India. A Deputy Minister in the Bombay Government was appointed a member of the Commission from the quota reserved for civil servants. "Although the appointment," says B.A.V. Sharma, "seems to fulfil the legal niceties it was clearly against the spirit of the Constitution. There cannot be a worse example of a party government ruthlessly seeking to promote its interests and that of a party member in total disregard of constitutional propriety."⁴⁸

Public Service Commission an Advisory Body. Although the Constitution provides that the Union and State Public Service Commissions shall conduct examinations for appointment to the services of the Union and the services of the States respectively and normally they shall be consulted in all matters relating to methods of recruitment, yet the status of the Public Service Commissions is advisory. The use of the words "shall be consulted" in Article 320(3) are significant of the meaning. The Public Service Commission merely gives its opinion to the President or the Governor, as the case may be, with regard to the suitability of the candidate for the post under consideration and it is not obligatory upon the latter to accept that opinion or recommendation. Sometimes the Government directs the Public Service Commission to recommend more names than the available posts and makes selection of its own out of the panel of names so recommended without adhering to the priority recommended by the Commission. The Constitution, however, provides that it is the duty of the Union Commission and the State Commissions to present annually to the President or the Governor, as the case may be, a report as to the work done by the Commission. Immediately after the receipt of such a report the President or the Governor is required to lay before each House of Parliament or the State Legislature, as the case may be, together with a memorandum of the cases where the advice of the Commission was not accepted and the reasons for such non-acceptance.⁴⁹

It would, thus, appear that the framers of the Constitution have made specific provision that the Legislatures of the Union and the States are the ultimate judges of Governments' actions. "This provision simultaneously ensures that consultation with the Commission is not overlooked, that the advice of the Commission is as a rule accepted, and that the Governments are free in cases where they consider the matter of sufficient importance to follow their own judgment provided they are prepared to justify their action before the Legislature."⁵⁰ The Union Government have had to consult the Union Commission every year on about sixty thousand cases and the number of cases in which the Commission's advice is not accepted is really negligible. But in the States it is otherwise. The reports of the State Public Service Commissions provide sufficient material to authenticate that inadequate respect is paid by the Governments to the recommendations of the Commissions. Even more grave are certain unpublished allegations of interference, direct and indirect, by authority and pressures to influence decisions.

CHAPTER XII

POLITICAL PARTIES

Political Parties and Democracy. Political parties are the very life-blood of democracy. Without them democracy degenerates into totalitarianism, for, MacIver says, "There can be no unified statement of principle, no orderly evolution of policy, no regular resort to the constitutional device of parliamentary elections, nor of course any of the recognised institutions by means of which a party seeks to gain or to maintain power."¹ Those who deplore the existence and influence of political parties do not really understand the working of the machinery of democracy. Lowell has aptly said that "the conception of Government by the whole people in any large nation is, of course, a chimera; for wherever the suffrage is wide, parties are certain to exist and the control must really be in the hands of the party that comprises a majority or a rough approximation to a majority of the people." Without party organisation there may be factions and cabals, people appealing and petitioning to government for the redress of personal and sectional grievances. A political party seeks to do more than influence or support the government; it seeks to make it and to maintain it. Its primary business is to influence the electorate, to win election, and form the government in order to pursue its programme. A political party is an organised unit which enables men and women, who think alike, to pursue a definite programme and pursue it vigorously. It, therefore, brings order out of chaos by putting before a multitude of voters its programme and securing their approval on vital issues of policy. It plans and contests elections and endeavours to win. For winning elections it is necessary that a political party should have the sanction of a majority of voters. It needs educating the electorate and moulding public opinion. Every political party does it through its press, platform and other vehicles of propaganda at its disposal.

Democracy, thus, needs political parties for two reasons. First, they are the means by which citizens get an opportunity to choose their rulers. Secondly, political parties explain and educate the citizens in the merits and dangers of alternate policies. They present their programmes and submit the representatives of those programmes to the choice of the electorate. This provides an opportunity to the electorate to determine for themselves the kind of government they wish to have. Political parties, in brief, "make articulate the inarticulate desires of the masses." They act, in the words of Lowell, as the broker of ideas. They gather up the whole nation into fellowships and bring to the individual citizen, as Dr. Finer says, "a vision of the whole nation, otherwise distant in history, territory and futurity."

1. The Modern State, p. 396.

Party System an Extra-legal Growth. The party system is an extra-legal growth in every democratic country. It exists outside the legal framework of the State and yet it has become everywhere as indispensable as law itself. The Constitution of the United States does not presume the existence of political parties. The makers of the Constitution shared the common opinion that the influence of political parties was highly detrimental to national solidarity. Planning as the "Fathers" were for the United States as a whole, they sought to provide a mechanism of government which would be free from all "violence of the faction," and parties, they were convinced, encouraged strife, division, chicanery and personal manipulation. But within a few years of the career of the Union party divisions and party spirit were sufficiently evident. In the Presidential election of 1796, there were two national parties, one supporting John Adams and the other supporting Thomas Jefferson. By 1800 the party system had settled itself quite firmly in the government, even to the extent of necessitating the addition of the Twelfth Amendment so as to make the Electoral College method workable. Since then, it has become the central feature of the American system. "But for the appearance of a national party system," as Professor Brogan realistically points out, "the election of a President really enough of a national figure to carry out his duties, might have been impossible. And it is certain that the greatest breakdown of the American constitutional system, the Civil War, came only when the party system collapsed."²

Her Majesty's Government in Britain is a party government and the Prime Minister is the leader of the majority party in the House of Commons. The party in Opposition is Her Majesty's Opposition and it is recognised as a vital and necessary element in the working of the British Constitution. The functions of the Opposition are to criticise and vote against the policy of the Government, the party in office, with a view to overthrowing it and taking its place. In fact, the party in power, in a Parliamentary system of Government, tolerates and encourages the existence of Opposition "because opposition is necessary to the health of its own existence." Both the majority party and the Opposition accept the principle of "live and let live" in the knowledge that the system of Parliamentary Government allows to each in turn and in time its fair share of power. Jennings has, therefore, aptly said that a "realistic survey of the British Constitution today must begin and end with parties and discuss them at length in the middle."³ Yet, political parties in Britain are not organs of the State specifically regulated by its laws. The law does not even mention them. Their only nearest approach to official recognition is in the rules for the formation of Committees in the House of Commons, and the Ministers of the Crown Act, which provides for an annual salary to the Leader of the Opposition for his services in that capacity.

Two Party vs. Multiple Party System. The British Constitution has grown and evolved under the two-party system and in all those countries that have borrowed Parliamentary Government from Britain, it implies, strictly speaking, the existence of two parties only. The essence of party government, as practised in Britain and the Dominions, is that the party

2. Brogan, D.W., An Introduction to American Politics, p. 45.

3. The British Constitution, p. 31.

enjoying majority in the Lower Chamber forms the Government and its leader becomes the Prime Minister. All Ministers are taken from one single party and this political homogeneity makes them a well-organised and a responsible team of administrators who play the game of politics with singleness of purpose under the captaincy of their accredited leader. They rise and fall in unison and are individually and collectively responsible for the policy which the Cabinet initiates and they carry out. If the Lower House does not endorse the policy of the Government and vote for lack of confidence in it, one of the two things may happen then. Either the Opposition party assumes office, if it can command a majority in the Lower House, or, more commonly, the Prime Minister may ask for dissolution of the Legislature when a general election takes place and verdict of the electorate is obtained. The party returned in majority in the Lower House forms the Government.

But in most countries of the Continental Europe there are multiple parties sometimes numbering from 17 to 20, as in France. The multiple party system is really intriguing. Where there are numerous parties it is a misnomer to call them "parties." They are, as a matter of fact, political groups. When there are a number of groups, there can be no well-defined single majority able to form a stable government. Majority can be obtained only by combination of groups and they are a collection of strange bed-fellows with nothing in common either by way of loyalty or allegiance. They are the product of bargaining and compromise. And a Ministry, which is the result of compromise between heterogeneous groups, is sure to break down at the slightest pretext. There is no common party leader who can bind them together. Every Minister is a prospective Prime Minister. Cabinets formed by this method are, therefore, notoriously weak and unstable. Mr. Briand remarked on one occasion that the day on which a French Prime Minister takes office is the day upon which one at least of his colleagues begins to prepare his downfall.⁴

Whatever be the merits of the multiple-party system and however it may reflect more accurately the way in which the popular mind is actually divided, it is impracticable as an operative ideal. The essential need in administration is the absence of uncertainty. The government must be able to plan its way continuously to an ordered scheme of policy. This involves a stable majority. "A legislature, otherwise, is so much master of the executive that the latter is unable to attempt great measures, and the time which should be spent upon them is devoted to manoeuvring for positions which are lost almost as soon as they are occupied."⁵ Two parties, thus, as Dr. Finer concludes, "are better for the happiness and duty of nations than many parties, and two parties contesting seats everywhere. For then lies and error may be in all places challenged, while destruction of will and disintegration of outlook are reduced."⁶

Growth of Political Parties in India. Political parties, according to Professor Laski, "are predominantly organisations which seek to determine the economic Constitution of the State." Viewed as such there was no political party in India in the pre-Independence stage which sought to determine the economic constitution of the State, although there existed three important parties—the Indian National Congress founded in 1885, the All-India Muslim League, established in 1906, and the All-India Hindu Mahasabha founded in 1916. The Indian National Congress was composed of diverse elements and its main aim was to secure India's freedom from the alien rule. The Congress was, in fact, as Professor Avasthi observes, "not a party but a nation on the march to win independence." Being the spearhead of the national movement, it was natural and inevitable for this national organisation to bring together and consolidate all possible forces under the banner of nationalism for the achievement of India's freedom. It had among its members and supporters landlords and tenants, capitalists and labourers, doctors and bankers and men belonging to professional classes irrespective of race, religion or creed and large sections of the depressed classes also. Such a heterogeneous organisation could not lay down and pursue a definite and distinctive social and economic programme as it would have involved "a war on two fronts, a war against imperialism and an internal war against vested interests within the country itself and no sane general would adopt such a strategy."⁸ To be with the Congress, was patriotic and to oppose it was 'toadyism'. There were in the words of Jawaharlal Nehru only two parties in India, one which struggled for freedom and the other which supported British imperialism. Even when the Congress functioned as a political party, "it never diverted its attention or energies from the goal of national freedom" and it claimed to represent all the various classes and Committees in the country.⁹

The Muslim League, on the other hand, was a communal party and it did not deserve the nomenclature of a political party. Its membership was open to Muslims only and it was founded in 1906 with the object of: (1) infusing the sense of loyalty in the heart of Indian Mussalmans for British Government and removing any misunderstanding that might creep in the community regarding any measure of the Government, and (2) safeguarding the political rights and interests of the Mussalmans through respectful representation.¹⁰ Some factors,¹¹ however, brought about a significant change in the outlook of the Muslim League and in 1913, its Constitution was amended and the attainment of a system of self-government suitable to India was adopted as its ideal and the promotion of national unity as the chief method of its attainment. The Lucknow Pact of 1916 was really the triumph of the nationalist Muslims. In its 1916 session the League demanded self-determination for India and in 1920, it supported the Congress programme of Civil Disobedience. Then, came the split in the League in 1927, when two different sessions were held, one in Lahore under the Presidentship of Mian Mohammad Shafi, and the other in Calcutta under the Presidentship of Mohammad Yakub. The

11. The main factors responsible for change in the outlook of the Muslim League were: the attitude of the European powers towards Turkey, the Nationalist movements in Turkey and Persia, the rendition of the Partition of Bengal in 1911, etc.

Mian group had supported co-operation with the Indian Statutory Commission whereas the second led by M.A. Jinnah had declared for its boycott. The Nehru Report in 1928, however, helped to narrow down the differences though dissensions continued till 1934 when the Muslim League was reorganised.

The All-Parties Muslim Conference held at Delhi, under the Presidentship of H.H. the Aga Khan, while rejecting the Nehru Report, passed a resolution aiming to secure for the Muslims all the advantages which the community could procure "under the existing law." This was a clear departure from the previous policy of the Muslim League, though apparently it still supported the ideals of nationalism and democracy. In the following years there was a visible reversal in the League's policy and programme and in his presidential address at the Lucknow session in October 1937, Jinnah said, "the Muslim League stands for full democratic self-government of India" and added that "the present leadership of the Congress, specially during the last ten years, has been responsible for alienating the Mussalmans of India more and more by pursuing a policy which is exclusively Hindu, and since they have formed governments in six provinces where they are in majority, they have by their words, deeds and programmes shown that the Mussalmans cannot expect any justice or fairplay at their hands. On the very threshold of what little power and responsibility is given, the majority community have clearly shown their hand that Hindustan is for the Hindus." The immediate cause of change in the Muslim League policy and programme was the failure of the Congress-League negotiations for the formation of coalition Ministries in the Congress majority Provinces and the subsequent formation of Congress Ministries therein. It, thus, "suddenly dawned upon the League," as Gurmukh Nihal Singh observed, "with the force of revelation that the Muslims were doomed to perpetual opposition and permanent denial of a share in power in the Congress majority Provinces and at the Centre where they are in a minority."¹²

The outcome of the Muslim League's hostility to the Indian National Congress was the two-nation theory for which Jinnah and other Muslim leaders carried on an intensive and astute propaganda. When the Congress Ministries resigned, as a protest against India being dragged into the war in 1939 without her consent, the Muslim League celebrated their exit by observing a 'Deliverance Day.' This action of the Muslim League shattered all hopes of a Congress-League reconciliation. Then came the Pakistan Resolution passed at the Lahore session of the Muslim League in March 1940. At the next session at Madras in 1941, the Constitution of the Muslim League was amended incorporating the goal of Pakistan as its creed. The success of the Muslim League in rallying the Muslims under its banner with its new goal was really remarkable and Pakistan came into being in 1947.

As counterblast to the Muslim League, the Hindu Mahasabha came into existence with the avowed object of protecting the rights of the Hindus. Originally, it was a cultural organisation, but the communal policy and programme of the Muslim League dragged it into the political arena and took a militant attitude against the Muslim League. Its objects were to revive military glories of the Hindus with a view to securing the attainment of Purna Swaraj and to establish Hindu Rashtra. It rejected the Congress policy of non-violence. Savarkar, as President of the Hindu Mahasabha, while explaining in 1933 the aims of the organisation, declared that his Party stood for "the maintenance, protection and promotion of the Hindu race, Hindu culture and Hindu civilisation and the advancement of the glory of the Hindu Rashtra and with a view to securing them, the attainment of Purna Swaraj, i.e., absolute political independence for Hindustan by legitimate means."

Like the Muslim League and the Hindu Mahasabha there were various other communal parties as those of the Anglo-Indians, the Indian Christians, the Sikhs, and the depressed classes, each wedded to the promotion of the interests of its community without caring for the real welfare of India as a whole. All these parties grew in an abnormal atmosphere and were reactionary in their outlook and programmes. Their activities, in fact, retarded the progress of national forces and the British Government encouraged them both openly and secretly.

The secularisation of politics began with the establishment of a secular State after the Independence. The Constitution abolished communal representation and communal electorates. It also introduced adult suffrage which gave to both men and women, without any qualification, equal right to vote. It was, accordingly, natural for the political parties to assume their real role. Old parties disintegrated and new ones, mostly non-communal in composition, came into existence. A good many of them were all-India organisations.

ORGANISATION AND PLATFORM OF ALL-INDIA PARTIES

The Indian National Congress. The Indian National Congress is the ruling Party at the Centre since the Independence of the country. It reigned supreme in all the States, except for a short spell in Kerala, till the General Elections in 1967. But even now the Indian National Congress is the best organised and the most powerful political Party, though dissensions within the Party have now plagued its existence. The Congress owes its origin to A.O. Hume, a retired Secretary to the Government of India. The object of Hume in organising the Congress was to propagate for social reforms in the country, but the Marquis of Dufferin, the then Viceroy of India, suggested that the new organisation should assume the role of a political party. "He desired that there should be a national body which would perform in India the functions which Her Majesty's Opposition performed in England. As the newspapers were not reliable, he considered it very desirable in the interest of the rulers as well as of the ruled that Indian politician should meet yearly and point out to the Government in what respects the administration was defective and how it could be improved."¹³ During the first twenty years of its career the Congress would meet annually and pass resolutions drawing the attention of the Government to public grievances and would request for various political reforms. "It followed," as Dr. Chandrasekharan observed, 13. As cited in C.V. Chandrasekharan's Political Parties, p. 56.

"strictly constitutional methods, but from the beginning the ideal was there, implied if not expressed."¹⁴ This is supported by the statement contained in the Manifesto issued by the leaders in March 1885: "Indirectly this conference will form the germ of a native Parliament and, if properly conducted, will constitute in a few years an unanswerable reply to the assertion that India is wholly unfit for any reforms of representative institution."

In the first decade of the present century Lord Curzon's policy, particularly the Partition of Bengal, had produced a deep resentment in the country which gave birth to the Swadeshi movement. The Congress became the spearhead of the national movement and since then it strengthened its organisation and intensified its activities to awaken the masses against the evils of the alien rule and win for India her freedom. The Congress, thus, became a national movement, an organisation and a platform, and it remained so till August, 15, 1947, when India became Independent. But with the coming of Independence the political scene was completely changed. The Congress had become the successor to the British authority in India. There was at that time much "heart-searching and stock-taking" in the Congress ranks as to whether the Congress should continue to function when its mission had been fulfilled. Gandhi himself felt that the Congress should dissolve and turn itself into Lok Sewak Sangh because he did not want the child of his toils and the symbol of national unity to become the plaything of politics and, thus, be reduced to the mere position of a party manoeuvring for power. The majority in the Congress, however, as Professor Avasthi says, "declined to commit political 'harakiri' and decided to stand forth as a political party in the usual sense of the term."¹⁵ With this decision disintegration was witnessed in the Congress. The Socialists, who formed the left wing, separated and formed a new party under the leadership of Jaiprakash Narayan. The late Sarat Chandra Bose formed another party, the Socialist Republican. A few more members of the Congress Party in the Central Legislature formed the Social Democratic Party under the leadership of Professor K.T. Shah.

When the Congress assumed the role of a political party, it was inevitable that there should be a change in its policy and methods. The message of the Congress at the time of the Jaipur session said, "political freedom having been attained through non-violent action under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi, the Congress has now to labour for the attainment of social and economic freedom." The new Constitution of the Congress, which was adopted in April 1948, defined the Congress objective as "the well-being and advancement of the people of India and the establishment in India by peaceful and legitimate means of a co-operative commonwealth based on equality of opportunities and of political, economic and social rights and aiming at world peace and fellowship." The objective of a classless and democratic society found expression in the resolution on the socialistic pattern of society adopted at the Avadi session of the Indian National Congress. The resolution on socialistic pattern of society said, "In order to realise the object of the changes as laid down in Article 1 of the Constitution and to further the object stated in the Preamble and Directive Principles of State Policy of the Constitution of India, planning should take place with a view to the establishment of a socialistic pattern of society where the principal means of production are under social ownership of control, production is progressively speeded up and there is equitable distribution of the national wealth." According to Professor Shriman Narayan, the then General Secretary of the Indian National Congress, there are seven basic principles underlying a socialistic society:¹⁶

- (1) Full employment and the right to work.
- (2) Maximum production of the national wealth. The economic life of the country should be organised in such a manner that there is an increase in the total production of consumer goods leading to a higher standard of living. Development of small-scale, village and cottage industries, which would be necessary for ensuring full employment, are as essential in this context as large-scale production.
- (3) Attainment of maximum national self-sufficiency.
- (4) Social and economic justice. This involves abolition of untouchability, raising the status of women, rooting out the evils of drink and prostitution, narrowing down the gaping gulf between the rich and the poor, and the abolition of economic inequalities both in the rural and urban areas.
- (5) The use of peaceful, non-violent and democratic methods to achieve the objective of a socialistic society.
- (6) Decentralisation of economic and political power through the establishment of village panchayats and industrial co-operatives.
- (7) Highest priority to the immediate needs and requirements of those who are the poorest and lowliest sections of the population.

These seven principles could be summarised as Sarvodaya and are claimed to be in conformity with the teachings of M.K. Gandhi. "We have, however, not tried to use this great noble word," says Professor Shriman Narayan, "lest it may be regarded as a kind of political exploitation of a high ideal. But India is definitely committed to the ideal of Sarvodaya in accordance with the teaching of Mahatma Gandhi."¹⁷ The Congress, as such, was not wedded to any particular 'ism'. Jawaharlal Nehru, while moving the resolution on the economic policy in the open session of the Indian National Congress at Amritsar, 1956,¹⁸ declared that India was placing before the world "a new way" for achieving her industrial revolution which was different both from the Anglo-American and Russian methods. "We have finally decided," added Nehru, "to go towards the goal of socialism and build a socialist structure rapidly through peaceful means." While explaining "a new way" which India had adopted for achieving her industrial evolution, Nehru said that the method followed by Britain, America, France and Germany was one of achieving an industrial revolution in 100 or 150 years. "These countries had all these years," he added, "followed the method at leisure. The Russian method was different. It achieved its industrial revolution in the course of 20 to 30 years. But in doing that it had to use a lot of compulsion and the government that did it was authoritarian and the people of the Soviet Union had to pay a heavy price for it." But these methods Nehru rejected as obviously impracticable because "none of them suits our country and our present-day circumstances and our present climate." Every country has to find its own path to achieve its industrial and social revolution. India wanted to achieve her industrial revolution in the same rapid way as was done in the Soviet Union, "but we want to do it," emphasised Nehru, "in a democratic and peaceful way."¹⁹

At Indore in January 1957, the Congress amended its Constitution to say that the object of the Congress was the "establishment in India by peaceful and legitimate means of a Socialist Co-operative Commonwealth." The Congress President clarified that there was no difference between a socialist pattern of society and socialism as such. The amended first Article of the Constitution read, "The object of the Indian National Congress is the well-being and advancement of the people of India and the establishment in India by peaceful and legitimate means of a Socialist Co-operative Commonwealth, based on equality of opportunity and of political, economic and social rights and aiming at world peace and fellowship." It is, however, significant to note that the word "socialist" was for the first time incorporated in the objective Article of the Congress Constitution. "This concretisation of a concept," writes M.V. Rama Rao, "was a stride forward, taken by the Congress for striving for the development of the country and the abolition of social and economic inequalities."²⁰

The objects of the Indian National Congress were affirmed in no uncertain terms in the Election Manifesto of 1957. It declared, "The revolution in India can only be completed by an economic as well as a social revolution. These two latter are gradually taking shape in India. But, according to India's own genius and method, they take place peacefully and co-operatively." The Co-operative Commonwealth of India would be based on equality of opportunity and of political, economic and social rights and aiming at world peace and fellowship. Co-operation, the Election Manifesto said, "is the law of life in human communities, and it is in the measure that there is lack of co-operation that troubles and conflicts arise. Therefore the co-operative element should enter into every aspect of human life and, more particularly, in industry and agriculture. In industry, the co-operative principle should lead to industrial democracy with the progressive participation of workers in industry; in rural areas the community should be based on co-operative management of villages." But socialism does not merely signify, the Manifesto further added, "changes in the economic relations of human beings. It involves fundamental changes in the social structure, in ways of thinking and in ways of living. Caste and class have no place in the socialist order that is envisaged by the Congress."

The Nagpur session, held in January, 1959, would ever remain historic, because the Congress gave to the country a new and dynamic agrarian programme based on the principle of co-operation. The resolution on Agrarian Organisational Pattern said, "the future agrarian pattern should be that of co-operative joint farming in which the land will be pooled for joint cultivation, the farmers continuing to retain their property rights and getting a share from the net produce in proportion to their land. Further, those who actually work on the land, whether they own the land or not, will get a share in proportion to the work put in by them on the joint farm. As a first step, prior to setting up joint farming, service co-operatives should be organised and this stage should be completed within a period of three years. Ceilings should be fixed on existing and future holdings and legislation should be completed before the end of 1959. This did not mean ceilings on income. The surplus land should vest in the Panchayats and should be managed through co-operatives consisting of landless labourers."

The Congress was, thus, on the internal front pledged to the abolition of class distinctions and aimed to strive for a classless and casteless democratic society, based upon the dignity of labour as well as on the dignity of individual in every grade of life, through constitutional methods. It no longer believed in direct action and deprecated all those methods, disobedience of laws, strikes, processions, slogans, picketing, hunger-strike, etc., which the Congress so devotedly advocated and practised during its struggle for freedom of the country. "If the attention of the people," the Election Manifesto of 1957 declared, "is diverted into wasteful channels or conflict, then the nation suffers and the rate of our progress is slowed down. It is necessary, therefore, to have industrial peace as well as peace in our educational establishments which are training people to shoulder the burden of the nation. Strikes and lock-outs are peculiarly harmful when the main purpose is to add to production. Where any problems or controversies arise, they should be solved by peaceful and co-operative methods without stopping or slowing down the great machine of production which is so essential to the march of the nation in the next great stage in its journey to a socialist commonwealth."

The sixty-sixth session of the Indian National Congress (1961) emphasised the programme of national integration, Socialism through a mixed economy, vitalization of village life through Panchayati Raj and co-operative organization. The resolution of the Congress Working Committee on the election manifesto, inter alia, declared, "In view of the general elections to Parliament and the various State legislatures, which are to be held early in 1962....this manifesto should state clearly Congress aims, policies and programmes....The objective of a socialist society to be realised through democratic and peaceful means...is an objective compatible with the need for rapid social and economic progress in India, maintaining at the same time, the moral and ethical values to which the Congress has always attached importance, and represents the spirit of India's struggle for freedom and is in line with the genius of her people." The only feasible method, the Election Manifesto of 1962 reiterated, "of advancing towards the achievement of this objective is through planning, so that maximum effort could be diverted to this end." The Third Five-Year Plan, it said, was of special importance because on its success would depend the establishment of a socially balanced and increasingly prosperous and integrated community. The industrial policy resolution of 1956 had stated in clear terms the policy to be pursued in the programmes of industrialisation of the country wherein public and private sectors should function in unison as parts of a single mechanism. There should be no conflict between the two sectors and it was only through the successful and efficient functioning of these two sectors that the industrial programme could be successfully implemented.

The Election Manifesto, then, laid stress on the importance of balanced development of different parts of the country and on extending the benefits of planned development to the more backward regions. It also dealt with the necessity of continued and devoted attention to the training and well-being of the workers, ending of unemployment, and tackling the over-growing population problem through birth-control and family planning. On the side of agriculture, land reforms must be fully implemented in all the States, modern methods and techniques in production should be employed in an increasing measure, service co-operatives should be established throughout the rural areas, and co-operative farming on a voluntary basis should be organised wherever possible.

In foreign policy the Congress stood for world peace and believed that if nations of the world were not to destroy each other, the only principle on which the world community could conduct its affairs was Panch Sheela. Disputes between nations arose because lack of understanding begot suspicion. Panch Sheela should remove sources of such mutual distrust. The Congress was, thus, called upon to make the gift of truth and non-violence to the world. The Amritsar resolution in foreign policy was sponsored by Jawaharlal Nehru and was entitled as the "message of Buddha." It declared that the world had to choose between Buddha and Gandhi and the atom. "Humanity," said Nehru, while speaking on the resolution in the Subjects Committee, "had to choose today between the message of the Buddha and the hydrogen bomb. There was nothing in between to choose from."

"In the year that is just ended," declared the Election Manifesto of 1957, "India and many other countries have celebrated the 2500th year of the passing away of Buddha. The message of this great son of India has again resounded in our ears. In a world torn by hatred and violence, his gentle voice carrying this message of compassion has come to us through the ages. That message was repeated in our own day by Gandhiji. That is the message of India throughout these thousands of years of her history. Whatever activities we may indulge in, whether they are political or economic or social, we have to keep that message ever before us, if we are to remain true to the spirit of our country and to the service of humanity." The Manifesto ended, "with renewed strength firmly based on the goodwill of the people, it is determined to labour for the advancement of the Indian people and for the world peace." Addressing the All-India Congress Committee at its Poona Session on June 5, 1960, Nehru declared that India's policy of non-alignment had proved to be a correct policy in this "historical crisis" the world was facing today. "In the past", said Nehru, "we have helped a little in smoothening difficulties between other countries and perhaps the history of the world might have been somewhat different if India had not been there during the last few years following her policy of peace and non-alignment". The 1962 Election Manifesto reaffirmed non-alignment policy and friendship with all nations.

The 1967 Election Manifesto of the Indian National Congress reiterated its deliberate choice in favour of an open and democratic society "In proclaiming democracy as our way of life," the Manifesto said, "we emphasise not only its central concept of political equality but also its equalitarian implications in social and economic fields. True to the genius of our movement for political emancipation and in the faith that enduring good to society cannot come through violence, we have decided to bring about through the open and democratic process the social and economic changes our society needs." The Party, thus, adhered to its cherished goal of establishing a democratic socialist society and advocated that the State should play an active and dynamic role in planning, guiding and directing the economic development of the country. In such a society a dynamic and growing public sector was an important tool for social transformation. The Congress, in brief, promised to consolidate and carry forward the achievements of the earlier plans, make up their shortfalls and to prepare the background for a self-reliant economy.

The principal programmes outlined in the Manifesto were:

- (1) Highest priority to all schemes of agricultural and industrial production with a view to promote exports and replace imports.
- (2) Ensure price stability for checking all inflationary factors and avoiding the need for deficit financing.
- (3) Enlarge the income of the rural population and secure proper arrangements to maximise agricultural production.
- (4) Production of fertilizers, insecticides, agricultural implements, pumps, tractors, diesel engines, etc.
- (5) Enlarge the supply of main essential consumption goods.
- (6) Continued growth in metals, machinery, chemicals, mining, power and transport.
- (7) Family planning.
- (8) Additional resources would be provided for social welfare schemes.
- (9) Greater employment and social justice.

On the international policy, the Congress maintained the basic lines of Nehru's policy—peaceful co-existence, non-alignment, non-intervention in internal affairs, opposition to colonisation and devotion to the United Nations. The Manifesto promised to foster African fellowship, to safeguard the Arab World relationship, to maintain Commonwealth link, to value American assistance, and to cherish Soviet friendship.

In the 1967 General Elections the Congress majority in the Lok Sabha was substantially diminished and it lost majority in a large number of State Assemblies. In Rajasthan it secured 89 seats out of a total of 184 and in Uttar Pradesh 199 out of a total membership of 425. The position in West Bengal, Kerala, Madras and Orissa was still worse. In Kerala it secured only 9 seats, in Madras 50, in Orissa 31, and in West Bengal 127. The Congress now stands discredited at the bar of public opinion. Power has corrupted its leaders and struggle for power has lowered the Congress prestige. Factions are rampant in the Party and the average Congressman is collecting the dividends on his past investments. Siddhartha Sarkar Ray, former Judicial Minister of West Bengal, said in the State Assembly in 1958 that the Congress Party and administration were "helping in building up a morally corrupt and physically weak nation".²¹

Even if the statement of Ray is not to be accepted at its face value, credence and authenticity must be attached to what the Congress veterans have said. Duni Chand Ambalvi, in his article, "Congress and Congress Governments," wrote in 1959, "If I were to narrate all that has happened inside and in the name of the Congress since the advent of freedom it would be a harrowing and distressing story. In the general elections of 1945-46, many Congress notables in the Punjab, acted upon the adage 'make hay while the sun shines'. Some of them who could not or did not go to the Punjab Legislative Assembly made piles of money." He further added, "I know enough of the working of the Congress machinery and that of the Punjab Election Board of which I was a member in 1951-52. Pre-planned designs, duplicity and what not played greater role in the selection of candidates than any consideration of honesty, fair play, and recognition of the claims of deserving candidates."²² Pyarelal, the former Private Secretary to M.K. Gandhi, wrote, "It has to be admitted that India today is far from realising the picture of what Gandhiji called, 'India of my dreams'. Bribery and corruption are rampant all round, and on all accounts it is far worse than it was under British rule. Favouritism and nepotism and failure of the judiciary to give unadulterated justice to the people in innumerable cases is a distressing fact."²³ C.D. Deshmukh said that it was now recognised that the administrative machinery at all levels was "erratic and inadequate. The public heard of nepotism, high-handedness, gerrymandering, feathering of the nests through progeny and many other sins of commission and omission."²⁴

The frenzy exhibited by Congressmen over the reorganization of the States and the language issue was highly ominous. Eminent Congressmen holding positions of responsibility indulging in anti-national acts and threatening national unity was a woeful commentary on events and a precursor of the danger ahead of the Party and the country. The 1960 elections to the Rajya Sabha by State Assemblies revealed that differences among Congress members led in some cases to the defeat of Congress nominees. The 1962, 1964, 1966 and 1968 elections repeated the same story. In the biennial elections to the Legislative Councils in 1968, in Madras, for in-employment achieved and economic equality established through large-scale industrialisation with State aid, encouragement of cottage and small-scale industries, and redistribution to ensure to everyone an economic holding, the organisation of society on co-operative lines, labour participation in management, the development of village panchayats and large-scale co-ordinated planning. But the Socialist approach to the socio-economic problems differs from that of the Congress on one vital point. According to the policy statement of the P.S.P. National Executive, large-scale industries must be owned by the community. The Election Manifesto of 1962 clarified this issue. It said, "The party believes that in the interest of planned economic development it is essential to nationalise banks, mines and mineral oils. To accelerate capital formation it is necessary for the State to take over big plantations, and trade, wholesale and foreign, in selected commodities. The Party is opposed to monopolist expansion of a few business houses that grow at the expense of a large number of existing or possible small and medium entrepreneurs. The Party disfavours institutions like Managing Agency system and will take determined steps to break up industrial monopolies."

The 1967 Election Manifesto of the Party emphasised equality and social justice as the sheet anchor of its policies and programmes. The Party, it said, would strive to limit the minimum and maximum incomes to the ratio of 1:10 and take necessary steps to reduce disparities in urban incomes through price and wage policies and administrative credit and fiscal measures. Tapering peaks of poverty created through unearned incomes, the Party pledged to remove through the imposition of capital levy, by introducing ceilings on urban property, by eliminating disparities between the salaries of the Central and State Government employees and by abolishing the privy purses of the former Princes. The Praja Socialist Party's efforts to usher in equality would not be restricted to the economic field alone but would be extended to the social plane as well. It would endeavour to remove various taboos and social inequalities from which women in India suffer, by uplifting the Scheduled Castes, the Scheduled Tribes and the landless labour, by relentless fighting against untouchability and by the eradication of evils from the caste-ridden society.

The Praja Socialist Party believes in a planned economic development. But if economic planning is to be the instrument of ushering in democratic socialist society, the emphasis of planning must primarily be at the base and not the apex. District administration which is too close and has democratic foundations should be the principal unit of economic planning. Under its directions, integrated land reforms will be implemented as time-bound programmes. It will be closely connected with development plans so that there is an effective co-ordination between land reforms and key reorganization. Credit and technical assistance will proceed hand in hand. The Party will lay special emphasis on regional development and in locating State and aided enterprises, the present imbalance between various regions will be corrected and concentration of ownership in agriculture, industry, and commerce will be prevented.* The nationalised sector will subserve the needs of the public and co-operative producers. While the Party believes in the nationalization of all basic and key industries the phased programme of nationalization will start with those industries where capital tends to accumulate. Even in the nationalized sector, to avoid the danger of over-centralization and bureaucratization, autonomous corporations with adequate representation to technicians and workers on boards of management will be set up to run the nationalised industries. The problems of planning will be tackled in such a way that the country will move in the direction of a developing and self-governing economy so that there is a gradual disappearance of India's dependence on foreign aid.

The Praja Socialist Party stands for an independent foreign policy. It is opposed to military alliances. The Party will judge international events on the basis of justice and equity and will protect the vital interests of the nation. It aims to preserve and strengthen the United Nations as an instrument of collective security and while developing foreign relations the Party will not lose sight of the fact that in the Afro-Asian world India has a significant role to play in co-operation with other friendly nations. Settlement with China without vacating aggression is not in the national interest and the recovery of territory lost to China and Pakistan will receive the Party's highest priority. The Party extends its wholehearted support to the Tibetan people's struggle for freedom against China's oppression.

The Party aims for self-sufficiency in every branch of weaponry, nuclear as well as conventional, to strengthen India's defence on all fronts. With the growing collusion with China and Pakistan, the threat to India's security having increased manifold the Party considers that the controversy—'Atom for peace or for war'—is irrelevant. What is needed at present is harnessing the atom for peaceful development as well as for the manufacture of nuclear weapons as a deterrent to the aggressors who threaten India's freedom and sovereignty. Kashmir, the Party believes, is an integral part of India and its accession is final and irrevocable.

The Congress regards the Praja Socialist Party point of view too much doctrinaire, dogmatic and vague to be of any practical value. The Praja Socialist Party, on the other hand, regards the Congress as a reactionary and anti-democratic organization as under its rule the "Government has sought to make the administration all-enveloping, has systematically pulverised independent organizations and has not hesitated to disrupt the emerging countervailing forces against bureaucracy and authoritarianism in the infant democracy. The fast expanding administration, which sucks up all power and initiative, itself reeks with corruption, and at the grass roots where the administration impinges on the lives of the common folk it is at once inefficient and oppressive."²⁷ The 1967 Election Manifesto appealed to the people to give their unequivocal verdict on the performance of the Congress "which has sharpened inequalities, stifled people's liberties, encouraged corruption and has exposed through its week-kneed policies nation's frontiers to intrusions by hostile neighbours."

Efforts have recently been made to merge the Praja Socialist Party and the Socialist Party. In spite of the best efforts on both the sides there could not be an acceptable agreement and both the Parties stand asunder divided and confused without any certainty of their future. At least this is how an impartial observer will see.

The Communist Party. The Communist Party rose in the course of India's struggle for freedom as a result of the efforts of the Indian revolutionaries who drew their inspiration from the Great October Revolution. "The Communist Party of India," reads the Party's Constitution, "is the political party of the Indian working class, its vanguard, its highest form of class organization. It is a voluntary organisation of workers, peasants and of toiling people in general, devoted to the cause of Socialism and Communism." The aim of the Communist Party is the achievement of power by the working people; the establishment of people's democracy led by the working class, based on the alliance of the working class and peasantry, and the realisation of Socialism and Communism. Its programme includes defence of the vital interests of the masses, steady improvement in their living conditions and abolition of social and economic inequalities. "It fights against all obstructionist conceptions and practices such as communalism, caste, untouchability and the denial of equal rights for women. The Communist Party upholds freedom of conscience of the rights of all minorities. It fights for rights and welfare of the people of tribal areas....Fighting against all separationist and disruptionist trends and movements, the Communist Party struggles for balanced development of all regions, for equality and equal treatment for the people of all linguistic regions as a sure foundation of Indian unity."

The 1967 Election Manifesto outlines the programme for immediate measures. With the implementation of this programme the Communist Party intends to save the country from "the present crisis, stimulate production in industry and agriculture, ensure at least minimum needs of living good life, strengthen and extend democracy and avert the danger of India falling a helpless victim to American neo-colonialism." The broad features of the programme are: total elimination of foreign monopolies, annulment of all collaboration agreements, taking over by the State of all foreign trade, effective measures to curb the monopolists and to break up in particular the 75 monopoly houses exposed in the Monopolies Commission Report, replacement of the Fourth Plan by a People's Plan, nationalisation of banks, mopping up the accumulated wealth of the monopolists and former Princes, overhauling the entire present tax structure, abolition of land revenue to be replaced by a steeply graded tax on agricultural incomes, with exemption for all uneconomic holdings, democratisation and reorganisation of the public sector, assurance of minimum need-based wage, enforcement of effective and far-reaching land reforms, wider power and authority, particularly in economic and financial matters, be given to the State.

The Party believes that in order to ensure rapid and faithful implementation of urgently needed democratic reforms the first step is to clean up and overhaul the State administration. With this end in view the Parliamentary system need be strengthened by abolishing the Emergency Powers of the President and his power to dismiss a State Government so long as the latter enjoyed the confidence of the Legislature. The institution of the Governor will be abolished and the costly and superfluous Upper Houses be substituted by Standing Committees with representatives of all parties. Proportional representation will be introduced in all elections and judiciary separated from the executive. Police administration shall be reformed and handed over to the local elected organs of the people.

In the struggle for its immediate as well as ultimate objectives, the Communist Party is guided by the philosophy and the fundamental principles of Marxism-Leninism "which only show the toiling masses the correct way to put an end to the domination of exploiting classes and the establishment of a social society. It combats tendencies of revisionism, dogmatism and sectarianism in all their manifestations."

The methods of the C.P.I. to achieve its objects had till yesterday been the familiar agitational and direct strike and sabotage, and they were in conformity with the teachings of Marx and Lenin. Today, the Soviet Communist Party's thesis has undergone a revolutionary change and it is now admitted that a peaceful social change is possible and that where a parliamentary form of government exists the transformation of a capitalistic society into a socialistic community can be achieved without a violent revolution. This is virtually acknowledging the validity of the democratic view, and revising the old Marxian theory of class war and proletarian revolution. Explaining the implications of the political revolution adopted by the Fourth Congress of the C.P.I., held at Palghat, Ajoy Ghosh, then General Secretary of the Party, expressed his Party's agreement with the new Soviet Communist Party's thesis. The Party's Constitution now provides that the Communist Party of India "strives to achieve full democracy and socialism by peaceful means. It considers that by developing a powerful mass movement, by winning a majority in Parliament and by backing it with mass sanctions, the working class and its allies can overcome the resistance of the forces of reaction and ensure that Parliament becomes an instrument of the people's will for effecting fundamental changes in the economic, social and State structure."²⁸

The Communist Party stands for foreign policy based on the principles of Panch Sheela. It advocates for peace and peaceful co-operation between all countries on the basis of full freedom and equality of all people and nations. It supports the anti-imperialist struggles of the colonial and dependent peoples. It favours, despite the continued hostile attitude of China, to explore all avenues for a peaceful settlement with China either directly or through the good offices of friendly neutral powers and proposes a No-War pact to China. As regards Pakistan the Party's attitude is to safeguard the Tashkent spirit and to work for the further realisation of normal relations between India and Pakistan. Over the issue of Kashmir efforts should be made for a lasting accord with Pakistan by making the existing cease-fire line as the international boundary with mutually agreed adjustments. India should quit the Commonwealth—the link which gives India no advantage whatsoever.

Communist Party of India (Marxists). There was a split in the Communist Party of India after Vijayawada Congress of 1961. The split in the Communist movement, according to the Communist Party's Election Manifesto (1967), has seriously affected the mass movement as well as the struggle for forging broad unity of the Left and democratic forces.

28. Constitution of the Communist Party of India adopted at the Extraordinary Party Congress, Amritsar, April 1958.

The Communist Party of India, the Communist Marxists claim, is a group of Dange revisionists out to pursue their opportunist line of class-collaboration. Taking advantage of the bourgeois chauvinism raised in connection with India-China conflict, the revisionists "joined hands with the bourgeois-landlord government (Congress) to open the country to American penetration, the dire effects of which they are seeing today." The revisionists (Communist Party of India) have neither ideologically nor organisationally any right to call themselves by the old name. The Communist Party of India (Marxists), they claim, is the only party that stands firmly and consistently for Socialism.

The Communist Party of India (Marxists) aims at socialisation of the means of production and this can only be achieved under a proletarian State alone. It is in the proletarian State that exploitation of man by man can be abolished and, thus, help to solve the problems of poverty and impoverishment. The Party firmly believes that the road to socialism can be opened only through the establishment of a State of People's Democracy led by the working people and replacing the present bourgeois-landlord State, led by the big bourgeoisie. This can be achieved only by developing determined mass struggles on the basis of growing unity and consciousness of the people. The Party works determinedly for organising people's struggle for livelihood, democracy and power. It believes and advocates in bandhs, gheraos and student struggles. The Election Manifesto of the Party said, "The mighty Bengal Bandhs, the Kerala, Bihar and U.P. bandhs have set the pace for the new movement. Millions have participated in these struggles and braved the firing squads of the police to defend their livelihood and liberties. These have been followed by the mighty wave of student struggles which the government seeks to put down by sheer terror. There have been big struggles of the working class, salaried employees and finally the employees of the government.... Never before since independence India witnessed such mighty struggles." The Party, the Manifesto further said, "with its militant and revolutionary tradition calls upon the people to rout the Congress and endorse the Party's electoral programme which alone shows a way out of the present critical situation."

The Party stands for the sovereignty of the people, annulment of the Emergency powers of the President, proportional representation, regional autonomy for tribal areas, and equal rights for all citizens, equality of all languages, widest autonomy of the States comprising Union of India, and abolition of the institution of Governors. On the economic side, the Party stands for taking over of landlords' land and its distribution among agricultural labour and poor peasants gratis, cancellation of debts owed by peasants, agricultural workers and small artisans, equitable distribution of food to the people of urban and rural areas, state trading in foodgrains and entire surplus of the produce of landlords and rich peasants to be compulsorily procured. Effective price control is sought through nationalisation of banks, State trading in foodgrains, etc. Drastic reduction in taxation is proposed and taxation on all necessities of life is to be abolished. The Party proposes reduction in defence expenditure, abolition of land tax, irrigation cess and other cesses and surcharges on uneconomic holdings. The Party will stop all further American aid, impose moratorium on all foreign payments, nationalise all foreign trade and all foreign capital in plantations, mining, oil, refineries, industry, shipping and trade.

With relation to internal trade and commerce the Party champions nationalisation of banks, monopoly concerns and other big industry wherever immediately necessary. A people's economic plan of development and reliance will be initiated. Development of public sector with the utmost rapidity will be undertaken and private sector and profits therefrom will be strictly controlled.

In international relations, the Party stands for independent foreign policy based on opposition to imperialism, especially American imperialism, colonialism and neo-colonialism and support to all freedom struggles. It believes and supports the policy of co-existence and friendship with the peace-loving countries and a firm solidarity with Afro-Asian people. Break with British Commonwealth is its avowed object. It firmly believes and will strive for peaceful settlement of dispute with Socialist China and creation of friendly relations with China in the interest of Asian freedom. India and China understanding to be made the basis of a broad front against American imperialism. The Party advocates peaceful settlement of dispute with Pakistan.

Bhartiya Jan Sangh. The Bhartiya Jan Sangh came into existence on the eve of the first General Elections under the leadership of late Dr. Shyama Prasad Mukerjee. It is really the organisation of the Rashtriya Swayam Sewak Sangh workers and believes in the ideal of "one country, one culture and one Bhartiya nation". The Jan Sangh did not do well in the first General Elections and could secure only 3 seats in the Lok Sabha and 34 seats in the State Legislatures mainly in Northern India. In the second General Elections it secured 4 seats in the Lok Sabha and 46 in the State Legislatures; 4 in Bombay, 10 in Madhya Pradesh, 9 in Punjab, 6 in Rajasthan and 17 in Uttar Pradesh. But the third and fourth General Elections have raised the stature of the Party and its voice counts both in the Lok Sabha and the State Legislatures. In Madhya Pradesh it now commands 78 Assembly seats, in Rajasthan 22 and U.P. 97. In the Lok Sabha its strength is 12.²⁹

Early in 1956, there were abortive attempts to merge the Jan Sangh and the Hindu Mahasabha. It was disclosed by the General Secretary of the Sangh that the merger of the Hindu Mahasabha, Ram Rajya Parishad and the Jan Sangh into a single party would make it possible to throw its doors open for all the citizens of India irrespective of caste and religion. But the talks did not succeed.

At a meeting of the Working Committee of the Sangh held at Poona in October 1956, it was decided to make the demand for "decentralization of political and economic powers through encouragement of small and cottage industries and provision of adequate scope of free enterprise" as the main slogan of the Sangh in the General Elections of 1957. The Working Committee decided to base its election propaganda mainly on economic issues to focus the attention of the electors on the "totalitarian trends inherent in the concentration of economic power in the hands of the States as envisaged in the Second Five-Year Plan."

29. As in April 1968.

The objective of the Bhartiya Jan Sangh is the rebuilding of Bharat on the basis of "Bharatiya Sanskriti" and "maryada" and as a political, social and economic democracy, guaranteeing equality of opportunity and liberty of person to all citizens so as to build up a prosperous, powerful and united nation—progressive, modern and enlightened, able to withstand the aggressive designs of others, and to exert herself in the comity of nations for the establishment of world peace. The main desideratum of the country's economic system, as of its polity, should be the all-round development of the individual. That system is the best which aids man to fulfil his requirements and brings happiness, that is, which promotes all-round welfare. A system which advances his economic good, but impedes his progress in other directions cannot be considered beneficial. The focal point of interest for every economic system should be man.

The Election Manifesto of the Party in 1967 is pledged to strengthen sentiments of national unity and bring about a Unitary State with decentralization of powers to the lowest levels. It will abolish Legislative Councils in the States and overhaul administration so that it is freed of bureaucratic ways of red-tapism and corruption. It promises cheap and speedy justice within the reach of everybody. It will strive to establish economic democracy with equal opportunities for development to all and with no chances of exploitation. Small industries will be the basis of industrial planning and Indianisation of mining, tea plantation, coffee, rubber and such other industries as are in the hands of mainly foreigners. Labour will be a co-sharer in the management and profits of industry. The Party will encourage mixed economy. It will guarantee a minimum standard to all citizens and shall fix a maximum of Rs. 2,000 as expendable monthly income.

The Bhartiya Jan Sangh does not profess the creed of non-alignment. It will follow an independent foreign policy and will enter into bilateral alliances with countries irrespective of their allegiance to the two power blocs, on the basis of reciprocity and mutuality of interests. It is not prepared to have any talks with China and Pakistan unless they agree to vacate aggression. The Party will recognise the Government of Taiwan provided the latter recognises the territorial frontiers of India. It has faith in the ultimate unification of India and Pakistan and will welcome any move to bring the two States closer, provided the move is not prompted by any third party.

Swatantra Party. Swatantra Party is ten years old now and during the short span of its political career, it has attained parliamentary status, both at the Centre and in the States. From the beginning the Swatantra Party became the focus of the attention of the political life of the nation. Its promoters predicted a promising career for the Party as they had believed that it could save the country from the "naked totalitarianism" of the Congress. K.M. Munshi, addressing the preparatory convention of the party at Bombay on August 2, 1959, said that "bit by bit we are going towards naked totalitarianism. At one time the slogan of "Co-operative Commonwealth" was coined. It was changed into "Socialist Pattern" which then became "Socialism". Munshi further added that he did not know what the next stage would be. While analysing the reasons for promoting the Swatantra Party, C. Rajagopalachari, its founder, said that "we feel that the Congress is becoming Communist" and the Congress rulers were "lowering the value of Dharma and heightening the value of money and property."

The Swatantra Party came into being in opposition to the Nagpur resolution of the Congress on co-operative-farming which, according to Ratnaswamy Mudaliar, the founder-member of the Party, "provoked people, resulting in the new Party taking shape."³⁰ The basic impulse of the Party is, thus, economic, not ideological. K.M. Munshi declared at the National Convention of the Party held at Patna on March 21, 1960, that "the common man has been the first victim of the policies of the ruling party. He has been denied the basic needs. He is faced with a perpetual food crisis. The food production is underplanned, underestimated and under-financed. To this sense of uncertainty has been added the ever-present dread of soaring prices...." The reason for this unfortunate situation, Munshi said, was not far to seek. "The leadership of the ruling party was obsessed with one type of development which it considered the panacea for all evils; industrialisation imposed from the top under unicentral planning, direction and control on the Communist pattern." Munshi further said that the nominated super-Government, the Planning Commission, planned, devised, sanctioned and controlled all welfare activities without any responsibility to Parliament. It was the sole judge of grants and appropriations. Legislation even in the States had to be approved by it.

Thus, the Parliamentary Government was circumvented. Power and initiative were concentrated in the hands of the party leadership, a totalitarianism pure and simple. The result was in the words of Munshi, "we left the Congress when the Congress left democracy."³¹ People see around them administrative mal-functioning checking the free play of economic endeavour. State-sponsored heavy industries and expanding State-owned sector have slowed down the rate of public efforts to stimulate growth. Ever growing corruption and increasing dependence on the Government are becoming all but universal. The policy of the Party declared that "the people who keenly desired to have good government have watched with resentment the growing maladministration, partisanship and corruption in the country, the manoeuvres and intrigues of those in power, their indifference to grievance, the destruction of social bonds by thoughtless social legislation and the neglect of the religious spirit which inspires selfless conduct....To this sapping of the national moral fibre must be added the present humiliation of submission to foreign occupation of part of our soil."³²

The Swatantra Party expresses its unshakable faith in democracy and aims to restore the Constitution of India to its 1950 integrity. It would maintain the rule of law in the fullest measure and restore to the people their fundamental rights untrammelled by any kind of restriction. It would respect the right of religious freedom; the right to an undisturbed family life and property; the right to free economic activity within socially desirable regulations. In pursuit of this the Planning Commission would be reduced to its legitimate function of planning responsive to the wishes of the people. It would not be allowed to dominate the life of the country as an instrument of authoritarian party leadership.

The Party, thus, concedes to the individual the urge of self-expression through economic activities of the people's own choice and they must be given free play within socially desirable regulations. Incentives have to play their legitimate part, uncrippled by heavy taxation, excessive Government interference and cumbrous red tape. People have to feel certain that they would be left to enjoy the fruits of their endeavour. Such measures alone would increase the scope for voluntary activities, provide the citizens with varied avenues for their talents, and thereby strengthen the basis of a democratic society. To put it in the words of C. Rajagopalachari, the Swatantra Party would try to establish the rule of "Dharma." Dharma, to him, "is greater than religion. It is common to all religions in India and outside. Dharma has nothing to do with any particular religion or God. Every man can ask his conscience what is the right thing to do and that is Dharma." Dharma is efficiency, justice, honesty—in fact, everything that should guide a man's conduct. "No Christian, no Muslim or any other religious minority," declared Rajagopalachari, "should be apprehensive when we talk of Dharma. When we talk of Dharma we talk of conscience of man."

The Swatantra Party regards enlightened self-interest as well as progress towards world unity as the bases of a sound foreign policy. It believes that the concept of non-alignment has lost all meaning after the aggression of China and Pakistan and consequently foreign policy needs to be reviewed and brought into closer relation to the realities of the international situation. Proper defence alliances with reliable powers are not only expedient but legitimate. The Party regards Communist China as the principal menace to freedom in Asia and calls for the building of a system of regional security by the countries of the South and South-East Asia in which it would like to see India play its proper part. In this context the Party supports the Government and the people of South Vietnam and their allies in resisting the aggression and expansionism of the Communist China and its North Vietnamese satellites. The Party stands pledged to a firm and vigilant policy in dealing with Communist China and for active steps to end its aggression at the earliest possible moment. While the Swatantra Party believes that normal and friendly relations between India and Pakistan are required in the interest and security of the entire sub-continent, it is of the view that the Pakistan aggression in 1965 has deprived Pakistan of whatever locus standi it might have had in regard to the Kashmir problem. The Party stands for the liberation of Tibet and recognition of Dalai Lama as the Head of the Government of Tibet in exile.

The Party's policy has been developed along three well-defined lines. In agriculture the Party upholds the right of the self-employed peasant-proprietor to own, manage and cultivate his land without let or hindrance by the State. In industry it would limit State intervention to those spheres in which this would assist and supplement and not compete with or extinguish private enterprise. Finally, the Party stands for the original Constitution of 1950 and for the maintenance of the guarantees in regard to freedom of trade and employment and to just compensation for any property acquired for public purposes. Realistically speaking, it is a mistake to equate this with laissez-faire or with a politically static attitude. But at the same time, to accuse the Congress of a wilful or even accidental diversion of its ideology to Communism is a naked untruth. If the widening sector of State influence in the life of the people in India and as a concomitant to that the expanding sphere of the so erroneously described bureaucracy is to establish Communism, then, Britain too, has become Communist because her commitment to a Welfare State compels her to extend her sphere of activity, controlling and regulating a part of the country's social life. There is, however, much substance in the exposure of the defects in the Congress policies; all-pervading inefficiency, corruption and dishonesty in administration and the blind adulation of Congress leadership.

But the affairs of the Swatantra Party are now in a mess. It has failed to consolidate the gains it made in the 1967 General Elections when it secured 42 seats in the House of the People (Lok Sabha) as against a mere 18 in 1962. Even in the States where the Party had improved its position only two years back it has been losing ground of late. A major Party revolt in Gujarat was followed by unseemly wrangles among the leaders. It suffered serious electoral reverses in Rajasthan, Haryana, Bihar, Uttar Pradesh and Punjab. The Party had cashed in on the anti-Congress mood in the country in 1967.

The Swatantra leaders must recognise that the Party's programme has little appeal to youth or labour. Its public image is that it is a party of rich men which stands for vested interests. Its zealous espousal of the cause of the Princes on the privy purse issue confirmed the common belief. As for anti-statism, the main Swatantra plank, it has lost much of its rationale as some of the leaders of the Party have begun to talk vaguely in terms of a "Gandhian type of socialism." The Swatantra started off as a secular party, giving itself an image clearly differentiated from the Jan Sangh. But even this differentiation is beginning to get smudged. It was reported that N.G. Ranga came to Bhubaneshwar, to preside over the Party's convention in October 1968, after addressing an RSS rally in Nagpur where he identified himself with the ideals of Dr. Hedgewar, the founder of this Hindu volunteer organization. Although the Party had succeeded in keeping the cow out of the Election Manifesto of 1967, its candidates in Gujarat and Rajasthan made a ban on cow slaughter the principal political plank. The conflict within the Party over Kashmir offers another illustration of its difficulties in pursuing a distinctive secular approach. Rajagopalachari and M.R. Masani are not hostile to Sheikh Abdullah. They have, in fact, been trying to build bridges between the Kashmir leader and Indian public opinion, but N.G. Ranga had no time for the Sheikh to attend the All-Party Convention held in Srinagar last year. It was, again, Ranga and his friends in the Party who were keen on a merger with Jan Sangh. The merger idea fell through because the Jan Sangh leaders, barring Balraj Madhok, were against it. Now with the split in the Congress, political alliance with the Congress (Organization), headed by S. Nijalingappa, Jan Sangh and Swatantra is publicly advocated.

CHAPTER XIII

POSTSCRIPT

The rapid transformation of the political scene since the Bangalore session of the Indian National Congress (July 1969), especially the bitter power tussle, the internal squabbles in the party, and the running battle between Mrs. Indira Gandhi, the Prime Minister, and Mr. Nijalingappa, the Congress President, raises several issues which have a close bearing on the entire concept of Parliamentary Government in India. Can the Congress, now riven into two, continue to be the most dependable instrument of social change? What is to be the exact relationship between the party and Government, or more specifically, between the ruling party and the Ministry? Again, how long can a Prime Minister whose party no longer commands an absolute majority, remain in office without the active or tacit support of elements whom the Government regards as anti-national and hence unreliable? For the first time there is, for all intents and purposes, a minority Government in office at the Centre.

The organisational wing of the party in power is expected to work in close harmony with, and always be willing to be guided by and support, the ministerial wing. The head of the organisation, the party President, and the Leader of the Parliamentary wing, who is the Prime Minister, should, in theory at any rate, always work hand in hand in order that the party's policies and election programme (which in effect is a pledge to the electorate) are duly implemented. It is the voter who is the final judge, and he gets the opportunity to pronounce his verdict when the country goes to the polls. The polemics indulged in by the old-line, conservative members of the Congress Syndicate on one side, and Mrs. Gandhi on the other, all cover up the basic purpose—control of the party machine. The "unity resolution" of August 25 proved a sham. Both wings flouted it with a vengeance. The truncated Working Committee, which met at the AICC office on Jantar Mantar Road, New Delhi, on November 12, 1969, expelled Mrs. Gandhi from the Congress for indiscipline, but her supporters, who met at her residence soon after, questioned the legality of this apparently vindictive action. The Nijalingappa group accused Mrs. Gandhi of encouraging "a personality cult that is threatening democracy in the organization" and called upon members of the Congress Parliamentary Party to elect a new leader. But their calculations went awry, and a large majority of the Congress Members of Parliament reaffirmed their confidence in Mrs. Gandhi. The other half of the Congress Working Committee (10 members out of 21) which supported her, hit back with a counter-charge in a resolution passed the same day stating, inter alia, "Democracy and discipline within the Congress Party organisation have been reduced to a mockery by a small coterie equating itself with the entire organisation." After the crucial test of strength in which Mrs. Gandhi triumphed (with a majority of about 220 out of the total Congress

M.Ps. numbering 282 supporting her) she pledged to re-dedicate herself "to rally the people to the cause of socialism and democracy and to rejuvenate the Congress." Later, Mrs. Gandhi's Congress "ousted" Mr. Nijalingappa from Congress Presidentship. These expulsions and counter-expulsions have created a piquant situation.

For over two decades after Independence, the Indian National Congress has governed the country and has dominated Parliament and State Legislatures, the other parties being much too small to offer an effective challenge to it. Because of sheer numbers in Parliament and State Legislatures and the massive support it commanded in the country for two decades after Independence, it experienced no difficulty in taking office. Except on very few occasions when there were some differences of opinion between the Prime Minister, Jawaharlal Nehru, and the Congress President in office at the time, there were no conflicts between the two wings of the Congress. With the disappearance of the dominating personality of Nehru from the scene, differences have been simmering, and the issue has now come to the surface.

Such tussles between the rival wings of the ruling party are, however, not unusual in parliamentary democracies. The battle between Mrs. Gandhi and Mr. Nijalingappa, representing the ministerial wing and the organisational wing respectively, has had the same result as the prolonged debate between Clement Attlee as the Labour Prime Minister of Britain and Harold Laski, then Chairman of the Labour Party. Attlee finally had the upper hand, clinching the issue once for all that in Parliamentary democracies the larger and the more important responsibility is the Prime Minister's. In New Delhi, the sharp differences between Mrs. Gandhi and the Congress President were mostly personal and born of pique and prejudice. They were not ideological because both claimed to be votaries of socialism. Both wings have declared their determination not to retreat a single step from the resolutions passed by the Congress at the Avadi, Bhubaneshwar and Bangalore sessions. Whether the rift hastens the process of creating a truly socialist pattern of society remains to be seen.

Throughout the wordy duels with the Congress President after the defeat of N. Sanjiva Reddy in the Presidential contest, Mrs. Gandhi maintained that the discretion of the Prime Minister could not be fettered by the organisational wing in the selection of Ministers and other matters which fall exclusively within her jurisdiction. In this she has the British and Australian practice in her favour. R.T. Mackenzie, in his classic book "British Political Parties", points out that the primary function of the mass political organisations, Conservative and Labour, is to sustain two competing teams of parliamentary leaders between whom the electorate as a whole may periodically choose. When the electorate has made its choice, the leaders of the successful team don the garments of authority which are provided under the cabinet system and they retain this authority so long as they retain the confidence of their followers in Parliament (and of course the electorate). Most Governments at one time or other find it advisable to make concessions on policy issues to the clearly expressed views of their followers outside Parliament. But they make such concessions much more frequently to their followers in Parliament on whose day-to-day support in the division lobbies they have to depend.

The rift in the Congress Party is now formal and complete and the country witnesses the strange, unprecedented spectacle of the same party forming the Government as well as the official Opposition. Polarisation of forces has not yet taken place in the country as a whole, but the split in the Congress, though a deplorable development from the ethical standpoint, has had one major result which has great significance for students of Comparative Governments. For the first time since the country gained Independence, the Indian Parliament has an officially recognised Leader of the Opposition. Till now, no opposition group had sufficient strength to claim the status of the Opposition. After the 1967 General Election, the largest group on the Opposition benches in the Lok Sabha (House of the People) was the Swatantra Party with a strength of 42. Following the rift in the Congress Parliamentary Party, Mrs. Gandhi's supporters numbering about 210 constitute the Government with this group bearing the name Congress (Government); the Syndicate wing known as the Congress (Organisation) forms the Opposition and is recognised by the Speaker as such. This is not a development to be passed over as merely a temporary phase of the internal life-and-death struggle of the Congress itself. The split appears to be permanent, with about 75 per cent Congress Members of Parliament behind Mrs. Gandhi.

The emergence of the Leader of the Opposition in Parliament will probably be an important landmark in the history of Parliamentary institutions in India. In the British Parliamentary structure the Leader of the Opposition as the shadow Prime Minister has a very important role to play. By virtue of his position and importance as an alternative Prime Minister, he has an official status and a regular salary and he ranks high in the political hierarchy.

A regular Leader of the Opposition in Parliament is expected to offer his fullest co-operation to the Government of the day, irrespective of its political complexion, in order that the business before the House is expeditiously disposed of in the national interest. Opposition for the sake of opposition is a regrettable feature of Legislatures in some developing countries. Constructive opposition is what is expected from a responsible opposition, and this is what the officially recognised Leader of the Opposition is paid for out of tax-payer's money.

The requisite standard of Parliamentary Opposition may take some time to develop in India. Though the Congress (Organisation) is obsessed with political and personal prejudices against Mrs. Gandhi, it should be the endeavour of both Congress groups in Parliament to evolve healthy conventions so that the Parliamentary system in the country may be further strengthened. The emergence of a responsible and cohesive Opposition in the Indian Parliament would therefore be a welcome step for the smooth working of democracy. A viable democratic alternative has been lacking in this country since Independence and anything that tends to promote a well-defined two-party system and gradual elimination of small, politically ineffective groups, should be welcomed from the political and constitutional standpoints. The fact that vital changes have taken place in the ruling party peacefully, without the country feeling the tremor, is admittedly a tribute to Indian democracy.

With the formal split in the Congress, one-party rule in the country ends. To the extent that this would tend to curb dictatorial tendencies born of a massive majority behind the Prime Minister, it would be a salutary development on the whole. A huge, unshakable majority at times leads to complacency, inaction and general lethargy on the part of the Ministry. With the possibility of effective challenges from the Opposition to be faced at every crucial step, the Government would have to remain constantly on its toes. What is more significant from the voter's point of view, the party in power has to justify its existence by a creditable performance during the time span allotted to it. If it does not push through its programme for social welfare and fails to carry out the Directive Principles of State Policy, it will be answerable to the electorate in the next general election and may be ousted by another party which pledges better performance.

An unwelcome sequel of the split in the nation's major political party is the relative instability in the administration. Stability is a vital factor in politics. Political permutations and combinations, following the shifting alliances between political parties in a legislature, merely lead to confusion, endless compromises in governmental policies and watering down of ideologies to keep the flock together and ensure the support of some other groups. When no single party commands a majority on its own, it has to depend for political survival on splinter groups and this dependence makes for more and more political horsetrading—an evil that makes nonsense of a healthy democratic set-up.

Mrs. Gandhi established her leadership when Parliament assembled for its winter session on November 17, 1969. The voting on the Adjournment Motion on India's participation in the Rabat Islamic Summit was 306 votes against and 140 in favour, giving Mrs. Gandhi's Government a safe majority of 166. Voting on other crucial issues may not disclose such solid support behind the Prime Minister, but it is clear that for many months to come Mrs. Gandhi will continue to be the only member of the Congress to have a majority behind her, though it may at times be constituted of diverse elements. Her total backing may, therefore, vary, depending upon the nature of the issue and the alignment of the opposition groups which are bound to determine their stand on each measure separately to suit their poll programmes and other public commitments.

In another respect, too, Parliament's winter session marked a watershed in the evolution of Parliamentary democracy in India. Apart from the fact that Parliament had, for the first time, a recognised 60-strong Opposition (now 65), there is the notable fact that at the Centre there is now a Government that has lost its absolute majority. For the present, there is no threat to Mrs. Gandhi's Government because of the support assured by the DMK, the majority of Independents and some Socialists. But how long this support lasts remains to be seen. There are signs already of discontent and frustration among the radicals who expected an early peaceful revolution.

The right of dissolution of Parliament, which every Prime Minister possesses, is Mrs. Gandhi's trump card. Almost every Member of Parliament inwardly fears a dissolution because of the high expenses of fighting an election and the marked uncertainty of the poll results in view of the multiplicity of candidates resulting from the split in almost all parties. It is clear, however, that the Prime Minister would not be making the right use of the weapon of dissolution if an alternative Government were possible. There is really no moral justification for making the nation pay for what is essentially the Congress Party's domestic quarrel.

The Ahmedabad and Bombay sessions of the rival Congress factions (held in the third and fourth weeks of December, 1969, respectively) have cleared the decks for them to function as separate entities and have thus formalised the split. At the plenary sessions the pent-up anger against each other was given free rein. The present crisis in the party was for months made out to be the result of conflict of ideologies between the progressives and reactionaries, between dynamism and status quo. But the resolutions of the two Congress sessions show that even though the break appears to be permanent, there are hardly any ideological differences between the two factions now. At the core is the personality conflict, the ideology merely providing a facade to the crisis. Specific doses of socialism have been adopted as a creed even by the Syndicate Congress. Between the Bangalore session, where the split began, and the two sessions at Ahmedabad and Bombay where the split was formalised, the Old Congress has moved to the left. Mrs. Gandhi, on the other hand, after swerving sharply to the left in the immediate post-Bangalore period and raising visions of revolutionary changes, has returned hastily to the starting point.

The net result is that both Congress parties now occupy almost the same ideological ground left of the Centre. At Ahmedabad the leaders of the Old Congress spent a great deal of time trying to prove that Mrs. Gandhi was the root of all evil, but personal invectives were happily absent from the Bombay session. The Ruling Congress leaders have abandoned some of their ultra-radical postures to conform to the dictates of reality. The great economic package eagerly looked forward to by large sections of the people was reduced at Bombay to a few specific items, with the emphasis shifting from high-sounding slogans to implementation. Bringing her over-enthusiastic followers away from the heady world of slogans to solid earth was a tough task for Mrs. Gandhi, but appropriately enough, she disciplined the 'Young Turks' in good time.

The relative strength as shown by the Ahmedabad and Bombay sessions indicates that neither faction can by itself deliver the goods or constitute a stable Ministry at the Centre. The split, therefore, implies a period of uncertainty during the Seventies. That both parties fully recognise the implications of the split is clear from the moves and counter-moves for forming party alliances with like-minded groups. Old foes have overnight become friends and allies working for a common cause, and they are being avidly wooed. The inevitable result will be a period of coalitions. Whether the new re-alignment of political forces will work effectively is however anybody's guess.

In the course of a few months the political platforms projected by the various parties have acquired a striking similarity. The Congress split has, thus, done some good to the political set-up—all-round radicalisation of politics and facilitating the polarisation of forces. Even Morarji Desai now believes that it is right and proper for the Congress to forge alliances with parties such as the Jan Sangh and Swatantra with whom, until recently, he sharply disagreed. To the extent that the new trend would promote electoral understandings and United Fronts, it is welcome. Splinter groups and multiple parties hamper the smooth working of democracy and lead to ineffective governments. Fewer and larger parties would therefore be desirable.

Some observers believe that dissolution of Parliament and fresh elections are inevitable during 1970, though Mrs. Gandhi has denied any intention to appeal to the electorate for the final verdict. Even if early elections are held, a clear picture of the political spectrum is unlikely to emerge just yet, because of the political confusion and the absence of distinct identities from which the voter can choose. By mid-seventies, perhaps, the mist would clear and the country would then know who can deliver the goods and who cannot.
